LONDON GENERAL EPISTLE.

The Friend (London) for Sixth Month 9th was long overdue; it reached our office too late last week to receive any notice in our issue of the 22nd. It may be possible in next week's number to give a synopsis of some of the many and varied exercises that came before that meeting, which is likely to be passed into history as a most memorable occasion.

We print in full the General Epistle and take from the body of the paper the following note, which will be of interest:

The Yearly Meeting Epistle of 1916 is in some respects unique in the history of the Society. Probably never before have so many really young Friends been appointed by the Large Committee on "the Committee of Twenty-five"—which this year consisted of twenty-eight Friends! It was a thoroughly representative committee as regards thought as well as age, and it was wonderfully united in its conclusions. The "underlying unity" was realized in a remarkable degree. In style and phrasing the Epistle is quite unusual; in places the language is almost colloquial. When have such expressions as "pet scheme" or "dead earnest" ever appeared in an Epistle before? Even the heading is different, and it begins "Dear Friends and Comrades." Its directness of expression, its almost monosyllabic wording, and its numerous interrogatory sentences make it well calculated to convey the deep spiritual message which it contains to the large circle outside our own borders who are believed to be ready for just such a message. It deserves the widest possible circulation.

TO FRIENDS THE WORLD OVER AND TO ALL WHO SEEK THE WAY OF LIFE.

From the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends held in London from the 24th to the 31st of Fifth Month, 1916.

DEAR FRIENDS AND COMRADES:—

We need one another in these dark days if we are to find the way to the true goal of humanity. We have missed the way. In struggling to find it we have been foolish enough to think that we could find it alone, or in small groups. Each group has its own pet scheme; and we call our different plans by names that exclude those who will not use our labels. Socialism, nationalism, democracy, orthodoxy, conservatism, liberalism—these are so many names by which we group ourselves around ideas. The goal of the race must include all noble human aims. Is it not time to set about seeking that goal—together?

British and German, Slav and Teuton, Mongol and Negro—into such groups we have been divided by birth. And so we conclude that we must struggle one against the other, each to win his own ends or work out his particular ideal of good. Can we not see a common good in which none shall be crushed, in which all shall strive together for more worthy ends than any of us can see alone?

There is warfare for all of us in this world. But against whom? and for what end? It is not our brother men who are our enemies, but the germs of disease that destroy men's bodies, and the false ideas and evil passions that destroy their souls. We strive for a state of society in which the good of all may be achieved by the self-denying labor of each. In this warfare we need one another. Every true man and every true woman counts. We cannot afford to lose brave spirits, whatever national allegiance they own, to whatever sect or party they belong.

Is it not time to try to find our way back to one another? We are all more or less in bonds. Some of us are bound by never-ceasing toil, and we cannot find the way to our best life. Some of us are bound by wealth that dims the vision of the Highest, and leaves us poor in soul when we are called rich. Some of us are bound, by what seems like a tragic fate, to take the lives of our fellow-men while we only wish to give our lives for our country. Some of us are bound to appear the enemies of our country for conscience' sake, when we wish to serve her with all our powers. Many of us are carrying a sorrow that is almost more than we can bear, and we cannot see the meaning of the loss of those whom we loved better than ourselves. Some of us are cut off from friends with whom we have worked, by deep differences of opinion that we cannot reconcile.

How are we to find our way back to one another? There is a way back, and, as we find this way and take it, we shall be able together to wage the one warfare worthy of all human endeavor.

There once lived a Man in whose short life men and women of the most widely diverse races and types have alike found inspiration. He moved with equal ease among rich and poor. He had a word of cheer for little children, for sorrowing women, for the outcast from society, for the sincere and true-hearted wherever He met them. His words opened men's eyes to the meaning of love. His deeds stirred their hearts by the beauty of love. His death won them by the power of love. Thus all sorts of people came to find in Him a Brother and a Saviour. If that kind of life were lived by many people to-day, the world would be a very different place. Can we not all begin at once to take Him seriously? Let us try together to see if His way will work. Let each one make the experiment. We want to begin without waiting until everyone else is ready to begin, too.

Would not this mean personal disaster? There seem to be so few arguments in favor of it, except that Jesus tried it, and it would, at any rate, be something new to try it in our common life to-day. But is it really possible to apply this to modern conditions, and to the whole community? Would it not lead straight to national ruin? Our own methods have not been crowned with such great success as to give us any confidence in discerning the wisdom of Jesus Christ. Is it not possible that He knew best, and that He had something quite distinctive to say to the world? May not His rising again be an actual fact big with meaning for us to-day? If so, we could at least say that by His death on the Cross, He won a truer victory than was ever won by armies or navies, and that God was indeed with Him, and is always with those who follow His way.

We stand by the conviction that this was and is actually the case, and that the most real and abiding force in human affairs was seen in operation in the life, death and rising again of Jesus Christ. That force we call the love of God. It cannot really be vanquished. Christ is not dead. He lives in our midst to-day. We know something of His spirit in our own experience. We want to know more of His spirit, because we are sure that He can lead us and all men in the way of truth. Our desire is to be altogether ready to follow wherever He leads, even when we cannot see where we are going. We are convinced that He is leading us to something very different from all that has satisfied us so far.

We may have to learn to give up the whole idea of defending our rights, and be willing to stand, as Christ stood, defenceless in the midst of a world of possible enemies. Might it not be that this plan would turn them into friends—a much better thing than defeating them? We may have to learn anew the real meaning of justice and to demonstrate it in the world as Christ did by accepting the full consequences of injustice. Is it not possible that we should thus find ourselves possessed of the only weapon by which evil can be overthrown—even the love that never fails?

The way may be difficult. The service called for may be menial, unseen, unrecognized. It matters not, if only, along with all others who really love their fellows, we can help to find the way back to one another, and to the Son of God. Let us begin again. The mistakes we have made have had terrible consequences. All the world is torn and divided, and there may be worse things to come. If we were all to begin again as little children, might not God use even us to save the world from threatened disaster? Might we not wage a winning war against all that destroys men's bodies and souls? Could we not find the way along which we might reach the true goal for the whole human family?

The way to discover and reach the goal is for each one of us to begin in dead earnest. When one person really steps out into the desperate venture of following Jesus all the way, someone else will see and want to follow too. There is a splendid contagion in courageous goodwill. One man, one Church, one nation, that takes the risks of such a following may lead the world to a better day. Is it not worth trying? Is it not, in fact, the one thing in the world that is really worth trying? Is it not the way by which we and our brothers may come to know God?

Together with all who strive for these things we seek to know and follow His wonderful will for men. Let us turn to Him without any reserve in the confidence that He is eager to give to us His best—now.

Signed in and on behalf of the meeting.

JOHN H. BARLOW, Clerk.

THE THREE DAYS.

Three days, I ween, make up our life

Where shadow and sunshine play;

The day that is past and the day to come,

And the day that is called to-day.

Three days, I ween, make up our life,

But two are not ours at all,

For Yesterday, laden with good or ill,

Has passed beyond recall.

And To-morrow sits shrouded near God's throne,

And her veil none shall tear away,

But To-day is the golden day for men

For God's will may be done to-day.

And if To-day we do Thy will

Though we sow our seed in sorrow,

We shall reap the harvest of likeness to Thee,

When we see Thy face To-morrow.

THE MESSAGE OF JOHN WOOLMAN.*

It is generally conceded that literature has been permanently enriched by the writings of John Woolman. And yet it is by no means easy to define wherein the Quaker saint of Mount Holly has made his special contributions, above and beyond the work he was enabled to accomplish in helping to purge the Society of Friends of all complicity with the institution of slavery. We search his Journal and other writings in vain for any startlingly new pronouncement on matters either theological, ecclesiastical or economic. John Woolman was no theologian, though loyal to the Christian faith. No ecclesiastic, though a consistent member of the Society of Friends. No mere reformer, though a pioneer in the advocacy of economic change. John Woolman was just a lover of God and of all His works, and especially of the image of God—the human race—under whatever conditions or color he came in contact with it.

That which was new about John Woolman was not so much his teaching as his life. He made an heroic attempt, by the constrainings and enablings of the Divine Spirit, to set forth the abstract in the concrete. He successfully demonstrated the workability of the principles of uncorrupted New Testament Christianity. He modernized the Sermon on the Mount.

John Woolman is no special ornament on a narrow sectarian shelf. To be a Quaker was to him the very negation of sectarianism. It lifted him, to use his own phrase, out of "the narrowness of sects" into the universal spirit of heavenly affections. He dwelt in an atmosphere inimical to wrangling and debate, where the True Light is seen in the shining of its own pure rays. We come across no theological subtleties in his writings. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are constantly affirmed by him, but not for controversy; they are the verities that nourished his piety, and directed the steps of a life, hid with Christ, in God. Thus in his religious labors he seldom argued, but rather appealed to that tender principle in others which he knew would consent to the Truth, whatever opposite reasons the mind, summoned to defend a bad conscience, might cleverly advance.

The life which John Woolman lived is the great legacy, not yet exhausted, which he has bequeathed to posterity. And this living message has at the very heart of it, the evidence which it affords, that the doctrine of the Inward Light is something more than an abstruse philosophical proposition or mystical dream. John Woolman found in it a healing virtue for his spiritual maladies, and a practical guidance in the footsteps of his Lord and Master. It enlightened his understanding with that wisdom which he was enabled to apply to the complexities of a busy life.

John Woolman and St. Francis of Assisi have sometimes been bracketed together as the two individuals who have most closely realized for us the image and example of the Blessed Master, of whom the four evangelists have left for us their pen-portraits. But of the two, John Woolman means more for us. I have no doubt that in St. Francis Divine wisdom approached the medieval church in a way it could understand. But in John Woolman our Lord comes to us under another form. There is no halo around John Woolman's head. Legendary love has not invested him with supernatural qualities. He is a child of our age, with his finger on the pulse-beat of our complex civilization; and amidst its fever and fret he pursues his tranquil way.

Coming more particularly to the literary remains of John Woolman, his Journal and the tracts he put forth, we discover that there are some three strands of teaching, which are twined together, and which may be spoken of as John Woolman's message. The first of these is his deep conviction that the secrets of life must be discovered in the depths of a man's own spirit. The second: the tremendous importance of little things. The third: that practical Christian living is the valuation of the things of time in the light of eternity. There is hardly a page on which one or other of these principles is not affirmed, having been woven into the web and woof of John Woolman's character. The space allotted to me here quite prevents a going into details. One would like to linger over the steps leading to what might be called his conversion, issuing in a life of devoted discipleship to Christ; John Woolman becoming acquainted with that tender principle placed in every man, which points out both the disease of sin and the Divine remedy. Also how attention to the inward teaching brought John Woolman forth in the ministry, and exercised him to wait in deep silence, sometimes for weeks together, until he felt that arise which enabled him to proclaim the message like a trumpet. How the conscience became more and more tender, and the understanding more and more enlightened; so that he could not but refuse to write a bill of conveyance for slaves; or make out bills disposing of slaves; or even wear dyed garments, because they covered up dirt; or send letters by post, because of the cruel speed to which post boys were subjected to the danger of their lives.

It also would be most helpful to make a special study of John Woolman's teaching on the subject of labor. What his illustrious contemporary, Emmanuel Swedenborg, enunciated in his "doctrine of uses," and Thomas Carlyle, the sage of Chelsea, a century after, in his "gospel of work," John Woolman, hearkening to the inward Teacher, expressed in words of unexampled simplicity, purity and sweetness, reflecting, as it has been pointed out, the tranquility and purity in which his soul habitually dwelt. While at the same time, what was with others an academic study, became living flesh and blood in John Woolman, easily apprehended by the common man.

But it might be profitable to focus special attention at this time on his tract, now entitled: "A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich," but originally headed, so I am informed, "A Plea for the Poor." It is indeed a choice production. It was first printed in 1793, more than twenty years after the decease of its author. The question arises whether Friends did not consider its teaching too radical, and therefore condemned it to the shelf so long. If so, John Woolman, like all the prophets, though of his time, with a message for his time, was ahead of his time. Be this as it may, it certainly deserves the closest scrutiny, and if its principles came to prevail in human society, the thorny problems of the proper relations between capital and labor which furnish material for the propaganda of modern socialism would surely be settled. But John Woolman's proposed solution comes from the opposite side of approach to that of the socialist agitator or the mere reformer. He comes to this ancient and modern question with the evangel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, "the Word of the Cross" which is "the power of God."

The tract is divided into twelve sections, each section crystallizing a definite point.

Thus in section I the author attacks the evil of seeking wealth for its own sake. In section II he pleads for the recognition of this fundamental fact that God is the true Owner, we only temporary possessors; in line with the Pentecostal experience, when "none of them called any of the things he possessed his own." In section III he points out to possessors of large estates that they hold them in trust for the benefit of others. In section IV he is concerned that those whose income is derived from the labors of others should cultivate tenderness of heart towards these toilers. Section V has for its burden the expression of John Woolman's feeling that the craving for inordinate luxuries is the reason that the many are overtaxed with toil never intended by infinite Goodness. The many are overworked for the benefit of the few. Section VI follows in due order dealing with the curse of intemperance which is fostered by the aforementioned evil, as spent nature is apt to cry out for artificial stimulants.

Section VII strikes a very solemn note. If we by our wealth make our children great and give them power to deal hardly with others, after death we shall have no more satisfaction out of it than if we had given it to others to enable them to oppress our children. Truly this is the valuation of the things of time in the light of eternity! Section VIII sets before the reader as the greatest aim in life to find such an establishment in the love of God that material gains will fail to cast their witchery over the imagination. Section IX shows how wars too have their origin largely in this spirit of covetousness, the desire to have what is in the hand of another. In section X the author reverts to his former thesis and opens up more fully the grand principle that God is the true landlord and man only his tenant for a brief while. In section XI he proves how mighty results flow from apparently small beginnings and that therefore little things may be the germs of tremendous consequences, so that we need to be constantly exercised to dwell in that universal love and in that Divine harmony in which the holy angels live, that the serenity of our mind may never be clouded by remembering that some part of our employments tends to support customs which have their foundation in the self-seeking spirit.

Finally, in section XII, John Woolman traces out the steps by which it has come to pass that there is so much inequality among men—the many debarred from the chances open to the few; he declares it to be his conviction that it is part of the programme committed to "the whole family of Christ Jesus in this world to labor for a perfect redemption from this spirit of oppression," a form of slavery which still casts its shadow over the greater part of the human race.

Our Divine Lord and Master said, that "to whom much is given, of him much will be required." John Woolman is one of the greatest gifts the Head of the Church has bestowed upon the Society of Friends. Truly he belongs to the Church universal. But his special sphere of labor was the religious fellowship of the Quaker community. Certainly not for this community to glorify itself on that account, or merely to inscribe John Woolman's name on its roll of "Quaker worthies." Rather so to learn the lesson of his life, and to catch its inspiration, that it may still be a factor making for spiritual advance.

MAX I. REICH.

OLD SPRINGFIELD DAY.

I love old meeting-houses, and could roam
 Forever in old Quaker neighborhoods,
 By peaceful hamlets and high breezy hills
 And dreamy rivers sleeping in the sun.
 Beneath the noble sycamores and oaks
 That guard those quiet roofs I love to watch
 The Friends arrive and in the shady porch
 Give cheery greetings, and in little groups
 Converse on happenings of the week, or glow
 With kindly, tender smiles and wistful words
 O'er "good old days" and memories half forgot,
 While young folks stray apart and children seek For violets and chase the butterflies.

—JOHN RUSSELL HAYES.

"Debbie, how's thee?" This with a peculiarly striking emphasis upon the final word, punctuated the stillness that was fast settling upon the large company gathered within the meeting-house at Springfield, Del. Co., Pa., upon First-day, the twenty-eighth of Fifth Month; the occasion being that of the annual "kindly" gathering of neighbors and old friends for the purpose of uniting in worship with the little group by whom the meeting is ordinarily sustained.

The tone of that voice lingers, while so much else that the day held of pleasing incident grows dimmer on the memory. It was a man's voice that we heard, all unmindful of its strength and frankness. No doubt the response came with equal good will, but in accents unheard. It is one of the redeeming features of "plain" Quakerism that though the worldly influence may generally prevail to hide its distinctive peculiarities of speech and manner, occasions do arise when the earlier nurture leaps once more to the surface, and aught but the old form and custom seems strangely out of place.

The day is of that rare, perfect character wherein all things without doors rejoice together and partake of the communion which thrills the heart and feeds the soul in man. From the giant oaks and stately maples that skirt the adjacent graveyard—most attractively kept—come the notes of the oriole, the vireo and the yellow warbler. Surely such harmony is in full accord with the will of the Creator. Not from within the meeting-house alone, but from all around, at such a time and on such a day as this, seems to come the inviting call to prayer.

At length a voice is raised to the Throne of Grace in reverent and impressive accents invoking the Divine blessing. The assembly rises to the sound of words proceeding from a heart bathed deeply in the memories of youth and early manhood, recalling the worth and strength of purpose that dwelt in the lives of those who in the past had served the Master within those walls—men and women whose personality had left a definite influence upon the neighborhood and who had shown forth to their fellows the uplifting and enduring qualities of Christianity.

Other hearts are stirred to speak the Gospel message that wells from the spring of life for the occasion. In this exercise of the ministerial gift there was enough to satisfy the believer that all proceeded from the same spirit, of which the refrain might be taken to be,—“Christ in you, the hope of glory.” “If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His.” The comforting promise to the church spoken by the prophet Isaiah was brought to remembrance,—“When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee.”

As the meeting had begun with an invocation for the Divine blessing, it closed with grateful acknowledgment that this favor had in large measure been granted. The sense that it had indeed been good to be there touched with deeper and tenderer feeling the greetings said, as kindred shook hands with kindred and friend with friend, beneath the shade of noble trees, or as they walked upon the verdant sod that mantled the graves where loved forms had been laid to rest.

We linger on the scene until almost the last of the many motor cars has sped away, and the gentle breeze has swept aside their successive trails of dust; then venturing forth amid the glowing noontide we follow the pure scent of succulent grass in glimmering meadows, or, the “impress from vernal wood,” till, at last, we reach a shady glen threaded by a streamlet fringed by nodding ferns and interrupted in its flow by spicy water-cress. Here we spread our appetizing luncheon already sauced by feigned hunger. Rest is sweet at such a time when the senses are lulled by the harmony that seems all-abounding. The song of the oven bird, the chewink and the indigo bunting is incessant, while in an adjacent field, sleek, well-contented kine pause amid their feeding, as if to inquire the purpose of our invasion of their domain. Luncheon over we draw forth a little book bearing the engaging title,—“A Son of the Morning.” It has the sub-title, “Incidents in the Life of Richard Davies,” with the commending legend:

“They that turn many to righteousness
Shall shine as the stars forever and ever.”

The compilation, as will be remembered, is the work of our friend, William C. Allen, and as we sit at ease this rare day of heavenly peace and quiet amid the beautiful hills, a kindly thought goes out to him who now labors in a distant land for that same Gospel of peace and goodwill to men, which settling upon the heart of the sturdy Welshman made him indeed through faith and service, “a son of the morning,” in those early days of Quakerism. Here is a passage from the book that fell beneath our eye:

“The Almighty God put it in my heart to consider the cost, and that through tribulation I was to enter the kingdom of heaven. And I was faithful in this testimony I had to bear. “The consideration was weighty with me, lest I should begin to take up the cross and to walk in this way, and I should not be able to hold out to the end. The weight and burden was great, having none in the country to be an help to me in the time of my exercise, but the Lord alone. I was very ready and willing to take hold of his promises; and my prayers unto Him were, that He would enable me to go through all things that He required. I was now first called a Quaker because I said to a single person, thee and thou, and kept on with my hat, and did not go after the customs and fashions of the world, that other professors lived and walked in.”

“We may observe,” says our compiler, “that this young man, who was at that time about twenty years of age, became a convinced Friend, in the most unfavorable surroundings, and almost without any human friendship or approval to cheer him on his way.”

We read further and come upon this passage: “When about twenty-two years of age, Richard Davies obtained permission to leave his business and go to Shrewsbury to attend a meeting that he understood was held there. He had never before been in a Friends’ meeting. No word was uttered; yet as they sat in silence, their hearts were so touched with a sense of the Divine love and presence, that there was hardly a dry eye among them.”

We at length closed the book with mingled feelings. One cannot but be stirred by such reminiscences of early Quakerism. The strength of character, the definiteness of purpose, the abounding willingness to wait for the presence and call of God in their hearts until aroused to action or melted into tears, that characterized these “Children of the Light,” these “Friends of Truth,” must be a constant inspiration to us who surely have not received such an heritage for naught.

WALTER L. MOORE.

ARE LARGE ARMAMENTS AS SUCH EITHER PRO- CATIVES OF WAR OR DETERRENTS OF ARBITRAL AND JUDICIAL SETTLEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL DIFFERENCES?

BY CHARLES JEFFERSON, NEW YORK CITY.

(Concluded.)

Armed Peace is a form of war. Armament is in reality an attack on some other nation. That nation meets it with a counter attack. Launch a dreadnought and there is a counter dreadnought, a cruiser and there is a counter cruiser, a submarine and there is a counter submarine. You cannot arm for defense without compelling others to arm in defense, and when the defenses have reached a certain point of perfection there will be war. Just now many Americans are trying to draw a line between armament for defense and armament for aggression. There is no such line possible. What is defensive for you, will be offensive for your neighbor. Men say: “We arm not for war, but against war,” and think they have said something. They have said nothing. You can’t change a situation by altering a preposition. It makes no difference at all whether you arm for offense or defense—for war or against war. The effect is precisely the same, and the budgets are the same. Great Britain armed for defense only. A navy was necessary, she said, to protect her commerce. Germany built up a vast commerce, and acting on the British philosophy, she said she had to protect it with a fleet. Every German, from Von Bulow down declared it was only for defense, but no Englishman believed it. Every Englishman declared that the British navy was solely for defense, but no German believed it. What is the use of fooling ourselves with words. It is not what we say, but what we do, that shapes the character and destiny of the world. England armed for defense and Germany did the same, and they met at last on the field of blood. They did not want to fight. Every Englishman of note has said that within the last ten years. Every German in official position has said that Germany desired only the friendship of England. The Kaiser said it, and Marshal von Bieberstein and Prince Lichnowsky and Herr von Jagow, and all the rest of them. You may say they were lying. I cannot go with you. I believe they were all honest men and spoke the truth. The best men in Britain and Germany had no desire to fight. Those two great empires were driven to war by their guns. The expanding squadrons of battleships on the North Sea simply drove them irresistibly apart, snapping the ties made sacred by the memories of a thousand years.

In the third place large armaments precipitate war because in times of national excitement, the control of affairs passes inevitably into the hands of the most aggressive and best organized body of men in the nation. As a recent writer in the Berliner Tageblatt says: "Even the most gifted and most industrious monarch disappears behind the machine." Now the army and navy are machines. They are organized for swift and vigorous action. The English papers have prided themselves for years on the fact that in case of war, the British navy would get its blow in first, before the other nation had the time even to read in the papers that war had been declared. At the first Hague Conference, the head of the German delegation, Count Munster, disparaged arbitration, saying: "It would be injurious to Germany. Germany is prepared for war. She can mobilize her army in ten days. Arbitration simply gives rival powers time to put themselves in readiness." At the same conference, Sir John Fisher spoke for England. His argument was this: "The British navy is prepared. A vast deal depends on prompt action by the navy. The truce afforded by arbitration proceedings will give other powers time to put themselves into complete readiness." This is the spirit of the army and navy always. It is fundamental in military tactics that the blow shall be swift. No time must be wasted on reflection or on discussion. The machine when ready must move at once. It is disheartening therefore to hear just now so many Americans crying for guns and saying: "We do not want war, we do not intend war," just as though nations get what they want or intend. They get what they prepare for. In a crisis, our big army and navy, if created, will fall into the hands of the then dominant political party, into the hands of the most energetic group in that faction, into the hands of the most vigorous and ambitious individual in that group. The people will have nothing to say when the crucial hour arrives. Even the alleged rulers will have exceedingly little to say. It is the men who have been trained for war, who when the clock strikes, leap into the saddle, and drag the nation after them. That is what happened in Berlin in the feverish [Eighth Month] of 1914. William II is a man of unusual strength, but when the army chiefs all told him there must be no delay, the fateful ultimatum was sent, and the war was on!

Great armies and navies are of necessity the implacable foes of arbitral and judicial methods of settling international disputes. Militarists have scant patience with diplomatists who want to investigate and consider and reason. They do not care to untie knots, they prefer to cut them. In 1908, when Bosnia and Herzegovina were taken by Austria, there was no conference for discussion. Germany appeared in shining armor and the case was settled, not by reason, but by the army. Later on at Agadir, Great Britain appeared by the side of France in shining armor. The case was settled not by reason, but by the navy. It was those two settlements which unsettled the world. Big armaments shove reason aside and throw the purple over the shoulders of force. If you point a gun at me I cannot reason. I fall back on my primitive instincts. If I am strong, the tiger in me comes to the front, and I try to knock you over or tear you to pieces. If I am weak, the fox in me becomes dominant and I trick you if I can. Guns cut the nerves of arbitration. Diplomatic pressure (which means the pressure of sixteen-inch guns) is a kind of pressure that squeezes out the life of justice, and of liberty, and leaves nations irritated and revengeful.

Great armies and great navies are a deadening, blighting, intolerable curse. They are a nuisance and a menace, a plague and a scourge. The world cannot breathe freely until they are eliminated. International diplomacy cannot be sound so long as these excrescences exist. World finances cannot be normal until this incubus is thrown off. Our Christian ideals cannot be realized so long as Caesar sits on the throne of the world. The mailed fist is an enemy of Christ. Shining armor is an abomination to God. Hague Conferences will make tardy progress until we escape the domination of military-naval experts. Peace palaces are built in vain so long as competitive armaments surround them. The rights of humanity are never safe when propped up by huge engines of war. Great armaments must be gotten rid of. They will be, when the people decree it. It is for all who love mankind to proceed to organize the world. Our fathers organized thirteen commonwealths into a republic. The principle was sound, and the thirteen have increased to forty-eight. We must now help to organize the nations into a family to be governed by justice and liberty and goodwill. It is not for us to adopt the stupid European policy of armed peace, or to train every boy to shoot, which is the old Pequot ideal, or to give a new lease of life to a philosophy that is pagan and rotten; it is for us to bend all our energies at this crisis of history to the working out of a plan whereby the world's armaments shall be melted, and the streams of gold and brain energy now devoted to the multiplication of the instruments of blood, shall be consecrated to the creation of those constructive and beneficent agencies and institutions, which shall heal the running sores of the world, provide for its multitudinous and clamorous needs, and open the beautiful gates of a thousand years of peace.

AN HISTORIC YEARLY MEETING.

We had a very pleasant voyage to Falmouth, England. There were aboard the ship many Canadians, a few Englishmen and Americans, as well as citizens of Continental countries. The last twenty-four hours were quite exciting compared with many voyages I had previously made. The piles of life preservers on deck, the life boats prepared for instant service, the notices as to what we were to do in event of emergency, the disquieted nights and conversation naturally induced by the occasion all reminded us that we were in the war zone. No doubt our ship's company was very glad to find the Noordam safely anchored in Falmouth harbor. Not a few of us thought of the beautiful little English babies and children and the few infirm people who were with us on the ship.

In order to enter England under present conditions we were obliged to pass through the hands of the military authorities, the alien officials, the customs and the police. The whole involved nearly two days of tedious waiting, cross-examination and inspection, but I am happy to report that with one slight exception, all these gentlemen were exceedingly courteous and did everything to minimize the annoyances to which they were compelled to subject the strangers entering their land. Indeed, we have laughed over being compelled to so frequently visit the police in connection with establishing our identity, with respect to future travel in England, and have remarked that we have become quite accustomed to hanging around police stations. It is especially noticeable that as Americans we have been treated by the police officials with the greatest courtesy.

We reached London the day preceding Yearly Meeting, and effected a happy reunion with our son and daughter at Paddington station. They are subjects of George V, and we are citizens of the Great Republic; but family ties, as religious ties, are stronger than all others.

Devonshire House, in which the Yearly Meeting is held, has numerous rooms, many stairways and an infinite variety of corridors, many of which have few windows, and all centre about "the yard," which is the common meeting ground for friendly reunion and conversation. The 23rd ult. was devoted to two meetings for worship, morning and afternoon, in the large meeting-room. In these as well as at subsequent meetings, I have been impressed with the promptness with which Friends gather. These meetings for worship, called devotional meetings, were very solemn occasions. It was evident that in each of them, some effort had been made to control the messages, by previous consultation with Friends who felt they had something to offer. I have been informed that this has resulted from many testimonies being sometimes offered on such occasions which do not always seem to be in harmony with the time and place, so that our Friends feel that they are compelled to steer between two dangers and have taken a course which to them seems the best under the circumstances. Much of the ministry in these meetings was devoted to the affecting circumstances under which Friends gathered at this historical meeting. Some members are now in prison for conscience' sake—others are expecting to go there in a few days—under circumstances that have not been duplicated for more than 200 years. Those who referred to the question of their sufferings because they feel that they cannot indulge in war, or its spirit, did not in any instance speak a single word of criticism or bitterness regarding the law or the action of those who are prosecuting them. On the contrary, speaker after speaker appealed that the spirit of love might animate all Friends so perfectly that in their afflictions they may prove the efficacy and power of the spirit of love in Jesus Christ, which we profess and attempt to carry to the world. Full recognition of the difficulties faced by England to-day was granted, along with many expressions of forgiveness and a desire for the maintenance of a full allegiance to the teachings of Jesus Christ in the New Testament and in our own hearts.

The following day business meetings commenced, men and women meeting together. Five minutes before the beginning of each session, an electric bell is rung which can be heard all over the premises, and immediately everybody hurries into the large meeting-room. At the hour the Clerk calls out, "The cords are up," which means that the doors have been closed, or that large cords have been stretched across the entrances to the room, so that no one may enter. Immediately the company is introduced into a profound period of silent waiting upon God, sometimes broken by a few remarks, or a short prayer. At the conclusion of worship, the business is entered upon and people may thereafter come and go as they desire, although as a matter of fact there is very little interruption of this character.

Part of the opening session was devoted to the certificates of visiting ministers. There were only two visitors from America this year, and this was alluded to by numerous speakers. The following day, when the verbal summary of epistles from American Yearly Meetings was offered and considered, there were many kindly expressions regarding Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The writer gave a very short explanation regarding the reasons which many years ago induced our body to cease correspondence with other Yearly Meetings throughout the world. One Friend after another arose and expressed sympathy and interest in Philadelphia Friends. A recent visitor to America created some amusement by narrating how she had been favored to attend a tea meeting at "Fourth and Arch," where she was regaled with oysters and ice cream, asserting that in her English Quarterly Meeting Friends only aspired to ham sandwiches. It was very noticeable that members of London Yearly Meeting who have visited the United States and participated in some of the religious and social life of Philadelphia, particularly alluded to the hospitality they have received in that city.

The War Victims' Relief organized and carried on by London Yearly Meeting has been very great. Several hundred Friends are engaged in it, and up to the date of Yearly Meeting over $400,000 have been collected and applied to the relief of sufferers, principally in Belgium and France. Efforts are being made to extend operations into other countries, where destitution is even greater, but which are almost inaccessible to the English. There has been much house-building, supplying of beds and covers to men, women and children who have been exposed to the most dreadful conditions, besides a great deal of help connected with sending the afflicted or sick to places of safety. Indeed, the splendid work of this committee could not be depicted in even a long report.

The account of the Aliens' Emergency Relief was if anything more interesting. This committee has been charged with work among the many thousand Germans or other alien enemies who are confined in the detention camps in England. It has devoted much effort towards giving prisoners the opportunity of getting into touch with their families in distant lands. Not a few of these enemy aliens had resided for many years in England and were to all intents and purposes English citizens, except that they had never become naturalized. They have suddenly found themselves under the most trying conditions, arrested by the authorities, put into detention camps and have been separated from those they love. Their businesses have been destroyed, their families impoverished, and they and their families left among the sorrowful wrecks of the war. The government has been helpful in aiding the work of Friends, and giving them full opportunity to assist these unfortunate aliens.

The report of the Friends' Ambulance Unit revealed that at the present time there are over 800 engaged in it, and that thus far Friends have expended about $270,000 in this work. It is a portion of the Red Cross work, not under military supervision, yet as close thereto as Friends feel they can properly get. The work of this organization is found in removing the wounded from the battlefields, in assisting non-combatants and in doing whatever other service it may perform, which does not involve the implication of being engaged in the destruction of human life. Whilst this subject was under discussion, it was very evident that there was a latent feeling in the meeting that the recognition by the military authorities of the Friends' Ambulance Unit involved assistance to the army work, not quite consistent with the higher ideals held by Friends. For instance, the remark was made: "That it is a very neat way of helping the army." Others felt that it did not represent the concluded policy of the Yearly Meeting, and that whilst a report was made to the latter, it must not be considered that the Yearly Meeting as a body officially stood behind it. It would seem that this work carried with it great possibilities for mitigating human suffering, whilst giving many young Friends an opportunity to protest against taking human life. I find the British public very appreciative of the relief work of Friends.

During one of the discussions on some of these subjects, a Friend reminded the meeting that there had been very many changes in the matter of conscience during the last 250 years. Thus in the year 1675, a minute was recorded in England in which Friends were "advised against bone-lacing and to go into malting." Manufacturing malt and beer was considered a safe business compared with making bone-laces, which Friends of that day felt was ministering to human pride.

There were many meetings of committees and numerous reunions during Yearly Meeting week in London. It has been a great pleasure to attend the Annual Reunion of the Australasian Committee, made up of those interested in Friendly matters in Australia and New Zealand or who have visited those countries. Violet Hodgkin presided, and her admirable address was followed by little speeches from others who had recently returned from the Antipodes. We were glad to meet with Elizabeth B. Rutter, whom about one year ago we met in Wellington, New Zealand, and Alfred H. Brown, whom we parted from less than a year ago in Melbourne, Australia.

The meeting of the Historical Society was naturally interesting to those who enjoy such subjects. The address of the day was from the pen of the President, Isaac Sharpless, and was greatly appreciated by those present. Things Pennsylvania came to the front as a result of his contribution to the interests of the hour. It would be impossible to enter into a detailed account of the many activities of London Yearly Meeting. The most conspicuous subject was that of International Peace. Friends are having the sympathy of many people in England, but their trials are many in these terrible hours of war. The position of the United States with respect to American sympathy in the struggle is generally understood in this country.

THE GOING BY.

As I sit at my window,
I see them go by,
'Tis the Sabbath for worship,
The hour is nigh.

I muse as I watch them,
And wonder if they,
Each one in his going,
Is seeking God's way?

If their hope in the worship,
Is to find Him first there,
And sure as they gather,
He'll meet them in prayer.

Shut out from the gathering,
So weak and forlorn,
'Tis for me to remember,
Christ in me is born.

So let them pass by me,
My part is to know
I can worship the Father,
With no outward show.

Then, too, as I sit here,
And see them go by,
I can pray the dear Father,
And conquer my sigh.

I can ask He meet with them,
Each one feel Him near,
Be quickened and tendered,
With nothing to fear.

That the word, if there spoken,
Should cut to the quick,
And show a false resting,
Which makes the heart sick;

They may look at the Crucified,
Stricken for them,
And see in His teaching,
The Saviour of men.

Oh! the blessing of one-ness,
From age down to youth,
All seeking the fountain,
The source of all truth.

The type of this one-ness,
Vine and branch, I well know,
And with sap ever flowing
The branch can but grow.

A STRANGER'S COMMENTS.

CHAS. S. MACFARLAND.*

Ruskin once declared that humanity honored the soldier, "not because he goes forth to slay, but to be slain." The Quakers are, by virtue of the constitutional principles of their faith, prohibited from participating in war.

Over against their conscientious objection to war arise instincts of patriotism, defence, and their consciences are thus between conflicting senses of duty.

The issue has been met by one group of Friends in England in a manner which illustrates Ruskin's words.

*C. S. M. holds a position of great influence in the Federal Council of Churches in America, and upon his recent return from some of the European capitals urged upon this body the great work he feels it is called to.

Philip J. Baker, twenty-five years of age (son of Hon. J. Allen Baker, M. P., President of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches), an Oxford man, former President of the Oxford Union, and a world-famous athlete, not only at Oxford, but while also a student at Haverford College, Pa., with other virile young Friends, proposed the Friends' Ambulance Unit to solve this conflict of conscience and duty, his chief helpers being his wife and his brothers, Allen R. Baker, Joseph S. Baker, and Bevan B. Baker, with the well-known writer, George Macaulay Trevelyan, who became commandant, with Philip Baker as adjutant, and his wife as head matron of the hospital section.

The work of the Friends' Unit has become one of the institutions of the European war. It has secured the confidence and commendation of the military authorities of three countries, both in the field and at home. And it has gained its unique position among voluntary units by none of the usual social or influential channels. It has been assisted by no decorative or sensational personalities. It has hardly been mentioned in the press. On the contrary, it has had to make its way against the inevitable military understanding of principles such as prevent a large and conspicuous collection of strong young men from enlisting; against the jealousies of more socially prominent, but less well organized units; against the cold-shouldering and suspicion which must always surround the efforts of any non-military and philanthropic undertaking, strong enough to force its way into the atmosphere of fear, death and necessary disregard of individual suffering such as characterize a war zone; where civilization is dead, every motive is suspected, and men are but cunning to kill.

It has won its position by the courage, tact and patience of its officers in recognizing and seizing opportunities of service, and in establishing cordial relationships with officials of all classes and of three races, and by the discipline, good-will, self-abnegation and unwearying work of its young men.

On their way to Dunkirk, to constitute the Belgian unit, the first piece of work, crossing the Channel, was the manning of boats to save the crew of the torpedoed Hermes, in Tenth Month, 1914. At this time they numbered only forty-three workers, but they attended, redressed and assisted 1,250 men the first five days and nights.

Their next point was Ypres, where they organized a second hospital, the method being to find and care for places of the greatest need and neglect, and within a couple of months the staff grew to about 250 workers of all kinds for relief and restoration.

After the organization was established in what was left of Belgium and Northern France, the leaders moved on to Italy, and organized the Italian Unit. Many of them served entirely at their own expense as well as without pay.

The work is one of constant danger, driving cars over precipitous mountain roads by night, without lights; often running the gauntlet of shell-fire, sometimes with disaster, although thus far they have wonderfully escaped any serious losses.

In addition to the work of gathering up the wounded from the field, their care in the hospitals, the clothing and housing of refugees, provision is also made for religious service and spiritual ministration.

The staff at Dunkirk now consists of about 500 trained men and 40 women. There is a large fleet of motor ambulances and two ambulance trains. There are seven hospitals. The newer Italian Unit is also assuming large proportions.

Our brethren, the Quakers of England, have thus entered the war, not to take a single human life, but to save, and have vindicated their self-sacrificing sense of patriotic duty without violating their consciences or their religious faith.

AND take heed of that nature that would know more than God is willing to reveal; for you shall find that unwilling to obey what it knows. And take heed of that which desires to appear before men to be commended, for that seldom deserves praise of God. And let a godly conversation declare what is within.—JAMES NAYLER.

HARVESTS.

Among the green New England dales

I watched the mowers pass
Along the misty intervals

And through the meadow grass,
Making the bearded tassels writhe
Before the rhythmic, flashing scythe.

The earth and sky conspired to bless

That ancient, kindly toil,
And dignify with kingliness

Those masters of the soil,
Who labored in a peaceful scene,
With hearts so candid and serene.

But suddenly my whole heart yearned

To harvests far away,
Where mothers from their cradles turned,
With unskilled hands, unwonted pain,
To save the nation's standing grain.

For those who should have gathered in

The summer's bounteous yield
Were garnering the fruits of sin
On yet another field—

Were bringing in with bated breath
The dreadful harvest home of death.

—ODELL SHEPARD, in Youth's Companion.

JOHNNY AND THE SUGAR.—The first man to climb Mount McKinley, the highest mountain in America, was a missionary—Archdeacon Stuck, of the Alaska Mission. In telling of his feat, the missionary explorer also tells the story of Johnny, an Indian boy of sixteen. Johnny was an orphan taken from his dead mother's hut when he was only four years old, and brought up in the mission by a lady, a faithful worker whom all loved so much. At first the boy had no other name than Johnny. When he went to Nenana, to go to a regular school, he took an additional name, Johnny Fred—that is to say, Johnny, the son of Fred, after the fashion that has come in among the Alaskan Indians since the white men arrived.

When Archdeacon Stuck planned to climb Mount McKinley—only he prefers to call it by the old melodious Indian name of Denali—he needed two native boys to help with the dog teams, and he chose Johnny from among the Nenana boys to drive the missionary's own dog team, and very proud he was of his job. Six men and fourteen dogs, besides the two boys, made up the expedition.

When they came to the base of Denali, they camped there, and the other boy was sent back to Nenana with one of the dog teams. Johnny was kept, for it was necessary to have some one stay at this base camp and take care of the dogs and the supplies. Johnny seemed to be loyal and brave, so he was chosen—and we shall see whether he disappointed the explorers or not.

A great glacier, over eleven thousand feet high, stretched up the mountain, like an icy highway. Up this the dog team was taken, with supplies, and two camps were made, with supplies cached in each, so as to be ready when the climbers came down again. It looked easy to go up the glacier, but it really was very dangerous, for the ice was full of crevasses, and a single wrong step might send a man into an icy gulf hundreds of feet deep. So the men and dogs and Johnny went up carefully, foot by foot, marking their way with willow stakes stuck in the snow, so as to come back without danger along this safe route.

When the first load was hauled up to the very top of the glacier, they picked out a good camping-place, "cached" the supplies by finding a convenient hollow, packing the things in, and covering them with three little silk tents which they expected to carry higher on their next journey. Then two of the men did what many people think wrong nowadays, and many more think foolish—in this case, it certainly turned out to be both—they sat down and smoked their pipes before starting down for the next load. One of them threw away the match with which he lighted his pipe, and it fell upon the silk tents, and began to smolder quietly, so quietly that no one saw it.

Down the glacier the men and dogs and Johnny went, and up they came in four or five hours more, bringing another load. On the way up, at the turn where the little hollow came into view, they saw smoke ascending. They hastened their dogs, but in vain. By the time they reached the cache, tents and boxes and supplies were all gone. All the sugar for that camp, all the powdered milk, the baking powder, the dried fruit, the pilot bread, sixteen pairs of woolen socks, a lot of gloves and mittens, some heavy fur garments, and, saddest of all, thirty spools of camera film, were all destroyed. They went to work at once and made new tents out of sled covers, and cut and sewed mittens out of blankets. Fortunately, the milk chocolate and pemmican were on the second load. But there would be no bread henceforth, and worst of all, no sugar. Every Arctic explorer knows the value of sugar in the cold, and they had counted on having plenty of it. Now it was all gone. True, down at the base camp they had left a ration of everything for Johnny, but that was his, not theirs, and he had to live on it while they were gone.

So they sent Johnny and the dogs back to the base camp, to wait for their return in two weeks. Johnny would have to find game and kill it for the dogs, but there would be enough rations to keep him alive, as far as his own eating went. Johnny took the dogs down as the others started up from the glacier head. But instead of being two weeks on the mountain, the little party of climbers spent a month there. The ridge they expected to climb had been shattered by an earthquake, they found; and the weather became very bad. It was a difficult and dangerous month, and during the last two weeks of it they had the additional burden of worry over Johnny Fred. Had his rations held out? Could he find game in the bad weather? They came as hastily as possible down the mountain, after at last victoriously reaching the summit, and they took chances in coming down, far more than in going up, because of their anxiety about the Indian lad. When they reached the base camp, however, Johnny was waiting for them, well and happy. He had killed two caribou and two mountain sheep, dragged them to camp, skinned them, cut them up, cooked them, and fed both the dogs and himself comfortably. He was on a hill watching for the climbers, and ran to them, taking the pack off the tired shoulders of the missionary, and putting it on his strong young shoulders.

That was not the best part of his fidelity, though. Remember that he was only a boy, an Indian, as fond of good things to eat as any white boy could be; that he had been left alone for a month, had reason to feel, therefore, a bit neglected, and that the rations had been left especially for him. In spite of all that, Johnny Fred had put the sugar and milk in his own rations—the two especial luxuries—sternly aside, had not touched either, and had saved them for the others, that they might enjoy what they had been deprived of by their accident at the upper camp! How many boys of sixteen would be likely to do as unselfish and thoughtful thing as that?

The missionary had brought down a piece of granite from the highest point where rock is seen on the great snowy peak, and when he returned to civilization he had a jeweler make a scarf-pin out of it for each of the men who had climbed Denali. But his own scarf-pin he did not keep—he presented it, with ceremony, to Johnny Fred, as the one who had a right to wear it.—WILLIAM RITTENHOUSE, in Forward.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The following extracts from a letter to Wm. C. Allen, from his friend Edwin Coventry, of British Columbia, recite conditions to which many of our readers are not strangers.—Ems.

"Thyself will be pleased to know that shortly after your visit in 1912, British Columbia Quarterly Meeting came into being, it being comprised of the two Monthly Meetings in Victoria and Vancouver. Last year these were added to by the coming in of the established meeting at Calgary, Alberta, so now we are three Monthly Meetings. As you know, we are part of Canada (Orthodox) Yearly Meeting, and although in Ontario they have the pastoral system in some meetings, each Monthly Meeting has full control over its own methods of procedure and in its form of conducting meetings. All the meetings in our Quarterly Meeting hold their meetings for worship after the manner of Friends as in Great Britain (and I suppose much like Philadelphia), and there is no sign or inclination of any change being made in that regard, and I do not think there is any likelihood of any being made. Occasionally we have interchange of visits with the Puget Sound Meetings, belonging to Indiana Yearly Meeting (although I think they will shortly join up with Oregon Yearly Meeting instead). We like this interchange of visits, which seem to be appreciated by both sides, but we could not fall in with a suggestion that was made about 1913, to join with them in forming a new Yearly Meeting for the Northwest. While we admire their zeal and have a good deal to learn from them in that matter, we feel that their methods are too far removed from the Quaker ideal for us to assimilate in partnership, and as their numbers are about ten times greater than ours, there would be also a real danger of our losing what we thus far very much cherish, and I hope always will. We believe we will be able to mutually help each other by keeping "as we are." Early in 1913, Friends in Victoria started building a meeting-house, and we met in it for the first time in Fifth Month that year, and it is our home since. A considerable proportion of the cost was subscribed in England. Unfortunately, just at the time of beginning to build, the financial depression set in over the west, and it was subsequently augmented by the war breaking out, consequently a good deal of money that was practically promised us was not forthcoming. We raised a mortgage of $2500 at 8 per cent. This mortgage matured last month. In the "nick of time" we managed to get a loan for the same amount from a Friend in England, but at 4 per cent., instead of 8 per cent., and with the saving in interest thus effected, we can see our way I think, even despite the hard times and our at present reduced membership, to pass through these times to clearer waters ahead. We are indebted to our Treasurer for about $100 and now think that will be the extent. As our Treasurer remarked at last Monthly Meeting, 'it was wonderful how our Father had opened the way' not once, but many times, when funds were badly needed. As said above, I am thankful that we now see clearer times ahead, and with the good times coming by and by, as we all hope and think they will do, Friends will be able to take a more forward move and activity than hitherto we have felt able to do. It has been a case of holding the fort, and there has always been a band of a few faithful ones, who were 'always there.'

"Thus far it has been found sufficient to hold the Quarterly Meeting twice yearly. The Tenth Month Meeting is held in Victoria. We have seventy-five members of this Monthly Meeting. More than half of these reside in parts remote from Victoria and so they are not often able to be at the meeting. We do not get many visitors these times, so we have not the advantage of 'interchange' of visits which meetings settled near each other do. From your side of the line the Friends who have been here include Allan Jay, Joel Bean, Lydia Cox, Charles Tebbetts, Robert Pretlow, Levi Pennington, thyself and wife, Joseph Elkinton. From overseas we have had John Ashworth, Charles Jacob, Allan Rowntree, Joseph Cheal, Arthur and Eliza Dann. The last few months we have had a few inquirers from outside and from members of other religious bodies, who have felt drawn to seek Friends on account of their dissatisfaction with what they have heard and been taught from pulpits on the war, 'recruiting stations' one lady called them. Last Monthly Meeting we admitted into membership one such inquirer, who is now evidently a true Friend.

"We should very much like some peace literature, and I should be very much obliged if some could be sent here. If I am right I believe that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has an assortment of a few booklets and leaflets. We had a quantity a year or two back from one or two Peace Societies on the Pacific Coast. It is not more of these, but of distinctively Friends' publications that we are in need of now.

"One of our active Peace Friends, James Cass, we lost by death a couple of months ago. He was Secretary of the Western Canada Peace Society. We feel his loss keenly, and he was a help in the ministry and in other ways."

"Sincerely,
EDWIN COVENTRY."

"Victoria Local Council of Women recently passed a resolution asking that compulsory military training in schools be inaugurated. It is evident there is to be a hard row to hoe in Canada for peace advocates, and it is rather an eye-opener to find women advocating a measure of militarism!"

NEWS ITEMS.

NOTES FROM N. Y. YEARLY MEETING.—New York Yearly Meeting met in its 221st Annual Session at Poughkeepsie, New York, on Fifth Month 31st: The meeting of Ministry and Oversight had held its sessions on the previous day, and an unusually large and attentive gathering met for the opening minute at ten o'clock on the last day of the Fifth Month.

The Poughkeepsie Meeting-house is beautiful, though not exactly after the ancient usage of Friends. It is possible that it was more appreciated on this account.

The reading of the London General Epistle for 1915 and the receipt of a cablegram from London Yearly Meeting, then in session, brought the Meeting very close to English Friends.

James Wood was chosen Clerk and Eleanor W. Taber and L. Hollingsworth Wood were chosen Assistant Clerks.

In the midst of the afternoon session on Fourth-day, a delegation of five Friends was announced from the Yearly Meeting of the other branch of Friends, which holds its sessions at Fifteenth Street in New York. They presented their concern for a better co-operation in our work in peace and philanthropy, and the meeting unanimously accepted their proposition for the appointment of a Joint Committee.

The report of the Joint Committee on Peace spoke of the work done in connection with the Constitutional Convention, which met last Summer to frame a new Constitution for the State of New York, in which they had endeavored to have written a clause exempting from military service the conscientious objectors such as those of the members of the Society of Friends. The report presented a copy of the brief which they had submitted on the subject.

On Fifth-day morning, Lettice Jowett and Septimus Marten from London Yearly Meeting, gave the illustrations to accompany the reading of the London Special Epistle. They spoke of the work for the "alien enemies" interned in camps in England, and the reconstruction work in Northern France which Friends are so heroically doing. The meeting appointed a Committee to present this work of English Friends in subordinate meetings of the Yearly Meeting, the committee to continue its service not only until the war is over, but until normal conditions of living are resumed.

An afternoon session was devoted to the missionary interests of the Society with stirring addresses by Edgar T. Hole on work in Africa, and by Alfred J. Griffen, the colored principal of the Yearly Meeting School at High Point, North Carolina.

On Fifth-day evening, the Temperance Committee made its report with the reading of the prize essays from an essay contest on temperance topics held at the Yearly Meeting School, Oakwood Seminary, and the progress of temperance work in the State was ably described by a representative of the Anti-Saloon League.

On Sixth-day morning, the business meeting of the corporation met and presented the report of the trustees who have charge of $193,110 of invested funds, in addition to some real property, and also presented the report of the trustees of the Murray Fund, who have charge of invested funds in the amount of $77,067.10. Most of these funds have been left to the Yearly Meeting by will, the income to be used for specific purposes directed by the donors.

The report of the Joint Committee on Records of the two Yearly Meetings in the State of New York was read and showed that there had been collected, tabulated and deposited in fireproof safes, 1356 volumes of records together with a quantity of old manuscripts which have not yet been assorted.

The statistics of the Yearly Meeting were also presented, showing a total number of members of 3724, of whom 2055 are female and 1669 are male, a gain of fifty over the totals given last year. The number of members in colleges was 29, in school 497, and 7 members are at work as missionaries in foreign lands.

The closing minute was read after the First-day evening service with the joint expression that this had been one of the most favored Yearly Meetings in the long history of New York. Friends had seemed able and willing to differ in sweeter spirit.

The passage of laws by the Legislature of the State of New York providing for military training in schools and for the registration of all males between the ages of nineteen and forty-five in the militia reserve had brought home to Friends the possibility of that bond which comes from suffering for conscience' sake, and the meeting felt very close to the sufferings of English Friends as they contemplated the possible approach of similar service in our own State.

The hospitality of Poughkeepsie Friends had been greatly enjoyed and Friends departed from the sessions of the meeting greatly helped and comforted by their sojourn together. The devotional exercises had been times of real spiritual refreshing and the religious note had been present in the consideration of all the business which had come before the meeting.

On the 27th of Fifth Month a disastrous fire occurred at Penn College, Okla. La., Iowa.

Serious as was the fire in point of dollars and cents, the saddest feature was the loss of life.

Robert H. Williams, business agent of the college, and a Freshman, in their efforts to save valuable papers, tarried too long and the falling walls crushed them.

The fire is supposed to have begun in the chemical laboratory near the top of the main building, from whence creeping slowly down it had gotten beyond possible control before it was discovered.

The main building of the college became almost a complete wreck and the loss is a heavy one. The valuation placed upon it was about $75,000, the collectable insurance being $22,000. Some of the professors lost their private libraries and valuable collections of apparatus, etc., which were in their class-rooms and which could not be reached. Most of the college records and the college library were saved, being more accessible to safe places of exit.

Friends of the college are already active in the interests of the future. The importance of Penn to the community can scarcely be estimated, and active canvas for funds with which to rebuild will soon be begun.

In pursuance of a minute of approval from his Monthly Meeting, Zebede Haines was at the meeting in Tuckerton on First-day the 25th, and had an appointed meeting at Barnegat that afternoon. Although rainy there was a good attendance, and both occasions were signally owned.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Reports received by the General Committee on the Armenian situation indicate that upward of $36,000 has been contributed by Philadelphians to aid the Armenian refugees in Asia Minor. Bishop Rhineland is chairman of the Philadelphia Committee.

One million dollars is given to charity by the will of Charles W. Kolb. The testator, who lived at 405 Gowen Avenue, and who was vice president of the Kolb Baking Company, left an estate of approximately $2,000,000.

GENERAL.—President Wilson has called out the militia of every state for service on the Mexican border. In announcing the President's decision at Washington, Secretary Baker said the militia will be sent to the border wherever and as fully as General Funston determines them to be needed. Brigadier-General Alfred Mills estimated the minimum militia forces to be called out to be 145,000 men.

Civil War prices for drugs have been exceeded by present figures, and the rise will continue indefinitely, according to Charles E. Vanderkleed, chairman of the Drugs Committee, at the second day's session of the Pennsylvania Pharmaceutical Association. "The cost of medicine is higher than the cost of living," he said, "and only the rich man can afford the luxury of illness. The war in Europe is the cause."

Manhattan Borough is to have this summer 100 park playgrounds, eight recreation piers, 12 swimming pools and several thousand shower-baths. The pavement and fire-escape have lost their former near-monopoly as breathing places in the big city but after all only a beginning has been made toward the better conditions.

There is less vice in New York now than at any time in the last decade, according to social welfare organizations and the police. Those who share in this opinion include the Bureau of Social Hygiene, the committee of 14, and Secretary Summer of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, who succeeded the late Anthony Comstock.

The Independent says: "The two great political parties in convention assembled have declared for woman suffrage. This will stand as one of the most important milestones on the road to full democracy. With the political parties for it, who that counts politically can be against it?"

Yale University is to have a woman on its staff of lecturers next year for the first time. Dr. Rhoda Erdmann has been appointed lecturer in biology in the graduate school for 1916-17. Dr. Erdmann is a German woman, who for the past three years has been holder of a Theresa Seessel research fellowship.

Mareoni's announcement that he has found a way to eliminate risk of collision in fog will be received with respect because of its source. Many devices of that sort have been invented and one of the most promising, announced since the war began, has apparently not yet had a practical test.

The following is also from The Independent: "The whole American people will rejoice that, under its decision last week, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York has left very little of the indictment against Thomas Mott Osborne, former warden of Sing Sing prison. It has reduced it to the simple charge of neglect of duty, whatever that may mean. Thus the whole legal campaign against the greatest prison reformer of modern times collapses."

FOREIGN.—Because of financial stringency, China has been compelled to recall from Japan about 2000 students whom the Chinese Government was maintaining there in various schools. Several months ago these students began complaining that their allowances were reduced or entirely cut off. They protested to the Chinese minister in Tokyo, who negotiated funds to take many of the students back to China.

Schools and hospitals owned and conducted by the American Board of Foreign Missions at Marsovan and Sivas, Turkey, valued at more than $500,000, have been commandeered by the Turks, and the missionaries in charge compelled to abandon their work there, according to Americans who have arrived from the Orient.

Canada reports a rather alarming decrease in the acreage of its wheat and other crops. According to the government estimate, 11,491,600 acres are sown to wheat this year, or 1,494,500 (11.5 per cent.) less than last year. The acreage of oats shows a decline of 7.6 per cent. and other crops are also reduced. The late spring and heavy rains seem to be responsible for the decline, rather than any lack of industry or funds on the part of farmers.

Lieutenant-General Count Helmuth von Moltke, chief of the supplementary general staff of the army, died of heart apoplexy during a service of mourning in the Reichstag for the late Field Marshal von der Goltz, says a Berlin telegram. General von Moltke was head of the German army at the outbreak of the war.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

We promised in our last issue a report of the proceedings of the late session of London Yearly Meeting. The paper by W. C. Allen in last number has brought the request already for a fuller account and so much satisfaction was expressed with the lengthy reprint of last year's report in THE FRIEND a year ago, that we are following the course inaugurated then and are printing copiously from the reports as given in two recent issues of The Friend (London).

In conversation with a close reader of THE FRIEND a few days since, when asked whether he had followed the proceedings of London Yearly Meeting this year, he answered, "I expect you to cull from printed reports what will be most informing to me and I await your account in the columns of THE FRIEND."

We have read The Friend (London) from the first page to the last and have felt there was nothing that we cared to omit, as far as our own personal interest was concerned, we have, however, omitted much, in fact far more than we have inserted, but with the selections that will appear in this and the next two issues, we believe we shall have given our readers a fair picture of the proceedings of what must be regarded historically as one of the most memorable sittings of London Yearly Meeting since the days of her infancy.

The Epistle of the late session of London Yearly Meeting is a unique appeal, but with what seems to us a prophetic fervor. We have printed it in full. Other points gleaned from the reported proceedings have outstanding features that we believe will appeal to our readers.

EDITORS.

The Yearly Meeting of 1916 has been marked by a spirit of earnest expectancy. There has been an indefinable feeling that some further revelation of God's will would be manifested. This note was struck in the Swarthmore Lecture, which again formed an admirable preface to the Yearly Meeting itself. Towards the close of the lecture Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin quoted the following lines:

"Surely He cometh, and a thousand voices
Call to the saints, and to the deaf are dumb;
Surely He cometh, and the earth rejoices,
Glad in His coming, who hath sworn, I come."

In the Yearly Meeting itself, speaking of the invitation to pass through "the open door," the Clerk said that most likely the way would lead through suffering, reproach and misunderstanding, but he reminded us that when Jesus Christ saw an open door He saw through it a cross and chose it, despising the shame. In contrast with the dark picture of the state of the Ephesians to whom Paul wrote, he put the words, "But God," throughout history these two words had stood as a bulwark. Resting on them, might we be strong to enter through the open door.

The opening time of devotion was full of solemnity and instinct with sympathy for the young men enduring much suffering in prison for conscience' sake. Our thoughts were led, too, to the great volume of suffering on the battlefield, and we were called to agonize over the great orgy of hate which is causing it. Glad witness was borne to the fact that even through the suffering, Christ was being made real as never before to some of those called to suffer shame for His name.

On several occasions the meeting-house has been so crowded that Friends have not all been able to find seats. We have, however, missed many of the young men who were with us at the special session, and women are again in a majority. The Clerks are the same as in the last two Yearly Meetings, viz: John Henry Barlow, Clerk, with Roger Clark and Edith J. Wilson as Assistants.

At the opening session the Clerk welcomed on behalf of the Meeting William C. Allen, of San José, California, but still a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. He is accompanied by his wife. Several Friends who had enjoyed hospitality in W. C. Allen's home joined in expressions of greeting; and A. Warburton Davidson (recently home from China) said that he had met Chinese students who had been much impressed by addresses on Peace delivered by our Friend during his recent visit in China. W. C. Allen assured us that the word of love incorporated with the minute from Philadelphia was no idle message, but came from the heart of the Yearly Meeting. He did not expect to have large service in this country.

The Yearly Meeting of Friends, by its very constitution, is at once the easiest and the most difficult of assemblies to guide—difficult because of the need for combining sufficient and necessary pre-arrangement with the freedom of spontaneity, easy because of possessing the power to be ruled absolutely by the immediate sense of the Divine Presence. Though our methods may be democratic, we still claim to be what the late J. Bevan Braithwaite so frequently reminded us we should be, not a democracy but a theocracy. All too often this high claim is waived, and the programme previously prepared is adhered to when another course might have led us further and deeper. This year, when we were brought into deep places in regard to the imperfections of our witness for Peace, it was obvious that the subject could not be adequately dealt with at that time. It was therefore arranged to continue the considerations arising out of the Peace Committee's report and the minutes from two Quarterly Meetings next morning; and later, as more time was still wanted, to omit the usual meetings for worship. It is not discussion alone that can help us.

The query was raised one morning, "Has the Society of Friends lost its genius for silent waiting?" The answer was thankfully proved to be in the negative when the great assembly settled down at once into a stillness that could be felt. And from the stillness voices were raised in confession of our unbelief, of our sense of our own importance, of our love of a good reputation, of our shrinking back when we have seen a glimmering of what we might do. But though afterwards various suggestions for action were made, it was clear that as a whole we were not yet ready to be used. We ourselves had failed so often and so badly in our witness to the power of love that we could not be entrusted at this time of the world's need with a large corporate service. So at any rate it seemed when the subject stood adjourned over the week-end.

A large place in the Yearly Meeting was devoted to the interests of the children and young people, two whole sittings on the first day being given up to the subject of "War and the Children." As the subject was opened up in its various aspects, it became more and more evident, that even in our favored land, which has been scarcely touched by the hand of the invader, the ill results of the war on child life are definite.

The discussion on Preparation for Permanent Universal Peace and questions relating thereto seemed to suffer to some extent from being taken at three different times, the second instalment being separated from the first by two sessions, and the third being separated from the second by three whole days. If the consideration could have been continued from session to session, probably some more definite conclusion would have been reached. This plan would have had the advantage of the same Friends being present all the time.

The principal decision, as the outcome of the lengthened deliberations, was the reference to the Meeting for Sufferings of the proposal for a World Conference of Friends on the way to permanent universal peace, with the request to consider how far such proposal was desirable and practical, and if concluded to be so, with power to take steps to carry it out. Such a Conference might, of course, be before or after the conclusion of the war, and in this country or on the other side of the Atlantic. Somewhat less concrete was the reference to the Committee on War and the Social Order of the wide subject of the application of "the principles we enunciate in regard to war between nations," in "all our relations in daily life." It is hoped that the Committee will provide for the introduction of that subject at the proposed Autumn Conference on Social Questions. Last of all was a general minute emphasizing our position as Seekers in a great Quest, with a willingness to be used as the Spirit of God may lead.

An important constitutional point was raised in the afternoon by Dr. Silvanus P. Thompson. He called attention to a remark which had been made during the Yearly Meeting to the effect that this meeting was only a small part of the Society and therefore, being a minority of the members, it did not really represent Friends. Dr. Thompson pointed out that as the meeting was largely constituted of representatives from all the Quarterly Meetings, it could not rightly be called a minority. The Clerk thanked Dr. Thompson for calling attention to this matter, he had not noticed the remark when made or he would himself have pointed out that the Yearly Meeting, being the representative body of the Society of Friends, spoke with authority for the whole Society.

Not for two hundred years had the Yearly Meeting met under circumstances of such grave concern as those arising from the operations of the Military Service Act and the Defence of the Realm Act. About twenty of our members and attenders were in prison, at least two of whom had been sent to France for punishment; on the second day of the Yearly Meeting Rosa Hobhouse was sentenced at Northampton with her companion to a fine of £50 or three months' imprisonment in the second division, for spreading statements said to be prejudicial to recruiting. They are both serving their sentence.

There were few occasions in this most strenuous of Yearly Meetings in which the relief of a laugh was admissible. One such came, however, in the course of William C. Braithwaite's report of the work of the Friends' Ambulance Unit, when he was describing the operations of the Aide Civile Belge (now largely taken over by Belgian ladies). This includes the management of a considerable lace-making industry for the dispossessed Belgian workers. It is understood that this industry has caused some heart-searching among those who at home are urged to renounce all luxuries and who cannot therefore buy lace without questioning even when it has been made by a refugee. William C. Braithwaite did not attempt a solution of this economic perplexity, but rather intensified it by showing from his antiquarian researches into the minute books of Berks and Oxon and Buckinghamshire that many warnings had been given in the seventeenth century against Friends making bone lace, one such delinquent being urged instead to go into the malting business. Now, said the speaker, the position is reversed, Friends renounce malting but encourage lace-making.

Thirteen testimonies concerning deceased Friends were presented. These relate to Mary Ann Cash, of Coventry, Richard Ercoyd Clark, of Doncaster, Mary Lampley Cooke, of Wandsworth, Charles B. Cox, of Tivetshall, Richard Reynolds Fox, of Plymouth, Priscilla Hack, of Brighton, Hannah Maria Headley, of Ashford, Annie Neave, of Bollington, Thomas P. Newman, of Haslemere, John Sadler, of High-flatts, Henry Southall, of Ross, John Tertius Southall, of Ross, and Richard Westlake, of Southampton. Unfortunately time did not permit of the reading of any of these testimonies, but they will appear in the printed Proceedings, where many Friends will be glad to have the opportunity of reading them at leisure.

Three phrases have been in frequent use during the Yearly Meeting. These are "the underlying unity," "the open door," and "the present opportunity." Together they convey one of the great messages of what has been to many a wonderful time. The thought of the underlying unity was emphasized by Anne Warner Marsh in the opening session, and has run as a golden clue through many subsequent sessions. It is an invisible spiritual unity, which lies deep down below our superficial differences. The open doors are many; fresh ones were discovered at almost every session, especially perhaps when we were discussing War and the Social Order. The present opportunity is also a great one, so great in fact that in our own strength we feel utterly unable to seize it. We were reminded that man's necessity is God's opportunity, and that through the open door Christ saw a Cross. Realizing the underlying unity, may we pass through the open door and seize the present opportunity.

It was a great advantage to the Yearly Meeting to have the presence during the educational sessions of Charles Tipper, Inspector of Schools under the Westmoreland County Council, who from a somewhat fresh standpoint contributed to the discussions. Speaking on the influence of the war on the moral standards of children, he showed how the administration of our education laws was tending to encourage the thought—already very common with children—that nothing mattered but the winning of the war; tasks that could be set aside so lightly in order for the children to be sent on the land need not, they thought, be well done. Dimly, C. Tipper said, all educationists were converging to one point, "Give a child experience first and lead up to theories." How this principle can be applied to experience in religious matters was an unanswered query upon which Friends were left to ponder.

One Friend suggested that one of the greatest contributions Friends could give to the country at the present time would be a reaffirmation of their belief in the value of a good education. The country is suffering from limited views as to education. The importance of associating the work of hand and brain is not yet sufficiently realized, but true education should include training in craftsmanship.

Fourth-day, Twenty-fourth of Fifth Month.

The Yearly Meeting opened with a devotional period of some length. Though at the commencement there were vacant seats in the gallery, most of these were occupied on the start of business.

J. B. BRAITHEWAITE quoted the words, "Let us labor therefore for an inward stillness."

W. BLAIR NEATBY regarded the present time as one in which our Lord was being severely tried anew. We were called to enter into a living sympathy with Christ and with suffering humanity. Many Friends might be called to follow their former comrades in public testimony and possibly in suffering for Christ's sake, and he would therefore appeal to Friends to seek afresh the place of prayer in that Yearly Meeting.

The opening subject was "The Underlying Unity."

ANNE WARNER MARSH, in the absence of Joan M. Fry, opened the subject of the underlying unity. The unity referred to, she said, was spiritual and invisible, but it was also spiritual and reliable. She sympathized greatly with the remarks of the Clerk on our present situation. The issues were so tremendous that Friends often forgot that there were others who were equally strong in what they held to be right. If the Society were to take its proper place in this crisis, it must bear witness, through its activities, to the great underlying unity. She felt, however, that these activities and the varieties of feeling they represented could not carry us far without experience of the depths of spiritual feeling. However excellent were these activities, if they were not rooted in the Spirit, they would fail. Through the cup of suffering now handed to the Society, she believed would come a sense of the deeper and inner unity. That great unity depended on its diversity. Looking to the efforts of the various churches, she believed there was coming into view some great end of underlying unity. To those outside, as well as to ourselves, there came the call to discover for ourselves our contribution towards such a unity and that could only be brought about through Christian spiritual experience. The present unity in adversity must convince us that God was in the experience, and this unity was found in the brotherhood of the human race. Might it not be that this very crisis was to make us aware of the diversities which existed amongst us and other contributions, including the sufferings for conscience' sake, which went to make up the essential unity? Surely even from the fighting line itself there would come some such note, and men who had seen hell let loose would return with new and higher ideas and ideals. Somewhere, even in those dark places, was God, who seemed out of sight; but we could not reflect for a moment without knowing for a certainty that God was with us and was going to reconcile the world unto Himself. The dangers for Friends were many just now. We must get deeper. There was some lost note somewhere, but she felt convinced of the absolute presence and purpose of God. Though the world might wreck itself upon the present rocks, there was "But God," and she hoped Friends would strike some note of hope and cheer, though that was not easy; but she believed that God was greater than all these things, and that His purpose was absolute and sure. There were places in the early church which were wanting in that grace, followed by complications, but Christ Himself was not divided. We had now come to a page in our history where these diversities were written large, but they would, she believed, be followed by the more wonderful position in which the Church of Christ would stand, more steadfast than ever before. She hoped the Society would gladly embrace this underlying, invisible, spiritual unity, for its own good and the good of the world.

HERBERT I. WALLER remarked that the subject of discussion was unity not of opinion, but of experience. Only when we came to a common experience could we enter into full association with others. We must enter into unity through the suffering in the battlefield, as well as at home, the suffering for conscience' sake, and experience in the relief of distress. In all these circumstances, to faithful souls, surely there were coming the stigmata of the Divine. Mankind's progress came through suffering; without it there was no life or progress.

HENRY T. HODGKIN recalled a little gathering at Constance at the outbreak of the war, when they came through the experience of meeting different people who were to be ranged on different sides in the war. Even then they felt there was a unity among them. He had also been one of a small number who at the beginning of the war entered upon the publication of "Papers for War Time," the idea of which was to express the unity of Christian people and some of the sentiments which should prevail at such a time. Unfortunately that small body had to separate, and work out their views in their own way. He was lately at a small conference of the Anglican communion in connection with the National Mission of Repentance and Hope, and found it the occasion of an impressive demonstration of unity in action. It was remarkable that members of the Church of England should call a conference in which they strongly criticised their own church. There was discovered much existing unity. At the present time Friends were forced into an attitude of difference with other Christians. But Friends could not speak effectively unless we came to the conclusion that other people needed us as well as we them, and that we must work together for the Kingdom of God. These men and women were one with Friends. As it had been said in the conference referred to, while there were differences, the unity of the body of Jesus Christ had never been broken. With our brethren, from whom we sometimes differed, we were one in the spirit.

WILLIAM E. WILSON agreed. It might be asked, he said, could there be unity between those on one side who said that this was a holy war, and those on the other who said that war was of the devil? There might be Christian feeling on both sides, but he did not see how we could say there was unity respecting what was being done by the first named and that which we thought right. Let Friends remember that on one point there was practical unity—namely, that this was a war to end war, and to bring about a permanent peace. Probably the vast majority of those Christians were fighting with the single-hearted purpose of ending war. He believed they were mistaken, but that such were their intention and belief. We could, however, do no good in a spirit of self-righteousness.

Fourth-day Afternoon.

The question of "War and the Children" had been considered by the Friends' First-day School Association and this minute forwarded.

We must let the boys and girls see that hatred is the offspring of fear, and that true courage is born of love. . . . The hope that the nations may learn the true way of peace really depends on the training of the children.

MAURICE WHITLOW had been asked to open the general subject. He said there had been four main sources of information from which his facts had been gathered: (1) The children all over the country, who in nearly 40,000 instances had written short essays on their War Time ideas; (2) schoolmasters and teachers from all manner of schools; (3) First-day school workers and social enthusiasts; and (4) newspaper cuttings.

The same influences which had called forth the noblest and highest instincts in the child had also led to a serious number of juvenile misdemeanors. The instincts most immediately concerned were stirred into action by strong doses, repeated at frequent intervals, of perfervid emotionalism. The effect, at any rate, during the first twelve or eighteen months of the war was amazing. School prizes were surrendered, hundreds of thousands of glass bottles collected, scores of tons of old newspapers harvested, and enough woolsen muffers knitted to warm half-a-dozen army corps. But the reaction was inevitable. The headmaster of a notable grammar school wrote, in reference to a serious drop in the standard of school discipline, "another contributory cause may have been the injudicious appeal to boys' sentiment. . . . We sent considerable sums to various war charities, but it would have been pleasant to find that there was no less zeal in performing 'the trivial round, the common task.'" From another source, equally enthusiastic about the boys, came one line, in the midst of much praise—"There have been more cases of truancy than ever before."

The appeal to force in national affairs had had its reaction, in some measure, at home. A headmaster told of two cases of violent assault, between boys during term, though he did not feel clear whether the incidents had any connection with the war or not. But it was notable that there had been a very serious rise in the charges against boys for violent assaults during the past eighteen months.

On the religious and moral side the spirit of self-sacrifice, a sense of responsibility, an acceptance of inconvenience, and a desire to serve had been expressed; while on the other side were seen bitterness against enemies (much lessened during the past eight months); an unsettled state of mind, rising from a desire to do something that can be seen and an impatience with mere study when compared with khaki or red-cross work; a sense of unfairness somewhere, prices of food rising, privileged people staying at home, poorer people sent off to the war, etc.; and a loss of discipline, owing to unwonted prosperity and the relaxation of home restrictions. M. Whitlow quoted from the annual report of the Headmaster of King Alfred School, Hampstead, who, speaking of the spiritual loss to the school during the war, said:—"I cannot but feel that this war, which seems but a pitiless mockery of nearly every ideal the school stands for, must already have troubled their growing sense of the significance of justice and kindness in human affairs."

ON THE INFAMY OF WAR.*

They err, who count it glorious to subdue
By conquest far and wide, to overrun
Large countries, and in field great battles win,
Great cities by assault; What do these worthies
But rob and spoil, burn, slaughter, and enslave
Peaceable nations, neighboring or remote,
Made captive, yet deserving freedom more
Than those their conquerors, who leave behind
Nothing but ruin wheresoe'er they rove,
And all the flourishing works of peace destroy;
Then swell with pride and must be titled gods,
Great benefactors of mankind, deliverers,
Worshipped with temple, priest, and sacrifice.
One is the son of Jove, of Mars the other;
Till conqueror Death discovers them scarce men,
Rolling in brutish vices, and deformed,
Violent or shameful death their due reward.
But if there be in glory aught of good,
It may by means far different be attained,
Without ambition, war or violence;
By deeds of peace, by wisdom eminent,
By patience, temperance.

RECOLLECTIONS OF JOHN PEASE.

A sermon of John Pease, preached in the Friends' Meeting-house on S. Twelfth Street the week of Yearly Meeting, 1845, was published in THE FRIEND a few weeks ago. Its issuance at that time has called forth expressions of satisfaction from many and various quarters.

Very few Friends who attended the meeting alluded to are now living, but Joshua L. Baily, under date of Sixth Month 9th, writes us concerning it as follows:—

I was present at the meeting and it may be of interest to thee to know that the sermon was written out from memory by my late aunt, Susan H. Lloyd, and myself, each of us writing separately, and on bringing the papers together and comparing them they were found to be in substantial agreement, and in the very words as uttered by the preacher and without using any language of our own. It did not comprehend the entire sermon as there were a few portions—brief ones, however, and by no means necessary for continuous effect—as to which we were not sufficiently certain as to warrant our inserting them. As prepared by my aunt and myself, it was shown to two or three other persons who were present, by whom its accuracy was fully endorsed. The manuscript as prepared by us is in my possession; a copy thereof was sent to the wife of John Pease and a few other copies (I am sure it was only a few) were made, but how it ever got into print I am entirely unable to account for.

I have a very distinct recollection of John Pease; I heard him preach a number of times, especially at the evening meetings held at Arch Street. He made his home with M. C. Cope who lived on the opposite side of the street to my mother, and he was a neighborly visitor at our house and frequently took meals with us. I remember his manner of speaking and especially his voice, which was never loud but was sweet, clear, almost melodious, and, without apparent effort, was distinctly heard throughout the house. In his own land he was known as "The Silver Trumpet," a designation which was also justly accorded him during his tarryings in America.

Thy friend truly,
JOSHUA L. BAILY.

The sermon of J. P. as it came to the office of THE FRIEND a few weeks before its recent publication by us was printed in tract form, but the copy used by us is the only copy of which we have knowledge and was at one time in the custody of the late Dr. Warrington, of Mostertown, N. J.

J. L. B. further writes:—

I am going to send thee herein an exact copy of remarks made by J. P. at the house of M. C. Cope on the evening following the day on which the sermon was preached, and I think this was the day preceeding his leaving Philadelphia to sail for home.

I will also enclose a copy of verses written by the wife of John Pease and placed in his carpet-bag before sailing for America.

In further commenting on his recollection of J. P., Joshua L. Baily writes:—

I will only add that the printed sermon referred to made such a profound impression on me that parts of it come frequently unbidden to my mind, and I seem to have before me, as clearly as if it were yesterday, the preacher standing in the gallery of Twelfth Street Meeting-house, occasionally leaning forward as though he wanted to get nearer to his audience, just as he did on the occasion of this sermon, extending his right hand and turning his eyes to the rear of the building where a considerable number of young people were sitting, and addressing them with fervent emphasis in the words which memory has revived: "Thou visited young man, thou precious visited young woman, what is that little idol which lies lurking in thy heart?" and especially do I remember how his countenance seemed to be illuminated as he broke forth with the exclamation—"Oh! the preciousness of the Shepherd's tent." These and other passages are impressed upon my memory with a fulness and a vividness which the lapse of seventy years has in no wise impaired.

SOME EXPRESSIONS OF JOHN PEASE THE LAST EVENING HE SPENT IN PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 25, 1845, AT THE HOUSE OF MARMADUKE C. COPE.

I think I may acknowledge to you, my dear friends, that the thought of this being the last opportunity I may have with those to whom I have been tenderly united, has unfitted my mind for much social converse, and such have been my feelings, that words could not clothe them; for though scarcely able to realize it, yet the time having nearly come for me to be separated from those with whom I have mingled not only in the social circle, but also in religious communion, I have been comforted in the assurance that we shall not cease to remember each other in the bonds of love; for distance cannot prevent our uniting in spirit, nor the rolling wave debar us from meeting at the footstool of Divine mercy! Dear friends, you know that I understand your trials; many and great have been your conflicts and varied your tossings; but be not dismayed, nor let go your dependence upon the arm of an Almighty preserver. It is not the will of your Heavenly Father that a dividing line should be drawn among you; and I do not want you to turn your attention to the fearfulness of these things. It is the work of the enemy to scatter and divide; and it has been sealed upon my mind that this is not the will of your Heavenly Father concerning you. His gracious design is to bind up and to heal the diseases of this people. If then, through the unwatchfulness of some, it be permitted that a dividing line should be drawn, it will be in His wrath, and not in His pleasure. Yet a remnant will be preserved—for it will not fall upon you, though bitterness will come up into the coasts of those who promote it—and they who think themselves the most safe, will have to drink indeed of a cup which will bring bitterness and sorrow into their houses. So that I want to encourage you to keep out of its spirit. Be watchful. Mind the pointings of the Heavenly finger, that through faithfulness and a quiet abiding in the light, you may know an establishment on the alone sure foundation, which nothing earthly will be able to shake. Let us then continue to bear each other in remembrance, when far separated; for what can prevent our meeting at the footstool of the throne? What can prevent our meeting each other at the right hand of the majesty on high—there to be forever united with those, who having come out of the great tribulation, are forever before the throne, uniting in the unceasing song of: "Great and marvelous are Thy works, Lord—God—Almighty—just and true are all thy ways, thou King of Saints."

LINES WRITTEN BY SOPHIA PEASE AND PLACED IN THE CARPET-BAG OF HER HUSBAND ON HIS LEAVING HOME FOR AMERICA.

'Tis past, we part—yet for the sake of Him
 Before whose cause all earthly things grow dim,
 Friend of my childhood, husband of my youth,
 Go, serve thy God in meekness and in truth,
 Pite not for me but give thyself to prayer,
 And leave thy nurslings to a mother's care,
 Be it my task thy faithful wife to prove,
 And wisely govern with a mother's love.
 Go! and may Israel's shepherd be thy stay,
 Thy rest by night, thy strong support by day.
 Through noontide heat, His princely shade thy shield;
 In darksome glooms, thy glowing beacon yield;
 To Jordan's banks e'en should it lead thee on,
 Repose thy confidence in Him alone.
 At faith's strong step its darkest wave shall flee
 And a sure pathway will be made for thee.
 Jehovah's name in living lines impressed,
 Graved on thy breastplate, bind upon thy breast,
 Thus armed, through hostile foes thy way thou'lt make,
 And Friends receive thee for thy Master's sake.
 May every happiness thy steps attend
 And God's own peace to crown thee in the end.
 Farewell! and when before the Father's throne,
 Prostrate in dust our many faults we own,
 May we in spirit oft be found to meet,
 And in communion worship at His feet.

CHERRY BLOSSOMS.

TOKYO, Japan, Fourth Month 21, 1916.

"Cherry blossoms are the best thing in Japan—next to sake!"

DEAR FRIENDS:—

The far-famed cherry blossoms are upon us, and we have been spending our time admiring them as will be seen by this epistle! But I want to assure you right at the start that we have not become intoxicated over them. The above quotation is one that has come down from old times, and believing in getting all that is coming to them, the ordinary Japanese takes both these "best things" at the same time. Consequently the cherry blossom time is one of heavy drinking. They can admire the blossoms more and make up better poetry about them if they have enough alcohol to make them feel perfectly happy!

My first real cherry-viewing expedition was about four days ago, when the Coleman's took a party of us down to Ueno Park, which is especially noted for its blossoms. We had a blow-out on the way and a big audience watching the change. Everybody was out to see the sights, and I have never seen such crowds. I decided that all Japan, except perhaps a couple of million, were at Ueno Park! The roads and all the spaces under the trees were packed with thousands of people. A large stone stairway at one place was a wonderful sight filled with streams of folk going up and down. We plowed our way through the crowds on low gear; but glad to be in an auto, for many were in an hilarious state. Every now and then we would come upon a group of young fellows with their faces painted and comical hats and dresses who were making all sorts of remarks about passers-by. But I am forgetting to say anything about the cherries, which were in full bloom, and floods of them were on the trees and floating through the air and covering the ground. These were the single flowers which come out first and do not last long. They have not much color and in spite of the great masses of them I did not like them so very well. One place where they were beside a stream and mingled in with green trees they were wonderful. Another place they were around an enormous bronze "tori" at the entrance to a temple and was magnificent. The thing that impressed me on this trip was the crowds of people, the like of which I have never seen before.

But now the double cherries are out; and they are wonderful. They mostly have a rich pink color, especially just as they are opening. We have a number of trees on the compound and one fine one is right at my window.

The place to see these, however, is in the Hama detached palace; and if you will come along with me I will take you there even if you have never been presented at court or been decorated with the third order of the Rising Sun! Day before yesterday the Emperor and Empress gave a wonderful garden party to about fifteen hundred of the distinguished personages of Japan. (I happened to be one of these, so come along with me!) You see the different Embassies have the privilege of getting so many invitations for this affair and the American gives its invitations to those who are in Japan for the first time; while the others usually invite only people who have been presented at court. Of course most of the guests are Japanese who have been decorated by the Emperor. Now, get out your silk hats and frock coats, for the invitation requests us to wear these. (I borrowed Gilbert Bowles' hat and it was too small one way and too large the other, so I was in constant fear of it falling off.) Of course, in such togs, we cannot ride in the dirty trolleys, so we hire a coach with driver and runner, and away we go by one-thirty in order to get there before two-thirty, when the gates will be closed to all but the Imperial party, who are to leave the central palace at that time.

Leaving our coach at the gate and presenting our tickets to a gentleman dressed in blue knee breeches, white stockings, red vest and black swallow-tailed coat and cocked hat, we follow the crowd around a winding path through this exquisite Imperial garden, which can be seen by ordinary people only on this occasion. We pass green ponds with little bridges over them and rows of cherries or pale green weeping willows along the banks. Every now and then we come across a band sitting in a shady nook but not very often playing. Then we come to the bay where there are high mounds, from the top of which we get a wonderful view of the ships scudding along before a strong breeze. Finally we arrive at a wooden bridge guarded by two stalwart gentlemen in lackey costumes. The far side of this is our goal—the "eats" spread out all over a beautiful grass plot. This is the first time I have seen real grass in Japan and all over this garden there was wonderful green sod, which is very hard to grow in this country. Well, there's nothing to do but stand here and admire the cherries, odd pine trees and see the fish jumping in the lake.

After half an hour we hear a band way off at the other end of the garden start up the national anthem, and then one a little closer takes it up, and one still closer—the Emperor is coming! Soon we see them cross a bridge at the other end of the lake—quite a procession of high hats, uniforms and gay, foreign dresses. They go behind a hill and the band near us starts up. Everyone is looking up the path to where it turns. Here they come! No, it is only a lackey picking up any bits of twigs or other things and seeing that the path is clear. Ah! here's a man in high hat—two of them. They carry their hats in their hands and walk along to see that things are finally as they should be and take their stand beside the bridge. Still the Emperor is not in sight. Here comes a high officer around the bend. He has many medals across his breast and looks like the real thing. He is followed by a man in frock coat and then another man in uniform, but very plain and no decorations. Then a lady in pink with a veil; but which is the Emperor? As they come closer we notice that people make low, reverent bows to the man in the plain uniform. He must be the man they call Emperor. He salutes whenever he sees an officer in the crowd, but otherwise there is no expression of noticing the people at all. He is a slight man with a small mustache and a very nice face, except that there is no expression in it. The Empress is a few paces behind him and walking along with face turned down. Then follow all the princes, princesses and ladies-in-wait'g, etc. After them walk the various ambassadors with their families, and others who are to be presented to their majesties. All are across the bridge and we fill the path to follow, but the two men like Horatius of old hold the bridge against us.

One solid hour in the broiling sun, admiring the blossoms and waiting for the reception to be over so we can get across and get something to eat. When we are finally let loose, what a rush and push! The bridge was strong, however, and did not give way under us. Then it is a scramble for tables and things to eat. (We made out very well.) All sorts of meats, sandwiches, drinks, fruits, cakes, ice creams, etc., are served and we are all satisfied. The Imperial party soon finish their tea and walk out of the garden within touch of us as they pass our table. Then we leave the grounds and have another scramble getting our carriages and getting out. The streets are lined with crowds of people and we feel like a real show driving past in style.

But this was a chance of a lifetime and I never hope to see that dream-land again. If any of you ever think of coming to Japan, come at cherry blossom time and you will see some wonderful sights, and I'll get you invitations through the American Embassy to this wonderful affair. I'm afraid this is not a letter, but a sort of raving over having seen such wonderful sights and incidentally royalty, close to.

my daughter, until thou know how the matter will fall.—Ruth iii: 18.

Sit still, my child. 'Tis no great thing I ask,
No glorious deed, no mighty task;
But just to sit and patiently abide.
Wait in My presence, in My word confide.

But oh! dear Lord, I long the sword to wield,
Forward to go, and in the battlefield
To fight for Thee, thine enemies o'erthrow,
And in Thy strength to vanquish every foe.

The harvest-fields spread out before me lie,
The reapers toward me look and vainly cry—
"The field is white, the laborers are few;
Our Lord's command is also sent to you."

My child, it is a sweet and blessed thing
To rest beneath the shadow of My wing;
To feel thy doings and thy words are nought,
To trust to Me each restless, longing thought.

Dear Lord, help me this lesson sweet to learn,
To sit at Thy pierced feet and only yearn
To love Thee better, Lord, and feel that still Waiting is working if it be Thy will.

"LET US not be too curious in prying into God's ark, lest we smart like the fly fluttering about the candle; for God is a consuming fire to those who will be sporting themselves in the quirks of their wit about His sacred mysteries."

"To see the need is the first step in becoming a laborer, but it is only the first. Rather than to stop after having seen the need it were better never to have seen the need at all—better never to have heard the challenge than to hear it and turn away from it."

TO THE ASSOCIATED EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF FRIENDS ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Crossing the State of Missouri southwest from St. Louis by "The Frisco" Line to Northwestern Oklahoma, a distance of about three hundred and thirty miles, and just over the state boundary, is Wyandotte, at which is an Indian Reservation Government School and near it one of our oldest Mission Stations, now occupied by our Friends, Isaac and Laura Frazier. Our opportunities and relations with the Indian children at the School and through them with others, have been of continuing interest and importance.

Seneca Mission, some nine miles to the southwest, and close to the Missouri line, still occupied by Harvey and Elizabeth Wallace, has continued as a religious influence for the remnant of that tribe there located.

Nearly north from Wyandotte, about eight miles, is Modoc; and west from it, beyond Grand River and about nine or ten miles from Wyandotte, is Ottawa Mission. These two posts last named, by gradual elimination during several years, have not had any financial support from our treasury since last autumn.

Our hope and often-expressed wish, that Modoc Meeting would be normally maintained free from our Committee, has not been easy of accomplishment, but a few Friends of that neighborhood have finally co-operated, lately having paid one hundred dollars on account to our treasurer, with the understanding that an additional one hundred dollars is to be paid before a given date next Spring, when we are to give title to the premises which are to be used for a Friends' Meeting for Worship for that community.

The Ottawa community was granted the use of our meeting-house and mission home at that place for a period of one year, with the understanding that regular meetings were to be maintained together with a Bible class and that a brief quarterly report would be forwarded to our superintendents each three months. There seemed to have been a desire to meet us in this matter, but success has been quite limited. The condition elicits our united consideration.

The twenty acres and buildings at Ottawa are of much more value than the four acres and poorer buildings at Modoc, but in relation to both, we can properly recall how in times past, earnest, prayerful sacrifice in an unusual degree, did not fail to do their part in establishing bands of strong Christian men and women, most of whom went in late time peacefully to their rest, but memories of their history should strengthen our faith and impel us forward in our struggle while the day lasts and the Indian field still lies open to our hands.

Faithful care and prolonged correspondence by our treasurer has not yet closed the agreement of sale for our Hillside property, though we are still trusting for the balance of the purchase money to be paid to us.

At Iowa Mission a lease for one year has been made. Much care and correspondence as to a sale of this property led to our having a deed fully executed, but the agreed purchaser failed of his purpose and the deed for $655 has been cancelled. The Indian, Robert Small, we are now assured, is a purchaser, if our Committee will give him title for $600.

The five remaining posts have all been in continuous active care as may be shown by other reports submitted, and for all of which you have had monthly advices throughout the year.

At Otoe our Friends, J. L. and S. N. Mayo, having resigned and desired prompt release last autumn, they were replaced after the usual inquiry and care as to fitness for the responsible and serious work by Friends from Shawnee, viz: Frank and Allie Hatcher, who seem to have closely identified their lives and Christian endeavor with the Indians of that tribe and with the officers of the Government School and the children therein.

For these two Friends, as well as for our superintendent and for each of our other missionaries, including, too, our Friend, Elizabeth Test, at Kickapoo, I would ask our earnest supporting prayers. May we each one be mindful in an increasing degree of our responsibilities in this most important matter. True, earnest prayer availeth much, may we not be neglectful of it.

Executive action has been continuous, but perhaps more confined within routine limits, as now reviewed, than during many other past years. This does not, however, indicate curtailment of mission needs or a decline in collateral interests, and Associations of kindred nature with our own, and with which there is direct affiliation by membership in common, as with The Indian Rights Association, The Home Missions Council, The Mohonk Indian Conference, The American Indian Association, The Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., which are extending their efforts, and the Friends of Philadelphia in charge of the Indian School at Tunesassa, N. Y. With all of these I feel, from first-hand information, we may deem the work of the year as of high efficiency and if action by us were relevant, a more generous mention of their activities would prove very appealing as may be evidenced in their several reports.

Though the mention must be brief, it seems well to refer with earnest appreciation to the zealous and encouraging work of Commissioner Cato Sells, and of E. B. Merritt, Assistant Commissioner of the Indian Bureau, both of whom are deserving of the cordial moral support of all true friends of the Indian, and this, whether we do or do not approve the Government system under which they work.

We need to know the Indian in order to give him help and to keep pace with his shifting outlook and environment. I feel this was well displayed by Arthur C. Parker, an able student of the subject, who is of the Seneca Tribe, an influential leader of The American Indian Association, General Editor of its Journal and archaeologist of the Department of Education of the State of New York. At the annual meeting of our Philadelphia Indian Aid this year, Arthur Parker gave us an able address on the present complex situation and indefinite position and lack of legal status the Indian and his friends have confronting them, the condition being further influenced by inefficient Bureau employees, rapacity of business interests, apathetic attitude of Indians themselves.

Our general thesis is large and varied, and a difficulty in starting a brief paper readily develops an embarrassment of riches.

In conclusion, and in no light mood, the writer assumes the privilege of referring to a silent partner in the efforts of our Committee during all the years since he first became an officer of it in the year 1889. The close of the life of our beloved and valued Dr. James E. Rhoads, in 1895, one who so sympathetically held all the threads together, seemed to bring a critical time in the life of our associated responsibilities. As occasion warranted, T. Wistar Brown became a confidential and discreet adviser and a strong moral support. His interest in our Indian Missions was deep and broad to a degree not much suspected, and his appreciation of the difficulties involved on both the right hand and the left became a revelation. Very simply I would wish to thus memorialize upon our minutes his quiet worth. It may not be a breach of his long confidence to add that the death of T. Wistar Brown on the sixteenth of last month closes the service of gifts of $500 which since 1889 has appeared in our Treasurer's yearly accounts as coming from "A Philadelphia Friend."

Under a conditional trust created by T. Wistar Brown during his life, there may be after it shall have become operative eighteen months hence, a further annual donation for the use of this Indian work.

In a feeling of enhanced responsibility and in renewed loving esteem.

Chairman.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY ACHIEVED.

For over fifteen years a campaign for religious liberty has been going on in three of the South American republics.

In Ecuador, Bolivia and Peru no public worship was allowed except in the established Catholic Church, and no marriages could be contracted except under Catholic forms. Several years ago these restrictions were removed in Ecuador and Bolivia and full religious liberty was permitted; but in Peru liberty of worship was still forbidden, and any other than Catholic religious service had to be behind closed doors in private houses to which admission was by card. Although petitions and protests had been directed over and over again from citizens of this country to the Peruvian Government seeking full liberty of worship, it seemed as if the Congress of Peru would never yield.

We are glad to learn though our State Department that with the beginning of this year that section of the Peruvian constitution which prohibited any public worship except after the Catholic manner has been annulled and legislation adopted granting full religious liberty.

This does not mean that Catholicism ceases to be the established religion of Peru, but only that other forms of religion may be freely and publicly exercised. But it is a great victory that at last, throughout the entire Western hemisphere, religious liberty has been achieved. This marks an epoch in the religious history of the continent. No longer anywhere will those who would worship God in their own way be compelled to hide themselves behind locked doors. The Dark Ages have passed away. No longer will those who are not of the established Church be compelled to live without the sanctions of legal marriage.

The next religious campaign will be over the question of an established church. At a period in the history of our older states it was thought the business of the government to care for and support religion. In New England the town meeting made contracts with the minister and paid his salary. In Maryland the Roman Catholic Church was established, as also in Louisiana and other states; in New York the Dutch Reformed; in Virginia the Church of England; but long ago the country learned that everybody should pay for his own religion, and that way the whole world moves. The example of the United States and Canada will before long be followed in South America.—Exchange.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING'S PEACE WORK.

At the Second Month session of the Western Quarterly Meeting a Committee of men and women Friends was appointed to take into consideration our duty in the present crisis, as suggested by the Executive Committee of the Friends' National Peace Conference.

At the meeting held on the nineteenth of Fifth Month, that Committee made the following report:

To the Quarterly Meeting:—

The Committee appointed at the last Quarterly Meeting "to forward such statements and remonstrances [on Peace] to the officers of our government as seem called for, in the light of such developments as may arise" and to take the general subject under its care prepared a one-page letter which was sent to each of the six Senators of Pennsylvania, Maryland and Delaware and the seven members representing us in the lower house of Congress. Some were signed by the Clerk of the Quarterly Meeting, others by the Clerk of this Committee. In most cases the formal letter was accompanied by a personal letter from one or another of our number.

Nearly all of the Senators and Representatives acknowledged the receipt of the communication, a few did a little more than this, and one, Mahlon M. Garland, a Congressman-at-large from Pennsylvania, declared he was "heartily in accord with the views expressed therein."

The letter sent out by the Committee was as follows:—

To

On behalf of the Western Quarterly Meeting of Friends, held

"If we are ever in doubt what to do, it is a good rule to ask ourselves what we shall wish on the morrow we had done."

at West Grove, Chester County, Pennsylvania, with a membership residing in Chester County, Pennsylvania, Cecil County, Maryland, and New Castle County, Delaware, we would express our deep and increasing interest in the grave problems of national defense and our international relations; and in this crisis, we ask thee to exert all thy influence to have these many questions considered calmly, dispassionately and in the spirit of that world-wide brotherhood, whose foremost champion our country has long claimed to be.

We believe that the war in Europe is a direct and inevitable result of military preparedness. To place our international relations on the high plane of justice, righteousness and Christian love will be our country's greatest safeguard for the future, and this course only will enable it to fulfil its great mission in the world. We believe that all war is contrary to the spirit and teachings of Jesus Christ, and, in loyalty to His Kingdom, we would protest against any increase in military preparations.

Furthermore, we would beg of your body seriously to consider a distinctly Christian policy that will make for a permanent peace. Among the measures that have suggested themselves to us as directly in line with this policy are the following:

1st. A comprehensive educational program in Mexico, distinctly disinterested on our part.

2nd. Direct participation in the relief of Europe through the Red Cross and other recognized agencies.

3rd. Prompt and just settlement of our immigration questions, without discrimination against color or nation, the sure guarantee of peace with our Oriental neighbors.

4th. A fuller development of the ideal of a "Federation of the World" along the lines suggested by the Hague Conferences and such as have been already successful wherever tried.

In the spirit of Christian brotherhood, and on behalf of Western Quarterly Meeting of Friends.

....., Clerk.

THIRD MONTH, 1916.

We have kept somewhat in touch with the Friends' Peace Headquarters in Washington, D. C., and we have encouraged a few Friends to write personal letters of protest to our Congressmen, but the way did not open for much service of this kind.

We feel deeply concerned that all our members shall individually face the questions involved in peace and war, for we believe the endeavor to find out just where we stand will be profitable to us all.

The traditional Quaker testimony against war is familiar to us, and it is clear to most of us that the spirit which causes and accompanies war is absolutely at variance with the spirit which followers of Christ should possess. Many of us, however, are perplexed to know whether, as Christians, we have nothing to offer in a crisis like the present, except a protest against all war and a policy of non-resistance, and whether we must admit, that in the present stage of the world's progress we are obliged to rely for protection upon military force, even if we are not free to make use of it.

It may help us somewhat if we will carefully ponder the teachings of Jesus to "resist not evil," "love your enemies" and "do good to them that persecute you;" and then to keep in mind that these injunctions were evidently intended as guides for everyday life nineteen hundred years ago and also for to-day. If to these be added the principle of overcoming evil with good (and evil can be overcome only by good), do we not have the principles on which to base our lives and actions? Is not the one thing for us to do, to live, like George Fox, in that "spirit which takes away all occasion of war," the spirit of love, "love at any cost;" and as we come more and more fully under the rule of Divine love, are we not doing our part in helping His Kingdom to come and His will to be done on earth as it is in heaven?

Will anything more definitely mark us as followers of the Prince of Peace than lives, public, private, business, political, domestic, governed, in all their relations and at all times, by love? Such lives may be lived in the quiet or they may be called into the most active public service, but is it not for us to try to live such lives and to exhibit an unshaken confidence in the power of the spiritual forces here and now, keeping always in mind that "the battle is not ours but the Lord's?"

For the Committee,

WM. F. WICKERSHAM.

FIFTH MONTH 19, 1916.

WHY MOSQUITOS?

"What use are mosquitos?" appears to be the same old problem in a form suited to a pragmatic age.

It is an irrepressible question. It has been forced upon our attention frequently of late, even when we were deeply absorbed in other matters. We have lain awake nights thinking about it and arisen in the morning sleepless and sore without having found a satisfactory answer.

Obviously the question as stated is incomplete. Supplying the unconscious ellipsis it reads, "What use are mosquitos to men?" If, however, we reverse the question, a brain the millionth part the size of ours is adequate to answer it. Ask the mosquito when she comes around, "What use are men to mosquitos?" and she buzzes back, "They are good to eat." It is a true answer and if it is not satisfactory to us, this is because we look at the matter from a selfish point of view.

We do not deny the right of existence to a fish, that is, one of the edible species. Yet the fish devours mosquitos by the million in their infancy, the innocent and unarmed wrigglers. The more enterprising fish may even leap into the air and so capture the adult mosquitos in their element. That suggests the possibility of further developing their enterprise in this direction. A flock of flying fish kept in a bowl by day and released in the bed-room by night might afford some relief. But setting aside this project as chimerical—and perhaps it is—we see that after all mosquitos are of use to us in the same way that we are to them. Still we would prefer to dispense with mosquitos and feed the fish on bread crumbs.

We should remember in justice to the mosquito that only one sex is guilty. "The female of the species is more deadly than the male." The male mosquito seems to be a quiet, inoffensive stay-at-home body who carries none of the weapons of the militant sex, not even the mandolin.

It is the unnecessary cruelty of the mosquito that aggravates and puzzles us. We would not so much mind the loss of a little blood. Our ancestors thought it good for them. But when the mosquito, after drilling and boring and sawing and pumping to her heart's content, poisons the well with disease germs on departing, we feel that she has gone too far. But here again we must try to look at it through the eyes of the mosquito. "Where," she might with justice inquire, "did I get those germs if not from some other person's blood? If you humans would only keep your blood free from disease there would be no trouble about our spreading it. What we mosquitos want is a pure food law."

It is obvious that we must acquit the mosquito of intentionally inoculating us with yellow fever and the like. The germs they carry are forced upon them and doubtless they suffer from them too. Think of a mosquito shaking with fever and ague and no quinine on hand. Or worse, a mosquito with elephantiasis lumbering around on her six loggy legs! Evidently this world was not made to suit the mosquito. Perhaps it was not made to suit us.—From the N. Y. Independent.

NEWS ITEMS.

CHESTER MONTHLY MEETING at Media, Pa., had an unusually interesting session the evening of Second Month 26th. The concern that our faith and strength might be sufficient to serve our generation with spiritual leadership found expression in several vocal exercises in the meeting for worship. As is now usual, the business meeting opened in joint session.

Two communications regarding "Peace" were in the Clerk's hand, a letter from the Yearly Meeting's Peace Committee urging the prompt sending of a telegram to President Wilson asking mediation by the South American republics rather than declaration of war in the Mexican situation, and an appeal for funds for the English Friends' Relief Work signed by the delegation of English Friends who recently addressed us on the subject and endorsed by the Representative Meeting. Both matters found cordial response in the Meeting. A small committee with the Clerks was designated to send a telegram to the President immediately. In regard to the appeal for funds the Meeting took the rather unusual step of appointing a small committee to review and present to the membership all financial appeals coming officially through the Meeting so that those contributing might have such financial matters more fully before them when making any one contribution.

The Committee appointed in Fifth Month to consider the Meeting's sending a member to the Young Friends' Conference at Cedar Lake reported favorably and recommended that Arthur R. Pennell be released for the service. After free discussion appropriate to the matter the report was approved.

The annual report of the Primary School showed decided increase in attendance. A fund of $2000 was requested for scholarship endowment, but several Friends felt more money could be collected as needed each year while the school was in flourishing condition than would be forthcoming for a fund permanently applicable regardless of the condition of the school. However, both methods were encouraged.

J. P. E.

Reports have come from various Monthly Meetings, including the two in Philadelphia, Germantown, Birmingham and others that a course similar to that followed by Chester had been taken by them in addressing the President at Washington concerning existing conditions with Mexico.

WASHINGTON LETTER.—"Preparedness" is still the big question before Congress and the country. The size of the army has been settled. It is to be about 175,000 men in time of peace. Maintenance of the land forces will cost about $100,000,000 a year on the new basis.

The question as to the size of the navy is now in the balance. A bill has passed the House which goes far beyond any naval programme ever proposed in this country. It provides for expenditures for the fiscal year ending Sixth Month 30, 1917, of nearly $300,000,000. This bill will be taken up by the Senate in about a week. Men in position to know say the upper branch of Congress is sure to make a still further increase, particularly adding battleships to the programme. It was only by the narrow margin that the extremists in the House were prevented from putting through a programme that would have added at least another one hundred millions in cost. This would seem to indicate that increases made by the Senate will probably be approved by the House when the bill goes back to that body.

The question now is, not whether we shall add a few more ships to the navy and two or three hundred million dollars more in expenditures for naval purposes; our real problem is, will this nation stand by its vaunted ideals of justice and world brotherhood or will it accept the propaganda of militarism, started and carried along by individuals and agencies of which the average citizen is ignorant.

Notwithstanding the totally misguiding news and editorial columns of newspapers, the spread-eagle speeches of politicians—for home consumption—and the propaganda of the Navy League and similar organizations, the country already is well prepared in a military sense. Statements to this effect were made by a number of highest army and naval officers before congressional committees at recent hearings. These statements have had much to do with the refusal of many congressmen to be stampeded for "preparedness."

Having before us the above conditions, we desire to ask Friends to make one more effort. This time we are urging that letters, or telegrams, be sent to Senators calling upon them to oppose the huge naval programme. This is worth doing, no matter how many previous letters have been sent or however sure Friends may be of the position of their Senators. Letters should be sent at once by Friends and others. Address Senators at the Capitol.

Very truly,

FRIENDS' NATIONAL PEACE HEADQUARTERS.

The following is taken from a recent issue of the Haverfordian: "Isaac Sharpless Hall" is a building to be erected at Haverford College by the Alumni Association in the near future at a cost of $100,000. It will house the laboratory for physics and biology. A committee of over forty men is working on subscriptions with their different classes with excellent results.

SIXTH MONTH 15, 1916.

JOHN WAY, Dear Friend.—Once more I have the pleasant duty of writing to thank you for another kind contribution to our funds.

I am sorry to say that the feeling against "enemy aliens" seems to grow continually more bitter as the war goes on. It seems quite necessary that those of us who refuse to recognize any one as an "enemy" should continue to befriend these poor people and try to keep them from losing heart and hope entirely, and for the means to do this we are, of course, dependent upon our friends.

Believe me,

Very sincerely thine,

ANNA B. THOMAS.

FRIENDS' Washington Peace Headquarters closes with a final appeal to all meetings in the United States to influence their Senators against the proposed increase in the Naval Bill.

Friends' Washington Peace Headquarters has closed its office in Washington and transferred its records to the office of the Philadelphia Joint Peace Committee, where they will be used in sending out literature to Friends from that centre. Letters and inquiries addressed to Friends' Peace Committee, 111 S. Thirteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., will receive prompt attention.

For the Committee,

L. HOLLINGSWORTH WOOD.

THE Haverford summer school, a biennial conference, held under the care of Haverford College will, this year, transfer its scene of operations from Haverford to Swampscott, Mass. The management will be largely in charge of Henry J. Cadbury and the program will include the following speakers: George A. Barton, Alfred C. Garrett, Rufus M. Jones, Elihu Grant, William E. Sperry and others. The time will be Ninth Month 5-12.

SEPTIMUS MARTIN writes that after visiting various Friends' centres in the middle west he has now joined his wife, Leila Marten, in Pasadena, where they are at home to their friends.

LET US HAVE BETTER LIGHT AT TUNESASSA.—A year ago the only light I had at night in West China was from a little wick, about the size of a match-stick, leaning over the side of a small saucer, filled with a vegetable oil. And this minute gleam in the darkness was sometimes placed in the partition between two rooms in a Chinese inn, that it might do double duty.

The contrast between this illumination and that with which we are mostly familiar in our houses spells the difference between undeveloped resources and that civilization which means better minds as well as better eyes.

Our Indian Boarding School at Tunesassa, N. Y., has used coal oil for years, increasing the fire risk, and sorely taxing the eyes of the fifty-five students and their teachers. The Committee in charge are united as to the necessity for a better system of lighting and have directed the household Committee to install such. This will require at least $1000 more than the treasurer, Wm. Bacon Evans, Moorestown, N. J., has in hand for the purpose. If our members or any interested in this worthy mission among the Seneca Indians are disposed to assist in supplying this suffering need he will gladly receive their contributions.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Before the convention of newspaper men in Philadelphia, Cyrus H. K. Curtis outlined plans for the erection of the finest newspaper building in the country at Sixth and Chestnut Streets.

Dr. J. C. O'Donnell, the veteran editor of the Toronto Globe, stirred the delegates of the Newspaper Publishers by declaring that in the democracy of peace such as exists in the United States and Canada lies the hope of the future adjustment of conditions between all nations of the earth.

GENERAL.—The Mexican situation has been very tense for more than a week. The Ledger of the 29th had the following: "Carranza's release of the American prisoners and the willingness of the President to accept mediation give a suddenly encouraging turn to what was an ominous situation. The American people as a whole want nothing for themselves that belongs to Mexico. What they do want is peace on the border and a cessation of marauding raids. They ask and demand that a stable government shall be established, capable of fulfilling the obligations of sovereignty."

Romulo S. Naon, Argentine Ambassador to the United States, issued a statement in which he said that while he had made no offer of mediation looking to the settlement of the difficulties between the United States and Mexico, he was "in candor confident that the present crisis will be peacefully settled."

For three years experiments with the use of sheep and goats for clearing banks of irrigating canals and laterals, on the Salt River project, Arizona, have been in the course of investigation, states the Engineering Record. The results have shown that the use of the animals will materially reduce the cost of upkeep without injury to the banks.

Conditions in the leper settlement at Molokai, depicted by Jack London in his letter to the Public Ledger last week, will be employed as an argument for the establishment of a national leprosarium in the United States, for which Senator Randall, of Louisiana, has a bill in the Senate.

The Presbyterian General Assembly, of Canada, after three-days' debate, voted, 406 to 88, to accept the plan of uniting the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist Churches of the Dominion.

Gifts to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology aggregating $2,660,000 were announced last week at Boston as the concluding event of the Institute's commencement exercises held in connection with the dedication of its new home on the Cambridge side of the Charles River.

Pro causa Judaica is the Latin name for a committee of world-wide scope, with headquarters at Zurich, Switzerland, which has been organized to promote the interests of the Jewish race, both during and after the war. It includes a large number of prominent men in Switzerland and elsewhere, and appeals alike to Jews and Gentiles. Its efforts will be directed both to the realization of the demand for equal rights for the millions of outlawed Jews in Europe, and to the question of colonial emigration for those who are unable to penetrate by the war.

FOREIGN.—The Zeitschrift fuer Frauenstimmrecht, the German woman suffrage organ, has sent the following greeting to the women of France: "We feel, think and suffer like you, and protest that, after this catastrophic war, the women of all nations shall work unitedly to prevent forever its recurrence."

Deplorable conditions prevail in Syria, said the Marquis of Crewe in the House of Lords on the 27th, dealing with the Arab revolt against the Turks. A cordon has been drawn by the Turks around the Lebanon district, and they were virtually starving the inhabitants. Bearing in mind the fate of Armenia, he said, it was impossible not to feel the gravest concern for the inhabitants of Syria. The Turks had exercised the greatest tyranny on Syria notables, and had condemned 20 of them to death and many others to imprisonment or exile.

NOTICES.

SCATTERGOOD SEMINARY.—An effort is being made by Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting of Friends, in Iowa, to so equip their Boarding School known as Scattergood Seminary, near West Branch, that it will meet the needs of a present day education, and establish it on an accredited basis, with other Friends' schools. A fund is being raised by free subscription, which is only payable if sufficient is subscribed, to build a dormitory, about 34 by 36 feet, with basement, two stories and attic, and make some other needed improvements. Wm. P. Young of Springville, Iowa, has been appointed to receive contributions for this worthy cause.

The Friends in Denver, Colorado, are desirous of knowing of any Eastern Friends in their city, that they may invite them to their Friends' Meetings which they are now holding after the manner of a Philadelphia Friends' Meeting. Any of our readers who have knowledge of such will do a real service by addressing,

"Every person has an infinite worth, and every one that needs the help that we can supply has a right to it. So we look upon the world with new eyes. We cease to see it merely as it is. We see it as it may become when we and others labour in the presence of God for its transfiguration."—W. F. H.

"THE DEMON, SILENCE."

A member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting was a resident of Paris and its environs for seven or eight years. She was a fairly regular attender of the Friends' meeting held on the Rue de Théâtre, and enjoyed converse with those she met there and the solemn worship which characterized the meetings. She was a person of much reticence in public, and was heard to say more than once that she regarded it as a favor that she was not called on to speak in meeting. Her self-sacrificing nature gave her many outlets other than public testimony through which to discharge her interest in individuals, and none who knew her would have been inclined to charge her with being self-centred. For this reason, especially, it came to her as a great surprise on one occasion, when the number at the meeting was so limited as to leave little doubt of the intended application, to hear a fervent supplication that "the demon of silence" might be cast out of any one in the company in whom it might reside. If a personal application was meant by the beloved minister who used the expression, it was a case of temperamental misunderstanding in which no offence was intended by her and none by the visitor was taken. The incident was reverted to by the Philadelphia Friend more than once, upon her return to her native land, as instructive in any quarters where silence may have become a mere form.

In this connection it may be well to note that the great French literary critic H. A. Taine at one time made the same observation of the Society of Friends and commented particularly upon their manner of worship. He said that silence quite easily became the "very apotheosis of form," even though intended as a protest against form. The great Frenchman's word "apotheosis"—deification—is not far removed from the expression which surprised our Philadelphian in Paris. We may feel quite sure that behind them both there lurks a very subtle danger of which we need frequently to remind ourselves. Two considerations may not improperly be pressed home as bearing on this situation.

First, then, silence even as a basis of worship very easily becomes a condition of suspended activity. We so greatly enjoy the hush and the calm, that there is undoubtedly a temptation to yield ourselves to it "in pleasurable surcease of toil." However soothing this sensation is there is no doubt that it is often far removed from worship. It is more profitable than the purely vacant silence of the listless mind. Perhaps it is closely associated with the forgetfulness of Nirvana, but it is not a Christian service and neither it nor the "vacant silence" will make a Friends' meeting. The silence we seek as a "basis of worship" demands the utmost energy of the human soul. Our Lord's words for it are seek, strive, and the apostle gives a hint of its character as a warfare in the ringing "Fight the good fight of faith."

More than twenty-five years ago two Philadelphia Friends moved about in a number of Friendly communities in England. They were much impressed by the changed aspect of Friends' meetings. The characteristic appearance of the Friends' dress of a previous generation had given place to much that appeared like a protest against it. In spite of this, however, the manner of Friends in worship seemed distinctly more reverent and devout than they were accustomed to. The silence had the character of waiting, but it was marked by an energy of exercise that was unmistakable in its quality and intent. They both felt that the future of the Society in the British Isles would be safeguarded, in spite of multiplied changes, by the genuineness of this worship. Now that our dear Friends have had to face the "most dire persecution" many of them have known in a remarkable degree the rock beneath their feet.

In addition to this view of silence as a supreme effort or surrender of the will it is well for us to recognize another characteristic calculated to preserve us from a deadening formality. Too often we speak of silence as "our method" or "our peculiarity," as though we had some patent right on a distinguishing trait of the religious life. Is not the element in silence that gives it value as "a basis of worship" its universal character? It is not a specific difference at all, but rather a generic characteristic binding the whole family of the religious into a blessed unity. For when we analyze silence as a form what is it but the recognition that God is omnipresent—that He can be approached at all times everywhere, and that He is omniscient—knows us all, hears us all, if we speak to Him. Thus every wayside shrine, every family altar, every "mystic circle" of the untutored mind, every most elaborate ritual, however much of blind superstition it may conceal, does recognize that God is near, that God hears!

if we speak acceptably. So this "basis of silence" should bind us in unquestioning brotherhood to all everywhere who with us grope for the Light. Out of all forms or would-be absence of forms, we chose the means of approach that is common to all, in recognizing the Divine immanence. And we may humbly confess that even this means if we are unwilling to surrender ourselves to it with devoted energy, if we are unwilling to recognize its universal elements that bind us into the "whole family of God," may become a blind form, the "apotheosis of form," the "demon, silence."

CHRIST'S ATTITUDE TOWARD WAR.

At this time, when so many professedly Christian nations are engaged in the bloodiest war of history, the question of Christ's own attitude towards war assumes a compelling interest. Serious thinkers, alike in the countries at war and in those which are still at peace, are striving to reconcile the teachings of Jesus with the apparent necessities of the modern world. Now it is obvious that a satisfactory solution of this problem can be obtained only by an honest and impartial study of the life and teachings of Jesus, as revealed in the Gospels, not by vague and arbitrary conjectures about what Christ might have said and done, if He were alive to-day. And a careful examination of the Gospel records, without preconceived prejudice in either direction, will, I think, prove beyond reasonable doubt that the great Teacher of Galilee was an unqualified pacifist, an advocate of "peace at any price." There are two ways in which we may determine a man's attitude towards a problem; first, by his words; and, second, by his actions. Let us first consider the words of Jesus Christ which bear on the problems of war and non-resistance.

The Sermon on the Mount, as preserved in the fifth and sixth chapters of Matthew and in the sixth chapter of Luke, is universally regarded as one of the most decisive and significant expressions of Christ's thought. This sermon is simply filled with the plainest and most direct exhortations to passive submission, even to the most unprovoked and outrageous insults. "Resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." "Whosoever shall compel thee to go with him a mile, go with him twain." Moreover, the Beatitudes, with which the Sermon opens, exalt meekness and patience as the highest virtues. "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." "Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth." Some of those who believe that Christ's teaching can be reconciled with defensive war maintain that these expressions were only meant for the rude and quarrelsome peasants who made up the major part of His audience. But the dangerous fallacy of this contention is almost too obvious to need refutation. Nearly all of Christ's sermons were delivered to audiences of rude and uneducated peasants and fishermen. If the character of His audience is to rob these sermons of their universal significance, then no part of His teaching can be said to rest on a secure foundation. Another objection to applying the principles of the Sermon on the Mount to international disputes is based on the assumption that principles which hold good for individuals are not necessarily valid for nations. It is very difficult to believe, from all that we know of Jesus of Nazareth, that He ever intended to sanction any such Machiavellian distinction between individual and national morality. But, laying aside this consideration, we find that He expresses himself decisively on the question of defensive war in another place. In Matthew 22, the Pharisees ask Him whether it is lawful to pay tribute to Caesar. If Jesus had considered the ideal of national freedom worth fighting for He certainly would have expressed Himself against submission to Rome. If any war is justifiable, it is a war for the preservation of national freedom and integrity. Yet Jesus said: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's." Certainly this answer was not based on considerations of cowardice and expediency. Jesus spared neither His own life nor those of His followers when principles which He considered vital were at stake. Therefore we must believe that He condemned war, even when waged in behalf of national independence.

A great deal is made of Christ's statement that He came on earth to bring, not peace, but a sword. But, in this passage, He goes on to say that families shall be set at variance, the son against the father, the daughter-in-law against the mother-in-law, etc. As it can hardly be supposed that Christ wished to promote domestic pugilism, we can only infer that He meant to indicate figuratively the disruption of families which would follow the advent of His new religious idea. There are only two passages which have even a faintly militant tone. In Luke xxii: 36-38, He advises His disciples to provide themselves with swords; and, when told that there are only two swords among His followers, replies: "It is enough." But, when we weigh against these two sayings alike His own conduct during His trial and the uniformly pacific attitude of the early Church, it is almost impossible to associate a militaristic flavor with His words. Moreover, in all the four Gospels, we have very many passages which impress on His followers, in the most unmistakable terms, the principles of forgiveness of injuries, love of one's enemies, and passive submission to wrong and injustice. It is not to be understood, from this last phrase, that Jesus ever advised His followers to acquiesce in or compromise with wrongdoing. On the other hand, He exhorted them to protest against evil to the utmost, nay, even to lay down their lives, as He Himself did, in defense of truth and right. It is the use of physical force and violence as a means to resist wrong that He sweepingly and emphatically condemns.

The actions of Christ are quite as decisive as His words. In only one case can He be accused, by the wildest stretch of imagination, of using aggressive physical force. This one instance is, of course, the driving of the money-changers out of the temple. And here the provocation was certainly great enough to excuse and explain His departure from His ordinary rule. He saw the Temple, which to Him doubtless represented the highest spiritual aspirations of the Jewish people, turned into a paltry business house; He saw the worship of the true God cast aside for the worship of Mammon. Certainly this one example of righteous indignation cannot outweigh the lessons which we must draw from the rest of His life, and still more from His death. Attempts have been made to derive a justification for war from Christ's bitter denunciation of the Pharisees. But these attempts lose all weight when we stop to consider that these denunciations are never accompanied by any exhortation to the people to rise up and overthrow this Jewish spiritual oligarchy by force of arms. On the other hand, even when Jesus was being condemned by the foulest judicial murder, He made no attempt either to escape or to stir up popular feeling in His favor, but fell a passive victim to the bigotry and malice of His enemies. There were innumerable reasons by which Christ might have justified a longer continuance of His stay on earth. But He preferred to drink His bitter cup to the dregs, to die at the very beginning of His ministry, rather than to violate the principles of non-resistance, of overcoming evil with good, which were the very cornerstone of His philosophy. Can any Christian nation claim that the preservation of its life and integrity is more important to humanity than was the preservation of the life of Jesus of Nazareth?

In a case where the interest of the Christian clashes so obviously with his duty, we have, quite naturally, a flock of arguments to prove that Christ's disapproval of war was conditional and local, not absolute and universal. One of the most specious of these arguments claims that, while a Christian has no right to avenge his own personal injuries, he has both a right and a duty to avenge those of his friends and neighbors. Perhaps this argument can be most effectively refuted by imagining, for the moment, that Christ were alive to-day, a Frenchman or a Belgian. We can well imagine Him cheerfully exposing His own life in helping the maimed and wounded victims of the war by every sort of consolation, spiritual and material. But can we imagine Him crouched in the trenches, waiting for a chance to kill some of the invaders, His face distorted with the frenzy of battle, His heart black with hatred and thirsting for revenge, or, perhaps, leading a bayonet charge, consumed with the desire to hack, thrust, kill, destroy? The bare idea is so incongruous with every picture that we have of the life and character of Jesus that we turn away from it in horror and disgust. We have already considered the argument that Christ's active opposition to evil lends sanction to a righteous or "defensive" war. Leaving out the fact that the ultimate responsibility for war is usually fixed after all the participants are dead and buried, that each side is always devoutly convinced that its enemies are the aggressors and that it is waging a righteous defensive war, leaving out these vitally important considerations, we still find that Christ did not regard war, and physical violence in general, as legitimate weapons in His warfare against evil. Rightly or wrongly, He thought that the persistent power of evil could only be overcome by the more persistent power of good; and His professed followers, if they are sincere, should certainly be ready to accept this conclusion and abide by the consequences.

Probably the most convincing argument against non-resistance, in the minds of many, is the wonderful spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice that is now being shown on every battlefield in Europe. It seems preposterous to assert that men, whose nobility and strength of character are so obvious, should be excluded from the ranks of Christ's followers. Certainly no honest or generous pacifist would wish to detract in any way from the credit that is due to men who are, every day, laying down their lives for a cause which they believe to be just and sacred. But, on the other hand, it seems sufficiently evident that, while Jesus Christ would have applauded the courageous loyalty to ideals that has sent millions to fight and die in the trenches, He would have bestowed on the whole theory of war His unqualified and unsparring condemnation. The question whether Jesus Christ and His followers dying the passive death of martyrs or Leonidas fighting to the last breath with his band of devoted Spartans represents the highest and most effective sacrifice for humanity and freedom is not to be settled lightly or hastily. There is much to be said on both sides. But for a man to profess faith in Christ as a Divine and infallible Being in one breath, and to violate one of His most sacred and unmistakable injunctions in the next, is certainly gross and inexcusable inconsistency. Christianity is accepted too hastily and thoughtlessly by many of its advocates. If a man believes that Christ's doctrines of love, unconditional forgiveness of injuries, and non-resistance, represent the highest possible deal, then, and only then, does he have the right to claim Christ as his Lord and Saviour. If, however, he comes to the conclusion that these doctrines, however beautiful in theory, are impracticable and would actually promote wrongdoing and injustice in practise, then, however much he may revere other phases of Christ's life and teaching, he can hardly call himself, with justice, a Christian. For these beliefs are almost the cornerstone of Christ's philosophy; and the man who rejects them, in theory or in practise, not only rejects Christ as an infallible divinity, but also disclaims faith in Christianity as a power that is destined ultimately to conquer and subdue the world.

It is at once ludicrous and pathetic to observe the complacency with which some advocates of religion view the increase in devotional fervor which appears in time of war. That men are so ready to express dogmatic faith in Christ at a time when they are about to violate one of His most solemn spiritual precepts, should be, to true Christians, a source, not of satisfaction, but of regret and shame. The issue stands out with clearcut vividness. On one side war, patriotism, revenge of injuries, satisfaction of national honor; on the other side peace, internationalism, forgiveness of injuries, passive endurance of wrong and injustice. Only when the latter principles are carried out to the fullest extent can Christianity be said to stand forth as a prevailing, conquering world-force.—W. H. CHAMBERLAIN ('17) in Haverfordian.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

We have found it no easy task to select from the printed reports of the late London Yearly Meeting.

Had the task fallen to other hands than our own, doubtless the selections would have been different. We are not confident that were we ourselves to accept the same task a second time that we should accomplish just the same result that we have. It is sufficient to say that we have been compelled to omit very much that is of great interest and we think that nothing has been included which will cause our readers to be jealous of the space it occupies.

[EDITORS.]

Fourth-day Evening.

At the evening sitting the subject of Child Life was continued, after other aspects.

The Clerk presented a minute on the whole question, which was accepted as follows:—

We have given much thought to the great effect of war upon the children. While on the one hand this has been to quicken, to a certain extent, the spread of self-sacrifice and the desire to serve, there has been on the other an increasing unsettlement of mind and encroachments on study, the growth of bitterness against enemies, increase in truancy, and a general loosening of discipline. This has resulted partly from the absence of parents from home and the depletion of school staffs, partly from a change in the general ethical standard and the subordinating of everything to military requirements. The evidence of justices' courts is to the same effect. There has been a remarkable advance in the number of children brought before the courts, and the offences are of an increasingly serious character.

To us who are precluded from participating in the war there comes an urgent call to enter this field of service. We should increase the wise teaching of history as distinct from the narrow method which so often links it with a list of battles, and the true patriotism which shows the nation in its right perspective with other nations. We must take great trouble, we must sacrifice ourselves, and we must share with others whatever we possess of the sweetness and beauty of life. We must remember that atmosphere and personality tell, and above all we must seek to bring the children into the presence of Jesus Christ, that they may learn to love and admire His greatness and become sensitive to His Spirit.

Fifth-day, Twenty-fifth of Fifth Month.

The proceedings of the second day made three very full sessions. At the commencement there was a diminished attendance, though with some addition later in the morning.

The Clerk mentioned that no Epistle had been received from Dublin Yearly Meeting because that meeting had not yet been held, owing to the recent disturbances. He felt that Friends would desire to express their sympathy with Irish Friends in their Yearly Meeting, to be opened the first of next month. It also needed to be considered whether London Yearly Meeting should also prepare an Epistle to Dublin for its meeting in 1917, as usual.

ALFRED WEBB, on the suggestion of A. J. Crosfield, gave some particulars of the conditions among Friends during the disturbances. None of the Friends in Ireland had suffered any bodily harm from the revolt. They had passed through a time of great anxiety, but the Lord had been very good to them. Some of their members, especially Henry John Allen, had suffered serious financial loss. Irish Friends had been indeed glad of the sympathy of the English Friends, but he felt that it was English Friends who really needed sympathy in their present trying circumstances.

JOHN MORLAND suggested that this year's Epistle should go to Dublin as it was, for their adjourned Yearly Meeting next month. Frederick Andrews suggested that a message to Dublin now would be timely; and that the Meeting for Sufferings might be asked to write a timely Epistle ten months hence, when we should understand the position more clearly. Ernest Jones, amongst subsequent speakers, hoped that a very tender message would be sent. We should pray unitedly that some final agreement might be come to for the permanent benefit of the country.

The Clerk presented a minute appointing a committee to prepare a message of sympathy and love for the forthcoming meeting, and referring to the Meeting for Sufferings the preparation of an Epistle to the Dublin Yearly Meeting of 1917, and this was accepted by the Meeting.

The Epistles from the American Yearly Meetings, including one from New York (Fifteenth Street) and a message from American Friends resident in Japan, were then taken up.

Our Friends in Philadelphia had been particularly active in the promotion of Peace, especially in their opposition to the "preparedness" campaign, now so actively proceeding in the States. Last year the London Yearly Meeting welcomed a message from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and on the previous day we had had a living message from Philadelphia in the person of W. C. Allen. Although for seventy years Philadelphia Yearly Meeting had not addressed other Friends, it had now sent a most loving message to all bodies in the United States who call themselves Friends. That message was read.

EDITH MORLAND, who had recently returned to England with a message from the Philadelphia Women's Meeting, said that Philadelphia Women Friends there had united in the desire that Dublin and London should know of their loving sympathy and their appreciation of what Friends were doing in the present state of Europe. American Friends felt that they would be prepared to suffer with them. Both at Philadelphia and Baltimore she had received many tender messages for British Friends.

ANNA BARLOW, who had visited the States with her young son, expressed her sense of heartfelt gratitude to American Friends for their kindly reception. Before leaving this country [England], she spoke to the American Ambassador, who regarded it as important that not only should young Americans come to England but that young Englishmen should visit America. On arrival, she went to Philadelphia, and at once found herself among friends.

FOR PERMANENT PEACE.

The Report of the Peace Committee was next taken. Minutes from two Quarterly Meetings were also presented (1) suggesting an appeal to the belligerents to submit their case to a judicial tribunal, and (2) urging the need for Preparation for Permanent Universal Peace.

HORACE G. ALEXANDER, speaking of the report of the Peace Committee, read a letter from a friend of his in the trenches, in which he said, "You are the fighters, not we. You wrestle with the invisible devil of compromise and demon of path of least resistance, and what's more, you seem to have conquered." As he first read it, he said he could not help feeling crushed, first, because we at home seemed to be content to allow these things, and secondly, because a man like that, enduring so much more than we, should address us as if we had conquered where he had failed. And yet, in feeling that Friends at home had failed, we must note the joyful way in which so many of our Friends were facing the persecution resulting from their conscientious objection to take up arms. When he was asked what the Yearly Meeting could do, his answer would be that political action, memorials, and the discussion of the settlement after the war were not, in the main, the things which required our attention, but something much deeper; we could begin to follow in the path of absolute sacrifice of self. We had a great lesson to learn from those at present suffering. Every day of war meant a grave injury to men's souls, of infinitely greater worth than anything political, or any question of victory, or defeat. We must be able to bear the cross of physical torture, but so far we had hardly dared to call upon our fellows, not only to endure the cross, but to despise the shame. Dare we go to our fellow-countrymen and suggest to them that what was needed now was the same thing as in the days of Christ, that we should be ready to give up all—reputation, Empire, everything—in the spirit of Him who died for us when we were yet sinners? Until we were prepared to make the great appeal, the demand to a sacrifice greater than that of the body, Friends would not begin to attain the end they had in view.

JOHN KINGSLEY RUTTER claimed that the present was an appropriate moment for some definite action in the way of peace, the war having reached a stage of unstable equilibrium. There could be no speedy, decisive result, and the Governments might therefore think favorably of an appeal for peace, for which there was a great yearning among the people. We could not expect the belligerents to take the initial steps, and it therefore remained for some tribunal or Court of Justice to be set up. He believed that the Society of Friends might fairly make a definite move in that direction. From such a court the belligerents might receive proposals without any loss of dignity. A peace such as might be so arranged at the present time need not be an inconclusive peace. He thought Friends might ask the Government to receive a deputation.

NORMAN E. BROOKS said: . . . The failure to-day is the old, old failure of the practice of Christianity. Surely the most glorious triumph of Christianity was in the first two centuries of the Christian era. How unequal the contest must then have appeared, yet those ignorant men set out to conquer the world. And whenever man had placed himself fearlessly under the command of God the result was assured. This then was the call of the Society to-day, that the only real preparation for universal peace was by a return, with fearless disregard of consequences, to the spirit and teaching of the Master.

The Clerk, reviewing the different proposals before the meeting, asked for an expression from the Meeting.

A suggestion here made for a period of silence was acceded to. Afterwards

W. E. WILSON expressed his belief that God was calling Friends at this time, and he longed that the Yearly Meeting should let God speak to it, and furnish it with the real message. Friends should not appoint a committee or take any other step until we knew what God wished us to do.

Fifth-day Afternoon.

A much fuller attendance, the greatest up to that time, marked the afternoon session, when the reports of the Committees on War Victims' Relief, Aliens' Relief, and the Friends' Ambulance Unit were before the meeting.

In the devotional meeting Cornelius Boeke dwelt on the possibility of looking so much at the need of the world that we put aside thought of the need of God. We often thought that an effort was our own, whereas it, and our sympathy and every other good thing, came from God. Any number of good and kind works would not save us; we had to come back to the salvation of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Clerk afterwards announced the recommendation of the Arrangements Committee that the subject of that morning should be reintroduced at the following morning's sitting, and that, if necessary, the afternoon and evening should be devoted to it.

The subject of "War Sufferers and Their Relief" was then taken.

"The work of these agencies rests upon the fact of a common cause, springs from a common root, and has a common inspiration."

The War Victims' report mentioned that the present number of workers abroad was now 147. Altogether 299 had joined since the work started and 130 had left.

S. MARGERY FRY said that in some directions, the work seemed to be nearing an end, though it was difficult to speak positively on so complicated a work. In a very short time the Committee would have provided the necessary houses on the Marne and the Meuse, in France, and the housing in those districts no longer presented any crying scandals. Other districts where other agencies had been at work were fairly well provided for. Beds and other articles of furniture had been provided, while all the little houses which had sprung up since the war had received a small beginning of furniture—a bed, a table, a few chairs, and perhaps a cooking stove. The Committee had also been able to give clothes in large number, and she often thought the kindly contributors of these articles would be very pleased to find the gratefulness with which the results of their work were received. Seeds, tools and agricultural materials had been supplied, and those gifts were about ceasing. Other sides of their work were proceeding. Not only had there been liberality among British Friends, but much assistance had been rendered by the French authorities and American sympathizers. She rejoiced that in that work people had been able to lay aside not only differences of opinion, religious and social, but what was still more difficult, the red tape which was not absent anywhere. With regard to the future, they hoped before long to be able to assist in the rebuilding of villages and homes in other parts, ready for the moment of peace, the French being ready to provide the materials if Friends provided the workmanship. The unhappy condition of many of the refugees in the large towns afforded another opening for future service. Looking back, they all felt that they had often failed, but they hoped to do better in the future. They had felt it a great happiness to be the channel through which love and sympathy had been conveyed to the unhappy refugees in France. The human affections could not be scheduled, and they could only hope they had been able to do something towards spreading the bonds of affection.

WILLIAM C. BRAITHWAITE, for the "Relief of Aliens," spoke of the Unit as the third of the redemptive agencies which Friends had been privileged to establish in connection with the war. They all felt grateful for the excellent minute the Yearly Meeting of last year had sent down; and since starting, they had experienced the liberality of Friends and others to the extent of £54,000, and they knew that much prayer was expended on their work. The membership of the Unit was now 616, with 130 in training, and 55 assigned to various sorts of civilian work of national utility. That made a total of 800, four times as many as were reported last year. The Unit did not bear arms or take military duty. None of the Society anticipated the nature and dimensions of the work when it started, but there were young men anxious for life saving, and under such conditions Friends might rejoice in the part the Unit had taken. They had been the only British civilians who had been allowed in certain situations, and their relief work had also been possible—the clothing and feeding of refugees, freeing the district from infection, and so on. The work carried on almost within the sound of the guns was a unique evidence of remedial measures going on under the very shadow of destruction. What might be in store for the Unit he could not say. Only three members of the Unit had lost their lives in its service, typifying the call that came to us all to spend our lives in this hour of need, an hour for sacrifice, when we were called on to give the greatest service in the highest that we knew.

FREDERICK ANDREWS told of the pleasure with which old Ackworth scholars had welcomed the opportunity of useful work found by the Unit before there was any suggestion of conscription, and he felt grateful to the Friends who had provided a way in which service could be rendered. The Ackworth Old Scholars' Association had raised £1,100 to assist in the equipment and support of old scholars desiring to render such service.

ARTHUR J. SHARP remarked that to his mind, the work of the Aliens' Emergency Relief commended itself as the most practical peace work that had been opened up to the Society.

(To be concluded.)

PEACE.

Peace, brothers, peace,
Let hatred and bloodshed cease.
The Father outstretches His Holy Hand;
Oh, hearken at once to His royal command,
Peace, brothers, peace.

Peace, brothers, peace,
Then sorrow shall know succorance.
The widow's low moan, the orphan's sad cry,
Have entered the ears of the Lord on high.
Peace, brothers, peace.

Peace, brothers, peace,
Then faith and hope will increase.
The Father outstretches His arms above,
In Infinite Pity, Infinite Love.
Peace, brothers, peace.

THE more you talk what is right, or even about the doing of it, the more you are in danger of exemplifying how loosely theory may be allied to practice. Talk without action saps the very will.

GRADUATION DAY AT TUNESASSA.

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

ADDRESS TO GRADUATING CLASS, SIXTH MONTH 21, 1916.

[The neighborhood Indians and some from a distance assemble at the Friends' Boarding School at Tunesassa annually on what they call "Last Day"—to hear the closing exercises and to get a good dinner. Edward M. Wistar and Joseph Elkinton represented the Committee on this occasion and addressed the company.—EDS.]

Other men and women have labored—faithfully and sympathetically—on these reservations and we, both Indians and others, have entered into their labors. What does this mean to you graduates and to those who shall succeed you at this School?

What should it mean for all of us? Why did my grandfather travel four hundred miles through the wilderness, just one hundred years ago this summer, to establish such a school for the Indian children, and why have others followed him in the same spirit?

Do we fully appreciate their motives and efforts? They certainly did not want your land or wigwams or cattle, for they have freely given you thousands of dollars yearly and a real home. They wanted to help you become good, capable men and women—to grow into all that is best.

Owen Blacksnake told me thirty-seven years ago, when I first saw this beautiful valley, that my grandfather ran after him and caught him, when he left the school-room, to chase a passing bear or deer, "and," he added, with a good laugh, "he whipped me." Did he laugh because it was pleasant to remember that whipping? Was it not rather because his teacher, then scarcely out of his teens, could run faster, even if he couldn't shoot an arrow straighter than himself? But above all, was it not because his white friend stood for a better way of life, a higher civilization and a truer conception of duty and of service?

Red Jacket was opposed to the opening of this school and to the attempt to teach the Indians any of the white man's ways—and more than once threatened to "tar and feather" him if he persisted in so doing. Complanter sometimes encouraged and at other times discouraged him.

There were no railroads then and the Six Nations were still living under the old Constitution of the Iroquois League and smarting still from the memory of Sullivan's raid in 1779. May I tell you what one of your chiefs, M. B. Pierce, said about this period? "I ask, then, in behalf of the New York Indians, that our white brethren will not urge us to do that which justice, humanity, religion, not only do not require, but condemn. Let us live where our fathers lived, that we who are converted heathen may be made meet for that inheritance which our Father hath promised to give through His Son, our Saviour; so that the deserts and waste places may be made to blossom like the rose, and the inhabitants thereof utter forth the high praises of our God.

"Let me tell you our condition when the palefaces landed on the eastern shores of this great island. Our government then, many centuries ago, was remarkable for its wisdom, and adapted to the condition of our nation. It was a republican and powerful democratic government, in which the will of the people ruled.

"No policy or enterprise was ever carried out by the Council of the Sachems of the Confederacy of the Long House without sanction and ratification of the people, and it was necessary that these decisions should receive the consent not only of the warriors but of the women and mothers of the nation as well, for these were freely consulted.

"By this means the path of the wise sachems was made clear; their hands were strong, their determinations resolute, knowing that they had the unanimous support of their great constituency.

"Hence the Confederacy of the Iroquois became great and strong, prosperous and happy; by their wisdom they became statesmen, warriors, diplomats; by their valor and skill on the warpath they became formidable; they conquered and subdued many tribes and extended their territory.

"Our territory, which once required the fleetest runners to traverse, is now spanned by the human voice. Our possessions are so reduced that now when we put the seed of the melon into the earth it sprouts and its tender vine trails along the ground until it trespasses upon the lands of the palface."

This Constitution of the Five Nations is a remarkable document—formulated by Dekanawida and promulgated by Hiawatha, the famous Mohawk chief, about 1390 A. D. It has recently been published by the N. Y. State Museum under the editorship of your able Seneca brother, Arthur C. Parker, and you ought to be familiar with it.

He says of it: "The Great Peace as a governmental system was an almost ideal one for the stage of culture with which it was designed to cope. I think it will be found to be the greatest ever devised by barbaric man on any continent.

"By adhering to it the Five Nations became the dominant native power east of the Mississippi and during the colonial times exercised an immense influence in determining the fate of English civilization on this continent. The Five Nations, as allies of the British, fought for it and destroyed all French hopes of colonization.

"The authors of the great Immutable Law (of Peace and Power) gave the Iroquois two great culture heroes—heroes almost without equal in American Indian annals. Through this law as a guiding force and through these heroes as ideals the Iroquois have persisted as a people, preserved their national identity and much of their native culture and lore.

"To-day, in their various bodies, they number more than 16,000 souls. This is a remarkable fact when it is considered that they are entirely surrounded by a dominant culture whose encroachments are persistent and unrelenting in the very nature of things."

The Canadian Iroquois still govern themselves by this code. The two principal manuscripts that form the basis of this Constitution were found in the Six Nations Reservation, Ontario, Canada, in 1910.

The main effort of this League was very similar to that of the present proposed International League to Enforce Peace, of which ex-President Taft is the leading spokesman. The place and power of women was fully recognized, as M. B. Pierce stated, by giving them the privilege of selecting the fifty chiefs or sachems who were to decide the affairs of the Great Council; they were also given the power of deposing the chiefs upon misbehavior. Surely here was Woman Suffrage and the Recall, five hundred years before we whites have begrudgingly come to grant either in our supposed superior civilization.

I quote a passage from Dekanawida, when he was advocating the benefit of his plan to the Onondaga or Fifth Nation to join the compact, in the fourteenth century. "We have now arrived, we representing the Four Nations. You will therefore now answer the message which we have left here with you. These lords who now stand all around you have now accepted the Good Tidings of Peace and Power which signifies that hereafter the shedding of blood shall cease, for our Creator, the Great Ruler, never intended that man should engage in any such work as the destruction of human life. There are many who have perished in the direction you are now facing and these lords have come to induce you to join them so that the shedding of human blood might cease and the Good Tidings of Peace and Power might prevail."

I bring these facts to our notice so that we may all appreciate the good that is in your own inheritance. For you, as a people, have qualities that are to be valued and we wish to add to yours what is best in our civilization and inheritance.

That is the ideal of the Friends who have given you the opportunities which have preceded this "last day." We want you to grow, by your own efforts, added to all that has been done for you. Allow me to illustrate by what I have seen during the last few days as our mutual friend, Henry B.

Leeds, has taken me among the Indians on these three reservations. This beautiful Allegheny valley presents a marked contrast, in agricultural progress, with Little Valley, between Salamanca and the County seat.

There the fields are generally ploughed and the bushes cut and the houses painted by their white owners, and I am sure that the Indians on this reservation could do the same. But we shall hope and expect that you will make your future homes like the best we have seen on all three reservations. I need not name, personally, these well-kept homes and farms, at which we have thoroughly enjoyed visiting at Complanter's, as well as here and at Cattaraugus. One way in which this will come faster is for you to feel the privileges of citizenship. This has so far been denied most of the Indians, but if you show that you are capable of providing for yourselves and your families, our National Government will not always forget "that the making of citizens who are intelligent men and women and who shall be responsive to all the necessities and demands of the age is its chief function." The Society of American Indians, which held its last annual conference recently, has proposed a national Indian day. It represents all the tribes in the United States. The object of the conference is to bring all the tribes together and in a united effort to arouse public sentiment in behalf of justice for you, and when this sentiment is sufficiently aroused, to concentrate its influence upon Congress.

The Indian Rights Association of Philadelphia has acted on this basis for more than thirty years past. It has been well said that "the great mission of the social and religious elements of our civilization is as much to protect the Indians from the corruption of civilization as it is to teach him its virtues."

The Indians themselves must co-operate with us in this effort of the missionaries and schools, especially if we demand a genuine respect for the Indian's rights, as a potential citizen, and try to protect him in those rights.

The present administration has done much and I know, personally, that Commissioner Sells desires to do everything in his power to free every reservation in the United States as well as every Indian from the curse of liquor.

We desire to give you a practical education early enough so that you may finish that education in the high schools and colleges of our land, and I am glad to know that some of you earnestly wish to pursue that course. Arthur Parker well says: "Indians must no longer have a forced feeding. They must not be stuffed with food and medicine, no matter how good it is for white men living the lives of normal citizens. They must be educated to intensely desire all the fundamental things of a healthy civilized man."

But what are those "fundamental things?" Surely among them is a sense of freedom to use our bodies, minds and hearts in the best service of which we are capable; to acquire property, knowledge and wisdom—and, incidentally, to remember that

"Knowledge and wisdom far from being one
Have ofttimes no connection. Knowledge
Dwells in heads replete with thoughts of other men;
Wisdom in minds attentive to their own."

Couple this truth with another—"It is more blessed to give than to receive," and you will be well started on the path that leads to an honorable career and to the joyful life in Jesus Christ.

A CREEPING, insignificant snail can spoil the loveliest rose; so a "little" sin will mar and impoverish the purest heart.

ONE AND MANY.—The Spirit of God is one, by being simple in its essence, and by tending always to one end—the glory of God and our salvation. It is nevertheless, many, because it leads souls by various roads, gives different kinds of light, inspires divers affections, erects multiplied batteries to destroy the enemies of salvation and to perfect souls.—RICHARD of St. Victor.

WHEN WE SHALL SEE.

Sometime, when all life's lessons have been learned,
 And sun and stars for ever more have set,
 The things which our weak judgment here has spurned,
 The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wred,
 Will flash before us out of Life's dark night
 As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue,
 And we shall see how all God's plans are right,
 And how, what seemed proof, was Love most true.
 And we shall shortly know that lengthened breath
 Is not the sweetest gift God gives His friend,
 For that sometimes the sable pall of death
 Conceals the fairest boon His hand can send.
 If we could push aside the gate of Life
 And stand within, and all God's workings see,
 Should we not put an end to doubt and strife,
 And for each Mystery find a perfect key?

PRESIDENT WILSON'S NEW YORK ADDRESS, SEVENTH MONTH FIRST.

President Wilson in an address at the New York Press Club banquet a few evenings since expressed sentiments that all lovers of peace can welcome. In the course of his address, every word of which should be read, he said:

"The easiest thing is to strike. The brutal thing is the impulsive thing. No man has to think before he takes aggressive action, but before a man really conserves the honor by realizing the ideals of the nation, he has to think exactly what he will do and how he will do it.

"Do you think the glory of America would be enhanced by a war of conquest in Mexico? Do you think that any act of violence by a powerful nation like this against a weak and destructive neighbor would reflect distinction upon the annals of the United States?

"Do you think that it is our duty to carry self-defence to a point of dictation into the affairs of another people? The ideals of America are written plain upon every page of American history.

"And I want you to know how fully I realize whose servant I am. I do not own the government of the United States, even for the time being. I have no right in the use of it to express my own passions. I have no right to express my own ambitions for the development of America, if those ambitions are not coincident with the ambitions of the nation itself.

"I get a great many letters, my fellow-citizens, from important and influential men in this country, but I get a great many other letters. I get letters from unknown men, from humble women, from people whose names have never been heard and never will be recorded, and there is but one prayer in all of these letters: 'Mr. President, do not allow anybody to persuade you that the people of this country want war with anybody.'

"I got off a train yesterday, and as I was bidding good-bye to the engineer, he said in an undertone, 'Mr. President, keep out of Mexico.' And if one man has said that to me, a thousand have said it to me as I have moved about the country.

"If I have opportunity to engage them further in conversation, they say: 'Of course, we know that you cannot govern the circumstances of the case altogether, and it may be necessary, but do not do it unless it is necessary.'

"I am for the time being the spokesman of such people, gentlemen. I have not read history without observing that the greatest forces in the world and the only permanent forces are the moral forces. We have the evidence of a very competent witness—namely, the first Napoleon, who said, as he looked back in the last days of his life upon so much as he knew of human history, he had to record the judgment that force had never accomplished anything that was permanent.

"Force will not accomplish anything that is permanent. I venture to say, in the great struggle which is going on on the other side of the sea. The permanent things will be accomplished afterward, when the opinion of mankind is brought to bear upon the issues, and the only thing that will hold the world steady is this same silent, insistent, all-powerful opinion of mankind.

"Force can sometimes hold things steady until opinion has time to form, but no force that was ever exerted except in response to that opinion was ever a conquering and predominant force.

"I think the sentence in American history that I myself am proudest of is that in the introductory sentences of the Declaration of Independence, where the writers say that a due respect for the opinion of mankind demands that they state the reasons for what they are about to do.

"I venture to say that a decent respect for the opinions of mankind demanded that those who started the present European war should have stated their reasons, but they did not pay any heed to the opinion of mankind, and the reckoning will come when the settlement comes.

"There are some gentlemen who are under the delusion that the power of a nation comes from the top. It does not. It comes from the bottom.

"Power and virtue of the tree do not come from the blossoms and the fruit down into the roots, but they come from the roots in the obscure passages of the earth where the power is derived which displays itself in the blossoms and the fruit; and I know that among the silent, speechless masses of the American people is slowly coming up the great sap of moral purpose and love of justice and reverence for humanity which constitutes the only virtue and distinction of the American people.

"Look for your rulers of the future! Can you pick out the families that are to produce them? Can you pick out the localities that are going to produce them?

"You have heard what has been said about Abraham Lincoln. It is singular how touching every reference to Abraham Lincoln is. It always makes you feel that you wish you had been near to help him in some fashion to fight the battles that he was fighting, sometimes almost alone.

"Could you have predicted, if you had seen Abraham Lincoln's birth and boyhood, where that great ruling figure of the world was going to spring from?

"I have presided over a university, but I never deceived myself by supposing that by university processes you were producing the ruling forces of the world. I knew that all a university could do, if it knew its business, was to interpret the moral forces of the world, and let the young man who sat under its influence know the very truth of truths about where it came from, and that no man could produce it unless he felt in his blood every corpulence spring into delighted life with the mention of ideals which have lifted men slowly, oh, so slowly, up the arduous grades which have resisted progress since the world began.

"So I have not come here to-night to do anything but to remind you that you do not constitute the United States, that I do not constitute the United States; that it is something bigger and greater and finer than any of us; that it was born in an ideal, and only by pursuing an ideal in the face of every adverse circumstance will it continue to deserve the beloved name which we love and for which we are ready to die, the name 'America.'"

WITH ENGLISH FRIENDS BEHIND THE BATTLE LINE IN FRANCE.

LETITIA JOWITT.

It was in the early winter of 1914 that a small group of English doctors and nurses, sent out by the Society of Friends in Great Britain to give relief to non-combatants, innocent victims of war in the east of France, took up their quarters in one wing of the large asylum for old people at Châlons-sur-Marne.

Châlons, occupied by the Germans for nine days, had suffered little, but it is the center of a large number of villages crowded with refugees from the Ardennes and from the ruined villages in the neighboring department.

Herded together in most pitiable condition, sheltering in barns and stables, sleeping on straw without blankets, bereft of all that makes a home, weighed down with anxiety for their menfolk in the trenches, of whose danger the not very distant heavy firing was a continual reminder, these refugees, old men, women and children, needed all the help and comfort that we could bring them.

But in most dire need of all were the mothers-to-be and it was of them that the Prefect of the Marne thought when he invited Dr. Hilda Clark, a granddaughter of John Bright, in charge of the medical work of the English mission, to undertake the administration of a small maternity hospital in one block of the large modern building which houses the homeless old people of the department of the Marne.

The Friend who was acting as matron told in her letters home of the hardship and suffering which many of these women had been through.

"Many also came from Reims. One such had taken refuge at Chamery, a village just outside, and there we went to fetch her with the motor. We found her cleanly lodged, but there was no possibility of her being cared for there, and her mother-in-law, also a refugee there with her, spoke most gratefully of the provision of the hospital. 'I confide her to your care,' she said, and in spite of the fact that we were unknown to them, of a foreign country, arriving late in the dusk of a winter evening, this young mother-to-be rose up, laid down her sewing, put on her hat and cloak, and came away with us into the dark. It was her first baby. Her husband, a compositor in Reims, before he was called up, had been seriously wounded four months before, and since then she had had no news at all. She spoke during the long ride back of their happy life together, then of his being called out, of the horrors of the bombardment, and her six weeks' nightly sojourn in the cellars. She spoke of the Germans in Reims, but said they were 'très gentils,' and that many of her friends had found the same. One she met had been so sad, and had wept over having to fight and leave his wife and children. She showed him the picture of her husband, and he wished her good fortune and his safe return. Her courage was splendid. She said, 'If he never comes back to me I must bring up my child and work for him; one must have courage these days; one has moments, but it is no good to weep, it only brings weakness.' She was some time with us before her baby was born, helpful in a hundred little ways, and so long as we could keep her busy with sewing, wonderfully cheerful and well. Just before a little daughter was born to her the news came that her husband was dead. Her courage never failed. 'For my dear little girl I want to be strong,' she said. Mercifully she had relations on a little farm in the south, to whom she can go when she is strong enough, but of her parents she has had no news since the beginning of the war, and knows not whether they are alive or dead."

In another letter she writes:

"The overcrowding presents a very serious problem. At a little village northeast of Châlons le Maire had not been able to send on any of the refugees, as all the trains were required for military purposes. We were asked to fetch an expectant mother from there, and we brought her away from a small shed, about 12 by 14 feet, the only lighting, other than the door, being a piece of glass a foot or so square let into the planking. There was a stove, and on the earthen floor all down one side, covering about half the available floor space, was a pile of straw. On this were sleeping three men, four women and six children! Here, two months before we came, a baby had been born. The mud was six inches deep before the door, but, in spite of this and of our unexpected visit, the six children were all clean, and on a string across that wretched hovel were hanging a few meagre articles of children's clothing, not only washed but ironed. Our patient herself had but three garments in the world apparently, but these, too, were perfectly clean. She appreciated greatly the care and comfort of the hospital, and after her 'little soldier' was born she was given an outfit for herself and him and sent to his grandparents beyond Paris."

I had several opportunities of visiting the maternity hospital, and shall never forget the shy pride with which these French peasant women, so happily established in the cleanliness and peace of that cheerful little hospital showed for our admiration, as we chatted at one bedside after another, their newborn babes, endearingly spoken of as "mon petit soldat" in the case of a son, nor the gratitude with which they spoke of the kindness and attention of the English nurses. In the field adjoining the hospital are anti-aircraft guns waiting for hostile visitors, and more than once since the Friends' sojourn there a shell has penetrated to the asylum grounds, but happily up to the present no harm has been done to the hospital or its inmates.

For a year now the number of maternity patients has been much less; one of the wards has been occupied by women and girls evacuated in our ambulance cars from Reims or Suippes or other places within reach of the German guns. For more than a year now the bombardment of Reims has continued, but a few of its inhabitants still stay in their cellar homes. Occasionally when they emerge on some errand into the street, they are injured by an exploding shell, and it was these victims whom we were first asked to fetch to the safety of the "Maternité" at Châlons, though presently the problem of evacuation grew beyond the directly medical one and it was for the children suffering from the strain and terror of bombardment that we were called upon to find another home.

One afternoon early last autumn, turning my back on the ruined village of Sommeilles and on the heavy thunder of guns in the direction of St. Menehould, I bicycled through shining peaceful country to the old chateau at Bettancourt, lent us by the Comtesse Morillot, and which equipped and organized by E. V. Lucas and his wife, was sheltering some forty children rescued from the overcrowded quarters where our workers had found them in one village or another.

Round a dining-room table with "Maman" Lucas presiding at one end over their labors, sat fifteen little French girls writing their weekly letters home to their mothers left behind, or to fathers in the trenches, and the letters in their simple, childlike French all told the same story of the kindness of their new friends "les anglais." We are thankful to think that these many months of work and comradeship together have forged chains of friendship, too strong ever to be broken.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

WALKING through the National Portrait Gallery in London some years back, we chanced upon a small picture of two little girls dressed in the quaint style of one hundred years ago. To me it was more attractive than the portraits of high-born ladies or famous generals, almost equal in interest to a lovely picture of Queen Victoria, painted when she was an old woman with beautiful silvery white hair. These little girls were Ann and Jane Taylor, authors of "Original Poems," a book much beloved by some of us in the days of our youth, but now I fear little known, containing "Little Ann and Her Mother," "Meddlesome Mattie," "The Gleaner," "Poor Puss," "Dirty Jack," and many more dear to the heart of childhood. The poetry was nothing remarkable, but it had a good jingle and was very easy to learn. The story of "Meddlesome Mattie" and how she opened her grandmother's snuff-box and promptly wished she had let it alone; of Eliza who would not be so stingy as to pick up a pin from the floor, but later was left behind when a party went to ride "to see an air balloon," and all because she could not find a pin; of the two little children who played at lighting straws, followed by terrible results, and many another were written by these two sisters, all because they so loved the little people and tried to write what they thought would please the children.

Ann and Jane were born in London, but when quite young they removed with their parents to a home in the country. Here was a big garden where the children played—many a time, we are told, even before Ann was six years old, they walked hand in hand along the garden paths, “lisp[ing] a simple couplet of their joint composition.” Their mother let them have a little room, fitted up with their belongings, just for their own use, and here they amused themselves, never needing to go to their mother to ask, “What shall we play now?” being quite able to make up their own plays.

Both sisters began to write poems when they were quite young and the “Original Poems” was about the first they published in book form. Ann married, so that she had not so much time for writing, but Jane continued to write so long as her health permitted. She wrote for the Youth's Magazine a number of essays in prose which were called “Contributions of Q. Q.” One of these, “The Discontented Pendulum,” may serve as a specimen.

THE DISCONTENTED PENDULUM.—An old clock, that had stood for fifty years in a farmer's kitchen without giving its owner any cause of complaint, early one summer's morning, before the family was stirring, suddenly stopped.

Upon this the dial-plate, if we may credit the fable, changed countenance with alarm; the hands made an ineffectual effort to continue their course; the wheels remained motionless with surprise; the weights hung speechless; each member felt disposed to lay the blame on the others. At length the dial instituted a formal inquiry as to the cause of the stagnation, when hands, wheels, weights, with one voice, protested their innocence. But now a faint tick was heard below, from the pendulum, who thus spoke:

“I confess myself to be the sole cause of the present stoppage; and am willing, for the general satisfaction, to assign my reasons. The truth is that I am tired of ticking.” Upon hearing this, the old clock became so enraged that it was on the point of striking.

“Lazy wire!” exclaimed the dial-plate, holding up its hands.

“Very good!” replied the pendulum, “it is vastly easy for you, Mistress Dial, who have always, as everybody knows, set yourself above me—it is vastly easy for you, I say, to accuse other people of laziness! You, who have had nothing to do all the days of your life but to stare people in the face and to amuse yourself with watching all that goes on in the kitchen! Think, I beseech you, how you would like to be shut up for life in this dark closet and wag backwards and forwards, year after year, as I do.”

“As to that,” said the dial, “is there not a window in your house on purpose for you to look through?”

“For all that,” resumed the pendulum, “it is very dark here, and although there is a window, I dare not stop, even for an instant, to look out. Besides, I am really weary of my way of life, and if you please, I'll tell you how I took this disgust at my employment. This morning I happened to be calculating how many times I should have to tick in the course only of the next twenty-four hours; perhaps some of you above there can give me the exact sum.”

The minute-hand, being quick at figures, instantly replied, “Eighty-six thousand, four hundred times.”

“Exactly so,” replied the pendulum; “well, I appeal to you all, if the thought of this was not enough to fatigue one? and when I began to multiply the strokes of one day by those of months and years, really it is no wonder if I felt discouraged at the prospect; so after a great deal of reasoning and hesitation, thinks I to myself—I'll stop.”

The dial could scarcely keep its countenance during this harangue; but resuming its gravity, thus replied:

“Dear Mr. Pendulum, I am really astonished that such a useful, industrious person as yourself should have been overcome by this sudden suggestion. It is true you have done a great deal of work in your time. So we have all and are likely to do; and although this may fatigue us to think of, the question is, whether it will fatigue us to do; would you now do me the favor to give about half a dozen strokes to illustrate my argument?”

The pendulum complied and ticked six times at its usual pace; “Now,” resumed the dial, “may I be allowed to inquire, if that exertion was at all fatiguing or disagreeable to you?”

“Not in the least,” replied the pendulum; “it is not of six strokes that I complain, nor of sixty, but of millions.”

“Very good,” replied the dial, “but recollect that although you may think of a million strokes in an instant, you are required to execute but one; and that, however often you may have to swing hereafter, a moment will always be given you to swing in.”

“That consideration staggers me, I confess,” said the pendulum.

“Then I hope,” resumed the dial-plate, “we shall all immediately return to our duty; for the maids will lie in bed till noon if we stand idling thus.”

Upon this the weights, who had never been accused of light conduct, used all their influence in urging him to proceed; when, as with one consent, the wheels began to turn, the hands began to move, the pendulum began to wag, and to its credit, ticked as loud as ever; while a beam of the rising sun, that streamed through a hole in the kitchen shutter, shining full upon the dial-plate, it brightened up as if nothing had been the matter. When the farmer came down to breakfast that morning, upon looking at the clock, he declared that his watch had gained half an hour in the night.—JANE TAYLOR.

NEWS ITEMS.

At the last meeting of the “Contributors” or Managers of THE FRIEND, the following four Friends were added to the list: Ann Sharpless, C. Walter Borton, Frances Tatum Rhoads and Edward W. Evans.

SEVERAL of the Monthly Meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have appointed delegates to the Cedar Lake Conference, Indiana, to be held next month. Arthur Pennell from Chester Monthly Meeting, Robert Maris from Wilmington and Rebecca Carter from Germantown.

THE Hapsburgs since 1450 fought one hundred wars up to 1900. England has been engaged in war since the year 1100 and has had two hundred and five wars—47 of them with France.

THE statistical reports of Oregon Yearly Meeting showed an actual gain over last year of 201. The total membership for the Yearly Meeting is now 2,779.

The New York Independent makes the following comment in a recent issue:

“Though The Independent has got along in years so far that we can brag a bit about its age and cast aspersions on the ‘mushroom’ periodicals of the day, we have to take off our hat to the Congregationalist and Christian World, which announces its one hundredth birthday. The Boston Recorder, of which the Congregationalist is the lineal descendant, was the first religious weekly newspaper in this or any other country. The hundredth anniversary number on the Sixth-day of last First Month contains contributions from some fifty well-known names, leaders of modern thought in various fields of religion, politics, philanthropy and literature.”

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Although there were no deaths in Philadelphia, as a result of the celebration of the Fourth, 230 accidents were reported.

A general epidemic of infantile paralysis prevails in Greater New York and two cases have been reported in Philadelphia. More than 100 persons, among them two adults, now have died of the disease since the epidemic began on the 26th ult.

Dr. J. H. Van Sickle, superintendent of Schools of Springfield, Mass., has been selected by the Harrisburg Board of Education to make a survey of the city's high school needs, preliminary to laying a million-dollar high school loan before the voters.

Forty-two streets were requisitioned for the use of small children as play centers in New York City when the Parks and Playgrounds Association opened its playground season. In addition to the streets there will be ten playgrounds, three yards, two roofs, six hospitals and institutions, twenty-three day nurseries, Washington Square Park, and a baseball league for the 250,000 children who look to the League in vacation time.

GENERAL.—Hetty Green, known as the world's wealthiest woman, who was eighty years old, died at New York on the 3rd. She had suffered three strokes of paralysis during the past two months, and for several weeks had been virtually helpless. At one time she had a membership in the Society of Friends.

George W. Kirchwey has tendered his resignation as warden of Sing Sing Prison to James M. Carter, State Superintendent of Prisons, and Thomas M. Osborne has been reappointed to the office.

More than $3,000,000 was appropriated by the war relief commission of the Rockefeller Foundation at New York during the past six months, the first half-year of the commission's existence, and of this amount more than $2,000,000 already has been expended.

Direct reports received from virtually every point in the area swept by the recent southern storm indicated that the damage to property and growing crops in Mississippi, Alabama, west Florida and southeastern Louisiana would aggregate several million dollars. Damage in Mobile to buildings and other property was estimated at about $50,000, and merchants' stocks were said to have been injured by wind and water about $50,000 additional.

The State Department has directed American Charge d'Affaires Miller, at Constantinople, to call the Turkish Government's attention again to the fact that it has done nothing with the American request that neutrals be permitted to feed the starving Christian population of Syria. Continued failure to heed the request, the Charge is instructed to say, will put a severe strain on the friendly relations between the United States and Turkey.

FOREIGN.—In England there have been numerous seizures of printed matter and prosecutions for circulating it. Priscilla Peckover, sister of Lord Peckover, is a lady nearly eighty years of age, and has been for many years an active worker for international peace. In 1911 she issued a pamphlet, made up largely of Scriptural quotations, and entitled "May a Christian be a Soldier?" The other day a police officer called at her house and impounded all the remaining copies of the tract.

A despatch on the 4th says: "The eruption of Stromboli has become serious. The flow of lava is spreading to the sparse coast settlements, burning and destroying houses, and the population is fleeing to the sea and taking refuge on relief ships sent from Messina. Telephonic communication with Messina has been interrupted."

REST AND GUIDANCE.

There is a Divine order in the oft-quoted words of the loved Shepherd psalm: "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters: He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His Name's sake." First the soul is led into rest and refreshment; and then it is led out, to prove on the dusty highway of temptation and trial the same Shepherd care it enjoyed when lying down in the green pastures and drinking of the still waters.

In our retired meetings we may enjoy the first, and in our work-a-day life we have abundant opportunities for the second. And the heavenly nourishment and refreshing the soul obtains in those seasons when the hush of another world is felt upon the gathered company, as one after another is sweetly constrained to lie down, in the silence of the creaturely, in its own particular patch of tender grass, under the eye of the Good Shepherd who is "in the midst" of His "little flock"; the soul forgetting the presence and absence of others as it is occupied alone with Him; is to fortify it for the toilsome journey, when the self-same Shepherd is known as one going before. "He leadeth me in paths of righteousness," that is, in right ways, however uphill or round about.

Of that daily guidance I would say a few simple things as I have learned them for myself. There are various methods of Divine guidance adapted to the various conditions and necessities of the soul. There are exceptionable manifestations of the Divine will, such as strong souls need, and especially those who are called to difficult and dangerous work from which human nature shrinks. To cite the prophet Isaiah: "The Lord spake thus to me with a strong hand, and instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people." The mighty hand of the Lord had gripped his life and compelled his obedience. Thus, too, was the masterful Saul of Tarsus transformed into "a slave of Jesus Christ." He spoke of himself as one "apprehended," i. e., laid hold of, by the hand of the Living Christ in glory. He could not shake off the grip of that mighty though unseen hand, and it constrained him to walk forever after in the way of the cross.

George Fox, too, was a personality whose peculiar temperament required such strong guidance, so that he came to be known in the licentious court of Charles II as a man who was "as stiff as a tree and as pure as a bell." And many another besides "the glowing Quaker" has been thus invaded and mastered by heaven with holy violence; the Divine ploughshare making deep its furrows in the soil of the hidden life. And when the times require it similarly visited and marked men will be forthcoming again.

But for the generality of us Divine direction comes by quieter and gentler methods: "I will guide thee with mine eye."

How exceedingly delicate is this method of guidance. And remember it is the normal way of learning to walk in the way of the Lord's appointing. Not by a visible pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night are the people of God guided home to-day. Not by the blast of the trumpet is the signal given. But by the glances of an eye that, even when a grieved Spirit looks through it, or burning indignation against sin and folly, is the eye of unutterable love.

The best words are at the best but clumsy media of communication for the delicate language of the Spirit. A look can say ever so much more. "Jesus turned and looked upon Peter. . . . and Peter went out and wept bitterly." A single mute yet eloquent look from those eyes did it.

Said one: "What tender intercourse can pass through the eyes! There is a whole language in their silent communion. But let it be marked that this eye-guidance implies very intimate fellowship. Eye-speech is the speech of lovers. We can be guided by His eye only when we are gazing on God."

But most likely the kind of guidance we know most about, though we are more often as not unaware of it at the time, is the strange guidance by hindrances. Paul and his company were "forbidden of the Holy Ghost" to preach the Word in Asia. They essayed again and again, but "the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not." Here the hindrance was apparently inward. No liberty from the Spirit! "A stop in the mind," a Friend might say. Again: "I will hedge up her way with thorns." Here the hindrance is clearly outward. A combination of untoward circumstances over which one has no control. Ah! there is then also the ministry of the closed door, the guidance by impediment. Sure I am, that when our journey is ended, and we review life's lessons with larger and clearer vision, we shall see guidance in numberless events for which we pity ourselves to-day. As Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler wrote:

A streamlet started, singing seaward-ho!

A stone which stopped it with the stern command,

"Thus far and never farther shalt thou go,"

There, where the tiny stream was wont to flow,

A shining lake appeared with silver strand,

Refreshing flower-strewn fields on either hand—

Reflecting starry skies and sunset glow.

So oftentimes we find our progress stayed
 By stones that bar the steps we fain had trod,
 Whereat we murmur with a sense of wrong;
 Unmindful that by means like this is made
 That sea of glass where stand the saints of God
 To sing the new and never-ending song.

If the streamlet could speak it also could tell of guidance by hindering.

MAX I. REICH.

THE SERVANT OF THE LORD.

WM. W. CABBURY, CANTON CHRISTIAN COLLEGE.

"'Tis too light for thy being my servant,
 To raise up the tribes of Jacob,
 Or gather the survivors of Israel.
 So I will set thee a light of the Nations,
 To be my salvation to the end of the earth."

Such is the translation given by George Adam Smith of the sixth verse of the forty-ninth chapter of Isaiah. God's chosen people were in exile in Babylon, and doubtless to many the hope of a return to Jerusalem had faded from their view. In the midst of this gloomy outlook the prophet bursts forth with this glorious prediction of the future mission of God's people: "Thou art my Servant" says Jehovah to Israel, "and as such a greater task awaits thee than the uplift and reorganization of thy own people, for thou hast a mission to the heathen nations of the world, that they may be saved."

A study of the passages in Isaiah which speak of the "Servant" imply three conceptions of this term—Israel as a nation, a chosen remnant, and an individual as representative of the nations.

1. Jehovah chose the people of Israel to bear witness to the world of His unity. As a nation they stood for certain great truths and so became the Servant of God. This idea may be well applied to the United States. There are four large granite pillars supporting the tower of City Hall, Philadelphia. A study of the figures carved at the tops of these pillars shows that they represent the peoples of four continents, illustrating symbolically the fact that America has all the peoples of the world in her debt for her present great civilization. Thus from Asia have we received our religion, our moral codes, and the germs of our philosophy. From Europe has come our culture, art, literature, science and law. A large portion of the laborers of our country are from Africa, while to the American continent we owe the natural resources with which our land is so blessed. As we have thus inherited such wealth of good things from the different sections of the world, America in a special sense has a mission to return to the world good measure for what she has received. We stand for the equality of mankind, individual liberty and high ideals in civic and personal life. As true patriots we should take pride in this mission of our country, not simply to maintain our own national independence, but to spread abroad these great truths to the world—America the Servant of the Lord.

2. But in many passages the prophet uses the term "Servant" as referring not to Israel as a nation, but to a chosen few—a remnant who had remained faithful when others had lost hope and followed the gods of Babylon. As Friends we often pride ourselves as having an especial message to the world. Our teaching that God may be approached by each individual without intervention of priest or the use of sacraments is unique. We have a definite stand in regard to war, and many other tenets of our faith mark us as the "Servant of Jehovah" with a message for the world. With this in view let us again study these words of the prophet. As God's servant it is too little for us to content ourselves with strengthening our own meetings and appealing to our scattered members. Our message is to the world, to those who know nothing of Friends. If our message is a God-given one, and I sincerely believe it is, we must proclaim it abroad, and we must not be satisfied simply with work within the limits of our own meetings. An earnest effort to spread the truths of our Society to others would accomplish much in the strengthening of our meetings and in deepening our own spiritual lives.

3. There is a more personal interpretation, however, of the "Servant" in these chapters of Isaiah. The prophet looking forward into the centuries beheld that "suffering servant," that representative individual of the Jewish nation who in a peculiar and especial sense should reveal the heart of God to men and lead them back to Him. This servant was Christ, and for all time He will remain the truest fulfilment of this prophecy. And yet we may likewise see in this individual servant an application to ourselves. Each one who is a follower of Christ is called to be His servant, and as such we may not be content with our own soul's salvation. It is not enough that we should seek for our own culture, our own development. If we are to be servants of God we must be as lights to our fellows, that they, too, may be saved.

The word "light" is frequently found in the Gospels. In some passages it appears to refer to the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Elsewhere the disciples are spoken of as "the light of the world." The light of God which has been shed abroad in our own hearts must shine forth into the hearts of those around us.

"To be my Salvation!" It is significant that the prophet does not say to "preach" my salvation. The meaning seems to be that whether as a nation, a selected group or as individuals, if we claim to be servants of Jehovah that service implies the spreading of the saving knowledge of God, which has been revealed to us, to other nations, other groups and other individuals.

When others have come unto God through us, whether by our example, our teaching or preaching, then may we be called, in a sense, their salvation. It is indeed by the acceptance of Christ that men are saved, but we are called to be His servants, the instruments whereby He makes known His salvation to the ends of the earth. This verse, then, should give us a new conception of what it means to be a loyal patriot, a true Friend, and a disciple of Christ. Our watchword will then be America for the nations of the world; Friends for the kingdom of God; Individuals for service to our fellow-men.

MOORESTOWN, N. J.

SILVANUS PHILLIPS THOMPSON.

The death of Professor Thompson was noted in a previous issue. From three appreciations in The Friend (London) the following portions convey a good portrait of the man.

John William Graham says:

"Silvanus Thompson has always appeared to me to be perhaps the ablest living member of the Society of Friends. Such a statement cannot be made dogmatically about anyone, considering the great variety of quality and range in human faculty, and the great differences in the opportunity for its exercise; but he was remarkable for ability in so many different ways.

"He was a scientific researcher of great distinction, one of the band of men in the early days of applied electricity who extended the bounds of our control over nature. But he had the literary faculty as well as the scientific—had an ear for words and the faculty of style, as his biographical works show. He loved to read Greek and Latin and was at home in questions of New Testament criticism. He was also a marvelously clear, interesting and forcible teacher, and, what is again a different thing, a brilliant popular lecturer. I do not ever remember listening to a lecture so good as the one on "Light" which he delivered to a large audience of working-men at the time of the British Association at York. Not all researchers are literary men, not all literary men are teachers, not all teachers are good lecturers; but, in addition to all these, he was a notable administrator, both as head of the Technical College at Finsbury, and more publicly in the reorganization and management of the University of London. From all these things he could turn easily aside in his vacations to the practice of art. His house was full of his own paintings of Alpine and other holiday scenes, which were all far above amateur quality.

"Lastly, he had the religious sense in no common degree. He was a sound and earnest Friend and a weighty and valued minister. He had some torch-bearing to do and some accusations of heresy to suffer under in a period now happily gone by; that needed courage and faithfulness."

The matter of his personal faith is thus dealt with by Dr. George Newman:

"There is one other matter that I would speak of with great reserve—namely, his own personal Faith. More than once we had long talks together on this subject, talks which left on my mind an indelible impression. He had a grand confidence in the universe and in the unity and ways of Nature, a belief in the Invisible and an implicit and almost child-like trust in God. Deep down below his philosophy of life there lay an allegiance, a warm, growing, faithful, clear allegiance to our Lord. Jesus of Nazareth was to him the Son of Man and the Son of God, the revelation of the Father, the Evangel. Down to the depths He makes His appeal; out of the depths we cry to Him and He brings to us the answers of God—that was his Faith."

T. Edmund Harvey concludes some biographical notes with this paragraph:

"The war brought to him many burdens, trouble of spirit for the great wrong which was rending the nations asunder, and constantly increasing responsibilities, through the difficulties under which his college work had to be carried on: he worked on bravely until at last the tired frame gave way, and after two days of illness, free from suffering, he entered peacefully into rest. The love and honor in which he was held by his friends and colleagues was shown at the beautiful meeting for worship held at Westminster on Sixth-day, the 16th inst., but more touching than the tribute of the leaders of science was the love and devotion of his old students and assistants and the testimonies written by unlettered men who had come to know and love him in the daily intercourse of life, so modest with all his wisdom, so gentle with all his learning, because he loved so well his fellow-men and walked so humbly with his God."

MEETING OF THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

Twenty-five years ago an aspirant for educational service in the Society of Friends applied to two of the most eminent educators of the country for suggestions as to the best means of inspiration and equipment. Curiously enough the first item advised by each of them was the same, viz.: that a membership in the National Association be acquired and maintained. Doubtless this was intended as a corrective for the "narrow provincialism" of a mere denominational point of view. Not a few Friends since that day have been accustomed to seek this corrective, and the meetings of the Association are generally attended by a good representation from our Society. This was the case at the meeting concluded in New York City on the 10th inst.

A few brief excerpts from the press reports will indicate a little of the character of this meeting.

As to range of topics we have the following:

"The meeting of 1916 will be remembered as probably the largest and most ambitious in the history of the National Education Association. It has had before it nearly all the educational questions of the day, and they have been attacked bravely and seriously. There has been a greater interest in some of the non-scholastic features of education than in the more literary and academic pursuits. On the whole, the convention has not shown a great sympathy with the classical phases of school work. The emphasis has been placed on the practical, the industrial, and vocational. The violence of the tendency in these directions leads one to believe that there may be in time a reaction against intense radicalism and a return to more conservative ideas of what young people should study and how they should study.

"At no other convention of the Association has so much time and detailed attention been given to the subject of special education—the education of physically and mentally and temperamentally unfit children. The assumption on which was based all the discussion in this department was this—that these children are unfit only for the same sort of training which the normal child receives, and not at all unfit to be trained individually and prepared for some special work which they can do and which will make them economically independent."

This was illustrated in the addresses of two justly famous teachers.

Hannah H. Walker, Director of Special Classes of Public Schools in Albany, said:

"A ten-year-old incorrigible boy formulated for me the basic principle of our work as trainers of special class children. A new boy with a meagre knowledge of our language had arrived. I tested him in number work, using the buying and selling of newspapers as a medium of interpretation. Realizing I was failing to reach his consciousness, a little newsboy hastened to my side and whispered, 'Teacher, he don't sell papers. Try him on shoe-strings. That's what he sells.' This taught me to draw my illustrations from the child's own life."

"The care and treatment of the individual child is the only way to insure moral progress," said Olive M. Jones, in summing up the week's discussion. "Intellectual and physical progress can be made en masse, but not moral. We are working also towards a greater co-operation between all the agencies which are helping the child who is different—both in schools and in social organizations. One of the greatest of our aims is to keep homes and families intact. This can only be done by intelligent visiting teachers, who find out the home conditions of the children."

The most masterful address of the week was by the prince of educators—G. Stanley Hall on "Education and the Present War." His conclusion that the present demand is for spiritual, not military, "preparedness" brought a note of applause far more significant than the adoption later of a formal resolution which was characterized as a "straddle" on military drill. The election of Robert Judson Aley, known as a "pacifist," as president for next year is not without important bearing on the questions of the hour.

Many of the 30,000 registered as delegates doubtless carried home this conclusion of Thomas Stockham Baker:

"After a week of addresses on almost every phase of school work, one returns to the conclusion that the future success of the schools depends upon the character and intelligence of the individual teacher. New pedagogic devices, new types of schools, new theories of education, mean very little unless the individuals who do the every-day labor have a sympathy for their tasks and are well trained for their profession. Being well trained means something more than having a knowledge of what has been written on the technique of teaching. The teachers who will impress their personalities upon their pupils are those who have been liberally trained—whose education has not been limited to the specialized preparation for their positions."

"WE SHOULD DO MORE IF WE TRIED TO DO LESS."—
Repose of the right sort is one of the most urgent needs of the time. It is not to be viewed as a luxury for the few or a solace for the eccentric, but as a constituent of every life which aspires to be truly noble and good. We are often in a fever of excitement, and create a small hurricane of dust in our rapid flight hither and thither. But we should do more if we tried to do less, and what was lost in volume would be amply made up in quality.

TRUE MINISTERS.

Have ye looked for the sheep in the desert,
For those who have missed their way?
Have ye been in the wild waste places,
Where the lost and wandering stray?
Have ye trodden the lonely highway,
The foul and the darksome street?
It may be ye'd see in the gloaming
The print of My wounded feet.

Have ye folded home to your bosom
The trembling, neglected lamb?
And taught to the little lost one
The sound of the Shepherd's name?
Have ye searched for the poor and needy,
With no clothing, no home, no bread?
The Son of Man was among them—
He had nowhere to lay His head.

Have ye carried the living water
To the parched and thirsty soul?
Have ye said to the sick and wounded,
"Christ Jesus makes thee whole?"
Have ye told my fainting children
Of the strength of the Father's hand?
Have ye guided the tottering footstep
To the shore of the "golden land?"

Have ye wept with the broken-hearted
In the agony of woe,
Ye might hear me whispering beside you,
"Tis the pathway I often go."
My brethren, my friends, my disciples,
Can ye dare to follow me?
Then wherever the Master dwelleth,
There shall the servant be.

—Ez change.

PRESENT TENDENCIES AMONG QUAKERS.

[Under the above heading, The Congregationalist had an article some weeks ago by one not a Friend which is in part as follows:]

The Quakers do not believe in war. They believe that the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," applies to nations as well as to individuals. None of them will volunteer to do service in the army because there they would be obliged to kill. Yet they are willing to risk their own lives in other service which needs to be done in connection with the war. They will sweep the seas for mines, which is a dangerous occupation. They are fearless and conscientious in this work. Every mine they destroy means the possible saving of lives, according to their views. One English Quaker in his trawler removed 250 of these mines from the sea. Ordinarily the Quakers do not increase their membership to any large extent. Friends from the beginning have been consistent advocates of peace—in fact, they were the original "Peace at any price folks." In our own wars they suffered greatly for their advocacy of peace. The draft in President Lincoln's day got them into all sorts of trouble.

They have always been reformers and followed up their reforms at almost any cost. At least five of the world's great reform measures have been aggressively advocated by Friends—Peace, Absolute Equality of Women, Prison Reform, Temperance and Anti-Slavery. Women have had the same privileges in being recommended for ministers that men have had. As Jane Adams suggests, Friends have not grown in numbers appreciably, but for many years they have been a mighty force for leavening the whole lump. They have been a "corn of wheat" flung into the ground to die, and they have brought forth much fruit, though it is not called by their name.

This age does not deal gently with Friends. Their loose church government, the reputation for being a peculiar people, and a certain lack of aggressiveness in seeking numbers, have kept them from growing. They have passed through a like evolution to that of Israel when it wanted a king. In the West especially they have demanded pastors, music, an order of worship and more conformity to the "world." They have gotten these, but the spirit of gentleness still persists and keeps them from the desired growth. In their striving after the things that had the credit of making other denominations great, Friends have fallen somewhat from their high estate.

I sat at the head of an old-fashioned Friends' meeting for five years, so I can never forget the characteristics that gave to their gatherings a remarkable religious power. There was the silent meeting—a living meeting, for the atmosphere was alive with the presence of the Eternal, and God spoke home to human hearts with a still, small voice. No doubt this was in the consciousness of Whittier when he wrote:

"Drop Thy still dews of quietness
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace."

Hurry was unknown in those meetings, nor was there anything of the feeling that something must be going on during every moment. God was there, waiting to bless every life that opened to Him—that was enough.

Many Friends' meetings, especially those of the West, now have a pastor. It not infrequently occurs that he or she is quite uneducated and inexperienced and it sometimes happens is little more than a "ranter." Many of their meetings have lost the dignity, the quietness and the waiting for God to speak that characterized them formerly. In some cases Friends' boasted lack of form has become in itself a formality. The plan that Friends follow of "recommending" to the ministry those who give promise of being helpful in public speech in their meetings, without giving the candidates special training for the task, has brought about this condition that they probably have more of those they call "recommended ministers" who are unfitted for the task of edification than any other denomination, numbers considered. These larger meetings, especially in the East, still retain the dignity and reverential atmosphere of other days.

The music in most Friends' meetings is poor. It is not possible to bring a denomination suddenly to great musical standards. Friends are so new at the task that they have little or no heritage of hymns. They have produced few hymn writers and their meetings do not take kindly to spending money for music or for proper musical instruments. They protested so long against worshipping God with machinery that it is hard now for them to get into the musical mood. So far as their music is concerned, many of their Western meetings differ little from the old-fashioned Methodist revival.

Friends, with all their supposed quietness and calmness, have not been free from theological troubles. They had, as did Congregationalists, a controversy over the Person of Christ, which resulted in a separation, so that there are now at least two bodies of Friends.

What of the future of Friends? Even if they do not grow, or face gradual extinction, they have done an immortal work. They are to be found in every denomination and are usually loyal to the great fundamentals, are spiritually-minded and are usually on the right side of great questions. The great denominations have almost without exception come to emphasize the spiritual message that made Friends great. They have kept their fundamental doctrines before the world until greater forces than their own have caught the vision. They have indeed brought forth much fruit.

"HELP some one worse off than yourself and you will find you are better off than you thought."

"BE not in haste. Better know one truth than guess at a thousand. Remember this: there is no truth but what hath a witness in God's light within thee."

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

In speaking of Friends and Conscription, Robert O. Mennell is quoted as follows in regard to conscientious objectors not in membership with us:

But were these men really outside the Society? George Fox spoke of his followers as those who were "Friendly to the Truth," and in this sense these men were Friends. Fox surely was right: throughout the ages there is and has been but one Church in the world, composed of those who seek and strive to uphold the Truth. And the members of that Church were to be found in every denomination, in every nation and in every classification of human life. If our Society was to be more than an episode in religious history, we must grasp the significance of our founder's ideal and allow no boundary to separate us from others who also are striving to uphold the Truth of Christ. In that connection R. O. Mennell expressed the Committee's sense of indebtedness to Clifford Allen, the chairman, and to his Committee of the No-Conscription Fellowship for their inspiring leadership and their devoted work. The cause of Peace had no braver or truer advocates.

Under the head of Preparation for Universal Peace, two reported utterances follow:

ARNOLD S. ROWTREE said the Society was indeed in sore perplexity. A well-known public man had recently said to him: "I am sure the Society of Friends is right if it takes the New Testament for its model; and I am sure the Churches, in trying to justify war, are mistaken. But the real difficulty is that you cannot run an empire on the principles of the New Testament." This was the view of a large section of the population in Germany and of an increasing number of men and women in this country. Therefore what we had to decide was not to think only of what our Society could do, but really find out whether we believed that Christianity was possible to-day. We might find consolation in what had been said: "In your patience you shall win your souls." Could we get much further than that, waiting to know the will of God for our nation, for Europe, and for ourselves, encouraging not only ourselves, but others to enter into what a well-known mystic has called "the spirit of the Quest" for the truth? It was "the spirit of the Quest" that helped. Wasn't it perfectly true that we ourselves were not prepared to speak certainly on these great problems? Even amongst Friends we had not learned to differ satisfactorily. Might our membership be led out in this desire of finding the truth. If peace were declared to-morrow, we should be faced with a tremendous industrial difficulty. How peace was to be preserved in industrial life was a most difficult question; there was no one clear unmistakable note on that subject. He hoped whatever else the Society sent out they would embody this position of waiting, and watching, and praying. The seekers found the Friends in the early days of the Society, let the Friends now find the seeker. Do not let us think we could tell the peoples of Europe exactly what they could do, but go forth in the spirit of the Quest after God and Truth, to find His will, and having found it to follow in that path which was opened up before us.

HENRY T. HODGKIN questioned whether the Society had done enough serious thinking about this matter. Peace might be approached through three channels—peace by victory, peace by negotiation, peace by change of heart. He believed it was the last named means that must be preferred by Friends. He was afraid the Society had no right to speak, and if we did it must be out of a feeling of deep contrition and repentance. We could not say to our countrymen, "It is time for you to repent." It is we (the Society) who should repent. Our first duty was to lead ourselves into peace, and then we might lead the nations into the same place. But we might perhaps be called to a menial place of service in this great matter. Let us wait for the voice of the Master.

W. A. CADBURY'S VISIT TO RUSSIA.

WILLIAM A. CADBURY, by leave of the Meeting and at the request of the Clerk, gave some particulars of his recent visit, with others, to Russia on behalf of the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee. Their purpose had been to inquire into the condition of the refugees on the eastern front. At the British Embassy at Petrograd they received a letter from the Minister for the Interior containing the following references: "These gentlemen are Quakers, a sect whose trustworthiness is beyond question. Perhaps you remember how helpful this Society was to our people during the famine. If you will be good enough to help and protect them I shall be grateful." The deputation met at Moscow, where he was very pleased to find, on visiting the offices of the relief organization, fullest particulars set out in good form, so that one could immediately get a grasp of the problem of relief. They found that there were two and a-half millions of refugees in Russia, distributed over almost every part of the country. Something like a fifth of the total were Poles, and all the rest were Russians. Of the terrible story of the great exodus on foot he had no time to speak. "The Way of the Cross," a Russian book translated into English, he recommended to those who felt strongly on the subject. In Moscow the problem was well in hand, but the country districts needed help. The Russian Government gave about 4d. a day for the refugees. The prospect for the coming winter was extremely grave. The party of Friends experienced nothing but kindness during their journeys, and they agreed that the immediate need was a capable doctor and a staff of trained nurses and workers; in the supply of these and other demands, including the financial one, he hoped Friends would take their full part. He was glad of the work of the War Victims' Relief Committee, and hoped it would be extended.

"Training for Citizenship" was considered Second-day afternoon as a part of the subject of education. The report had this keynote:

One thing seems to stand out clearly, the need for more education in social matters, and we believe that there is a definite call to us to give our members a much better equipment for citizenship.

The world believed the ideal of the Society was unattainable, and Friends themselves had found the same. Some would remember a great address to Friends by Norman Angell, in which he uttered some such words as these: "This community is perhaps destined to become in her next generation or two one of the few cities of refuge left to a civilization which seems really in danger of going to pieces." And he queried how it was that the Quaker view of life was not better understood by the world, and urged Friends to add to the spirit to which we were committed a definite attempt through whatever intellectual will was necessary to make our view of life understood by the community. And now came the searching question, how can we make good? We had found ourselves wanting in the day of visitation, not so much in willingness to serve as in knowledge of how to do it.

Briefly, the scheme was that at some time between the ages of, say, twenty-one and thirty, every member of the Society, rich and poor alike, should take a year for training and preparation for citizenship. The aim of the course would be to create in the minds of the students a new attitude towards civic, national and international problems, so that they might help to a saner and more generous public opinion. They would gain a better knowledge of modern life, of the competing interests of employers and employed, and of State and other agencies that so vitally affected the lives of the workers. In other words, they would get to know the symptoms of the disease in the body politic. They would be brought into close contact with all sorts and conditions of men, and they would realize, what we often forget, that these things were their care. The training should be both theoretical and practical, and should be of the very best obtainable. Probably a beginning should be made in centres where universities are already in existence. The cost should be kept as low as possible, simplicity of life should obtain throughout, and the whole expense should be borne by the Society as a whole, out of a central fund raised by the Yearly Meeting. We had heard a good deal this Yearly Meeting about the stain upon our country's honor in the persecution of conscience that was going on. What about the stains upon the honor of Christian men and women in the conditions of many of our cities—the disease, the dirt, the poverty, all curable, all preventable?

If any Friend thought the scheme was small, it must be remembered that it was very fundamental. It seemed to be almost universally recognized by Christian thinkers that the foundation of international war, and the foundation of industrial war were alike rooted in the spirit of greed, and the desire for gain and power, which lay at the root of many social evils. The best spirits in the churches were deeply concerned about that, and many were quite frankly looking to the Society of Friends for a lead. "What do you as Pacifists intend to do? What is this better way?" And we must find a way, and it would be a hard and uphill path that we must tread. But we believed that God would be with us all the way. This was not an attempt to substitute social service for faith in God, but to express our faith in a loving Father, through a loving care for His poor and burdened. There would be a great need of money, but it was hoped that would not stand in the way, if the need and practicability of the work were shown. We must show how we could apply the Christian ethic to daily life. The training scheme might not revolutionize the world, but it might help to produce men and women who would be able to show something to the world of the will of God for our present civilization.

Second-day Evening, Twenty-ninth of Fifth Month.

The Clerk reminded the meeting of the fact that the fifth anniversary of the sailing of the first missionary sent out by Friends for regular work in the foreign field will occur in the autumn of the present year and proceeded:

"The past fifty years have witnessed expansion into numerous fields of service abroad, the response of scores of men and women to the promptings of the Holy Spirit, and the bringing in of many from heathen darkness into the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. They have also brought much new life into the Church at home, as the opportunity and need have been faced with courage and faith. We believe that great gain will come to us by reviewing this period, seeking to learn its lessons and to draw fresh inspiration for to-day from the record of our Father's dealings with us. . . . We hope that the Yearly Meeting may see its way to encourage us in this effort. . . ."

THE ANNIVERSARY.

JOHN MORLAND remarked how few present there must be who could compare the present Yearly Meeting with those held in 1865 and 1866. It could scarcely be known for the same, so different was its present constitution, and most of the individuals in evidence then had now passed away. At that time there was little opening for younger men to speak. Men Friends only were present, women Friends meeting across the Yard. Very different subjects were under consideration then. In 1861, following an address by Isaac Brown, a document was issued calling the attention of Friends to the place to be filled by visits to foreign countries, which should be arranged through ordinary channels. Proposals for settled service abroad should come before the Meeting for Sufferings, but to his knowledge none such were made. In 1865 a conference was called, at the time of Yearly Meeting, by a small group of Friends, mostly from the west of England. Thirty-six gathered, of whom the only survivors were now Fielden Thorp and himself. Later the Provisional Committee was appointed, of which he was the only living member, since the death of Joseph Storrs Fry.

Such was the starting of what all must feel to have been a tree of God's own planting, which had blessed the Society as well as the fields abroad, and which had been a great influence in calling us out of ourselves, out of the narrowness of routine, out of a by-water, into the main stream of the river of life. In one of the writings of J. Rendel Harris, he describes the Mount of Vision, with its stone inscribed with the words: "Look back, look forward." This might be our motto for the present occasion.

THE JUBILEE.

HENRY T. HODOKIN said: Friends may very easily wonder whether it is suitable for us, at a time like this, when so many great questions are stirring the Society, and when our hearts are most deeply moved in regard to our particular national attitude, to draw the attention of Friends to this work, which perhaps, to some, hardly seems cognate to these larger questions. Others, I believe, will realize that this is not a true representation of the situation; but that now, when we are seeing the terrible effects of the clashing interests of different nations, is a time when we want to strengthen every piece of sound constructive work which is being done towards bringing the nations to a better understanding of one another. The Society of Friends has a peculiar service in relation to this particular problem; and the missionary work of the Society ought to be, and indeed it has been, a real factor in helping to this mutual understanding. The task of the missionary is not only, although firstly, to represent to peoples abroad the best which we possess, the faith in Jesus Christ; but it is also to bring back to us an understanding of these peoples and their conditions, the best of them, in order that we may grow to a better understanding of one another, and that we may find our unity in that deeper and better understanding. A Friend who said to me the other day that he had never been so much impressed with the necessity of foreign missions as he had since the outbreak of this war, was, I believe, but expressing what many Friends feel—that this is a time when work of this kind must be prosecuted more than ever. Undertaken in this spirit, it is surely one of the many ways in which the Church may serve to strengthen international understanding and goodwill. So we come at this time, believing that we ought to bring this home to Friends, as far as we can, so that they may understand and face for themselves the meaning of this growth of the past fifty years, what it has meant in the life of our Society and in its service for the world. And in doing this, what we want to do is not simply to speak of the work of a particular organization, but rather to bring back, as it were, into all the channels of service at home, the garnered fruit of these fifty years of service abroad, in order that every department of our life may be strengthened, as we take this larger outlook and step out with further faith to the tasks that lie before us.

At the close of the discussion a minute was passed, expressing thankfulness for the fifty years' record of service and sacrifice, and commending the special effort to the support of Friends.

Third-day Morning, Thirtieth of Fifth Month.

For the third time the subject of Preparation for Peace occupied the close attention of the Yearly Meeting, the business sitting on Third-day morning having taken the place of the meetings for worship at Devonshire House and Westminster.

The Clerk at the outset, reminded Friends that it had been felt on the last occasion that no course was clearly open for adoption at that time, but that there was need for prayer and further waiting to learn where the Lord would lead us. He would read the minute made at the close of the last sitting at which the subject had been considered, and would remind Friends that it was not absolutely essential that we should do something; it was essential that we should hear the voice of God.

Third-day Afternoon.

FOURTH SESSION ON PEACE.

There was again a large company in the afternoon on re-assembling for the fourth consideration of action in relation to Peace. The devotional period was somewhat more extended than usual. In course of the meeting, W. C. Allen, who was expecting to leave the Yearly Meeting after that sitting, reminded Friends that repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ were the fundamentals from which would develop our individual life, and the aggressive activity of the Church; and concluded with a benediction of hope and love.

The Clerk on the resumption of business, expressed the hope that Friends would now come to some definite decision. It was not necessary to do anything, though it was necessary to find out what was required of us. If there was any duty which seemed to be incumbent upon us, then Friends should not withhold.

A lack of space forbids us to quote further at length from the printed reports. At one of the late sessions:

HENRY T. HODOKIN, referring to his American visit last autumn, said the concern had been with him for some time previously but way had not opened. It had been his purpose to give the message of the Society of Friends, not exactly on war, but with regard to those things which made for war. From Orthodox Friends in Philadelphia he had a cordial welcome, and a committee was appointed to co-operate with him. On the same day he laid his concern before the Hicksite body in the same city and they likewise gave hearty assistance. He spoke about thirty times in and around Philadelphia, besides his visits further inland. Perhaps his most striking experience among Friends was the week he spent in Ohio at their boarding-school, near Barnesville. In the quiet of that school he had been conscious that there was a very deep spiritual influence at work. He left that meeting with the heartfelt desire that these Friends might have their usefulness extended. The more progressive pastoral meetings in the same State were also visited. He had never felt such deep sorrow over the divisions among Friends in America as during that visit, and he looked forward with hope to the time of reunion. During his visit he had been privileged to bring together many pacifists outside the Society along with Friends.

As the meeting was about to close, Silvanus P. Thompson asked to be allowed to refer to a statement at a previous sitting, that the Yearly Meeting represented only a small section of the Society of Friends, and to protest against such an assertion. Surely the Yearly Meeting truly represented the whole 20,000 of the members, and it seemed to him ungracious to hint otherwise. He hoped such a statement would not again be made. The Yearly Meeting was in fact so constituted that it did actually represent not only every Quarterly Meeting, but nearly every Monthly Meeting in the Society.

The concluding business at the final session on Fourth-day evening was the reading of the General Epistle, which appeared in full in THE FRIEND three weeks ago.

The reading of the Epistle was, as usual, followed by a period of worship, in which thanksgiving was rendered for the spirit enabling those who had been concerned in the draft of the Epistle to speak plainly and to write fearlessly and faithfully the message the Society was sending forth to the world.

After exhortation from several Friends, and the signing by the Clerk of the General Epistle, concluding minutes were presented, the closing one stating: "In bringing this Yearly Meeting to a close we have again to acknowledge the good hand of our God upon us. Last year and in the Adjourned Yearly Meeting since, we examined in the light of recent events our ancient testimonies and especially that in regard to Peace, and were obliged to reaffirm them unhesitatingly. This year we have tried to discover and be faithful to the implications of these testimonies. It has at times seemed as though we were groping in the dark, as though there were no clear path for us to follow, but as we watched and waited, guidance has come, and we have been able to move forward. There is much more light to break forth from His word. Let us be faithful to that which is given and tarry and pray, believing that it will grow ever brighter and brighter. As we then place ourselves in God's hands, waiting to receive and ready to flash out His light, He may condescend to use us as His heralds and give to us some word for the healing of the nations. Should He thus honor us, let us ever remember that the excellency of the power is in God, for of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things, to whom be glory for ever. Amen."

"The business of the Yearly Meeting being concluded, we separated, intending to meet again in London at the appointed time next year, if the Lord permit. Whilst concluding our business we leave the Meeting for Sufferings at liberty to call together the representatives appointed to this Yearly Meeting should such a course be necessary. Such Meeting, if summoned, is to be considered an adjournment of this Meeting, and is to be open to all Friends. Should no such adjourned Meeting be called, the proceedings of this Meeting are to terminate with this minute."

The Meeting then separated.

"A FEW grapes prove the plant to be a vine, and not a thorn."

"As no flattery can heal a bad conscience, so no cruelty can wound a good one."

PARADISE.

I bless Thee, Lord, because I grow
Among the trees, which in a row
To Thee both fruit and order owe.

What open force or hidden charm
Can blast my fruit, or bring me harm,
While the inclosure is Thine arm?

Inclose me still, for fear I start,
Be to me rather sharp and tart,
Than let me want Thy hand and art.

When Thou dost greater judgments spare,
And with Thy knife but prune and pare,
Even fruitful trees more fruitful are.

Such sharpness shows the sweetest friend:
Such cuttings rather heal than rend:
And such beginnings touch their end.

A TERRIBLE TYPHOON TEST FOUR DAYS FROM CHINA.

We embarked at Kobe, Japan, for the final stretch of our journey, a journey that, including several short stops, had already lasted more than nine weeks. At last we began to feel that we were actually homeward bound.

Only four days away lay China—huge, inchoate, bowed with the weight of vast sins, sins that must be paid for, a sorry sight in the tangled mesh of her heathen impotence, but with a spiritual prospect (if so be that the home church arouses itself) as bright as the promises of God.

Only four days away lay proud and historic Shantung Province; and at the east end of it our own Tsingtau Station, with the country field so dear to me, where I had walked and roughed it, and preached through the villages, and sorrowed with and for the humble Christians—real spiritual children.

The experience that we were to face was made the more dramatic in contrast because of the nature-peace of the scenes we were to enjoy for the first two of those four eventful days. We passed through the world-famed Japan Inland Sea, a veritable dream of beauty. It was like gliding along over waters charmed by good genii in a pleasant fairy-land. Now the pine-clad hills came close to us, as if they were magic banks crowding out to greet us. Now they receded from us, as magic islands well might do, and left us in the midst of a bay-like enlargement full of real islands, beautiful in a bewildering variety of size and charm.

Here we rushed along on swift current, as of an Alpine river surging through one of its wondrous lake embouchures; there we floated on placid waters, over which was borne to us the tinkle of bells from the Buddhist monasteries that crowned the encircling hills. Here were scenes as charming as anything of which the Italian lake region can boast; others not so grand as the Swiss can boast, but none the less attractive.

It all had that indefinable, petite loveliness that is so associated with many of the famed beauty spots of Japan, and seemed to dovetail in naturally with the attractive gardens, the dainty silk patterns, the lovely Cloisonné, the exquisite bronzes, and with the innumerable other artistic things and ways and touches of this wonderful people.

And all the while the sight of many trim stone wharves and embankments of many lighthouses neatly planted on attractive heights, the endless perspective of strange sailcraft and jaunty tugs, as noisy as busy, together with the omnipresence of keen-eyed officials, gave one the sense of being safe and well-cared for.

The attractiveness of landscape and waterscape tended to lull us to forget the seamy side of it all—the women with babies fastened to backs, bent in rice swamp drudgery, and veritably laboring like the dumb and driven beasts; women living in dark holes under the water line of their junk-homes, and tugging at clumsy sweeps and at heavy oars and rudders; women half-clad, mere human automata, coaling ships. And there were the temple precincts, which were at once Vanity Fairs and the paradise of money changers and usurers and sharpers and Alexander Coppermiths. And the popular temples themselves, where the sound of coins falling into the boxes before deities could be approached was constant; where kneeling worshippers clapped their hands to attract the notice of placid Buddhas; where the faces of favorite gods were, like the bronzed foot of St. Peter in Rome, rubbed smooth by suppliants; where the altars of the Goddess of Mercy were stacked with written prayers purchased of the priests; where the figures of stone and wooden Japanese Esculapiuses were effusively kissed by parents and children who longed for healing.

At last, past Shimoneseki, called the Gibraltar of Japan, and past Moji, the Japan terminus of the "ferry" to Korea, we faced the open sea eastward—a sea not wondrous blue like the Ægean, or like the waters around Honolulu, where balmy air invites to the sea-bath, but cold and olive-green that changes to a dirty yellow as one approaches the China coast.

Not long had we been out when the little Japanese captain of our dinky, bobbing craft, smilingly whispered to us men that a typhoon was ahead! Clouds rapidly gathered, filling the sky and assuming a uniform leaden hue.

It was not long before some passengers began to grow limp and retire to their berths. . . . The wind increased to what the captain called "a gale." The steamer plunged with increasing violence. To the plunge was added a roll distressing even to experienced ocean travelers. There could hardly be wicker-looking waves. They seemed as heavy as lead, lifted themselves slowly and deliberately, and then viciously threw themselves against the frail craft. The engine pounded laboriously, the whole ship trembled, and repeatedly the propeller worked helplessly high out of water as the ship plunged nose down into the sea.

A few days before we had experienced heavy weather on the Pacific—more assuringly named than acting—had run in front of a typhoon, had encountered the equinoctial, which had blown seventy miles an hour. But that had been on one of the biggest and strongest steamers that sails between America and Asia, of more than ten times the tonnage of our craft, carrying many big life-boats and rafts and preservers, manned by an experienced crew, and captained by a Britisher of ability and reputation.

We sat on the upper deck, in the lee of a small deckhouse. This was preferable to being cooped up below, enveloped in nameless, foul, seasick odors. We hung to the house-rail and watched the terrible power of the sea as it lifted itself with giant strength against us. We remembered a poem about the sea whose waves

"Will purr at your feet like a cat,
But will crack your bones for all that."

At last across amidships came a long-armed terrific lunge of the sea that poured a stream of water through an aisle between deckhouses, to the rail of one of which we desperately clung, flooding us out. We then realized how easy it was for waves to wash people overboard. So did the captain. His men stretched a line along the middle of the ship, and then laboriously helped us inside and below.

Crashes of various sizes and kinds were heard in all parts of the ship, ranging from dishes and deck furniture to freight in the hold and crushed superstructure. Stewards and sailors and officers were staggering and scurrying hither and yon.

I saw the captain, his perpetual smile gone, run up to the bridge. It certainly was the place for him then.

Just then the sea seemed to gather itself together and throw itself up to overwhelm us. The prow sank into a great trough. It looked impossible for it to rise under the weight of water. The impression of many seemed to be that we were about to founder. Life-belts were a mockery.

By that time I was face to face with a serious problem. Was I willing to have my life snuffed out in that place and under those cruel circumstances—willing to see my four little children snatched away from me by this watery monster, as heartless as resistless; willing to have my wife sucked down and pounded against precipitous near-by rocks—for the glory of God? Was I?

(To be concluded.)

NEWS ITEMS.

NOTES FROM DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.—The Yearly Meeting of 1915 had separated intending "to meet next year at the usual time and place, if the Lord permit." In effect permission was not granted. The "Sinn Fein" outbreak of violence, beginning on Fourth Month 29th, assumed such serious dimensions during the succeeding ten days that the meeting together of Friends in considerable numbers on the date arranged (Fifth Month 3rd) was impossible. Intercourse not only between one part of the country and another, but between even the suburbs of Dublin and the city had been interrupted. On the day appointed these restrictions were so far relaxed that a few Friends met together with the Clerk. A minute was passed recording thankfulness that, notwithstanding the dreadful events of the past twelve days, consequent on the terrible rebellion which had taken place, the meeting had been permitted to assemble, though in very limited numbers. By a second minute the meeting was adjourned till such time as the Yearly Meeting's Committee should appoint. Accordingly, the meeting was called for Sixth Month 1st.

The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight was held as usual on the day preceding the opening. After the opening period of devotion, in course of which prayer was offered for the help and guidance of the King and his ministers and all in authority in the present serious crisis, reports from the three Quarterly Meetings were read, presenting no new features. There are in the Yearly Meeting, 36 Record Ministers, 86 Elders and 136 Overseers, besides seven women Friend visitors in Dublin. Ulster reported 96 Friends as taking vocal part in meetings for worship. Leinster reported consideration of the question of recording ministers, as a result of which Elders had been encouraged to send in suitable names. Nothing, however, had been done.

The Yearly Meeting opened as usual with a meeting for worship, followed without interval by the business sitting; only about sixty Friends were present.

The Clerk first read the two minutes of the meeting which assembled on the appointed day and adjourned immediately, and these became the first minutes of the Yearly Meeting.

He said that the meeting assembled this year in a very unusual way, not only as regards the condition of the city and country, but also by reason of the fact that for the first time in our history the meeting was being held by permission of the Government. On applying to the Railway Companies for the usual concessions, it transpired that leave would have to be obtained before the Yearly Meeting could be held at all. That leave was granted by the Chief Commissioner of Police, after consulting the military authorities, on the ground that it would be a purely religious gathering. This was the tacit understanding under which the meeting met, and Friends were to remember that when certain subjects bordering on politics came under discussion.

An earnest discussion followed as to what course should be taken under the novel circumstances, and it was agreed, with practical unanimity, to leave to the Clerk the decision as to what subjects, under the circumstances, must be avoided.

Words of sympathy were expressed for Friends in Dublin who had suffered from the recent riots.

Charles E. Jacob, on behalf of Dublin Friends, expressed thankfulness to the Friends who had spoken for their messages. The experience passed through had been a terrible one; but there was much ground for thankfulness. The greatest sympathy was felt in Dublin for those of their members who had suffered material loss.

The first sitting of the Yearly Meeting was largely taken up with the reading and considering the message from London Yearly Meeting.

During the discussion of the Peace Question reference was made to the difficult task laid upon the Clerk of so guiding the discussion that no political matters should be presented.

Gertrude Webb queried for what purpose had the meeting gathered? Was it not to know the will of our Father for us? What did we see around us, what power could deal with it? The Spirit of Christ, which worked by love, was the great power. Would it not be better now to wait upon Him, that we might have light upon our path to see what we should do now in Ireland?

The meeting settled down for a short period of quiet waiting, during which prayer was offered for guidance.

Isaac John Bell felt that our foundations had been shaken. What had been and was happening had not happened without a head, a mind, a purpose. That was a precious thought to him who had been called and responded. His conception of Christian Peace was that of a goal rather than a starting-point, something won after toil and stress. It was a fruit that was produced. "The fruit of righteousness is peace." The peace of Christ was won by loss; what had we lost for Him? The extent of our loss was the measure of our obedience.

Charles E. Jacob reminded Friends of the early Christian saying, "I am a Christian and therefore I cannot fight," and George Fox's statement that he lived in that life that took away the occasion of wars. The disciples of Christ must bear witness to the spiritual nature of His Kingdom. The Society of Friends had a great opportunity if we would rise to it. The churches had largely failed in the present world crisis. He commended the Fellowship of Reconciliation to the attention of Friends. The experience through which Dublin Friends had passed had in some cases had the effect of drawing men closer to Christ, giving a deeper sense of His loving care and protection than they had ever known before.

The session devoted to the consideration of Temperance was an unusually interesting one.

A minute was finally adopted approving of the "action taken by the Yearly Meeting's Committee, and recording the meeting's opinion that total prohibition is the most effective legislative remedy for the evils of intemperance." Friends were also advised to be active in combating the evils of intemperance; and that as the Church of Christ has a service, in earnest private and collective prayer to see that each takes his share in this portion of the campaign.

The Statistical Returns were presented, showing a total membership of 2,310, an increase of two. There had been 37 deaths against 20 births; 18 removals into other Yearly Meetings against 17 removals-in; while admissions had numbered 27 against 7 losses by resignation, etc.; 151 members were reported as "practically withdrawn;" attenders number 267 in Ulster, 52 in Leinster, and 22 in Munster.

The sessions that were devoted to Education, the State of Society, Missionary Activity, etc., though but poorly attended, were live meetings; at the conclusion Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin, who was in attendance as a delegate from London, in speaking to the minute, gave a short resumé of the history of Foreign Missions in the Society of Friends. The first collections for the National Stock were for Friends traveling in the ministry, which was, of course, missionary effort. The first message was given with courage and wide sympathy; but a few generations later, the Society was devoting its principal attention to its own life. Fifty years ago the F.F.M.A. was started, under the conviction that the message was not one of local application only, but a vital message for the whole world. To-day new currents of life were running through the Society, calling it to a larger world service. As a Society we could take no part in war; had we not then a larger contribution to give towards welding together the nations of the world? We desired that the Society, through its corporate life, should express itself as a missionary Society, as in its early days.

THE CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL.—It may not be known to all of our Friends that only twenty-two miles from Philadelphia there is a miniature Hampton or Tuskegee. It was founded in 1832 by Richard Humphreys, of Philadelphia, who bequeathed $10,000 to the care of Ellis Yarnall and others, "having for its object the benevolent design of instructing the descendants of the African race in school learning, in the various branches of the mechanic arts and trades, and in agriculture, in order to prepare, fit and qualify them to act as teachers."

In the beginning, under the name of Institute for Colored Youth, it was located in Philadelphia. In 1902 it removed to a farm of about one hundred and sixteen acres at Cheyney, Pa., and is now known as the "Cheyney Training School for Teachers." It is under the care of the Society of Friends. Just as Teachers' College, at Columbia University, graduates trained teachers, so the Cheyney Training School is trying to meet the need for trained Negro teachers for ten millions of Negroes.

This school came to my personal knowledge when the present Principal, Leslie Pinckney Hill, was installed. He had been in Harvard the classmate and intimate friend of a member of my own family. His wife is a graduate of Oberlin College, and the atmosphere of their home is of true culture and refinement.

In the last year what is known as "The Shelter," a home for orphans, has been removed from Philadelphia to Cheyney, to become more or less incorporated with the work of the Training School. Beside their work in the Shelter, members of the advanced classes go once a week to West Chester and to Moylan, for classes in gymnastics, metal and wood working, cooking and sewing. Once a week Negro children from the neighborhood come for instruction in hygiene, manners, cooking and handicrafts.

One young woman of the graduating class had a part in the commencement exercises, on the 14th ult.—a very interesting essay on "The Worth of the Cheyney Graduate."

The Class motto is, "We live to serve," and the essay had many interesting details of the graduates, a large percentage of whom are reported as successful teachers; and without one moral failure.

The twenty-one receiving diplomas and certificates represented ten different States. The prize-giving for best scholarship and prizes for all-round excellence in character and influence along with scholarship, was a very interesting feature of the exercises. There was also a most attractive exhibit of their various arts and crafts—fine woodwork by the young men, handwork wholly, and the sewing and millinery of the girls. The visitors had great enjoyment in hearing the student-body sing their unique and appealing melodies.

The address of the afternoon by Rabbi Joseph Kruskopf was memorable. It was full of character-study drawn from history and literature. It was also a plea for all that is best in human attainment, presented so vividly and sympathetically that it took fast hold of the hearts of the students.

This school is one of the glad places in our neighborhood. Like all such schools, its endowment is inadequate. It is deserving of our interest, and makes silent appeal for our sympathy and the best aid we can give. —ELIZABETH POWELL BOND, in The Intelligencer.

The Bulletin of Church Statistics was issued some months ago and contains much of interest. An Exchange in commenting upon it says: "Considering the church as a whole, there is much to encourage."

Catholic and Jewish is recorded with an increase of 779,276 over the preceding year, as against an increase of 1,320,604 in 1913 over the totals of 1912. Of this increase, the Baptists, Catholics, Lutherans, Methodists and Presbyterians furnished 605,202, the Methodists leading with approximately thirty per cent. of the total gain. The Catholic, Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Disciples and Protestant Episcopal families in the order named have a membership exceeding one million each, followed by the Congregationalists, Latter Day Saints, United Brethren, German Evangelicals, Spiritualists, Evangelicals, Jewish and Friends in order, the latter with four bodies ranking fifteenth in the list of fifty denominational families.

Out of 143 individual denominations, Orthodox Friends rank thirty-sixth in point of membership with a total of 98,356. Out of thirty bodies, constituting the Federal Council of Churches, with a total membership of 17,436,650, Friends rank twenty-second.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Philadelphia suffered under the oppression of such hot weather on the 12th as has visited this city but four times in the last forty-two years. At two o'clock the official thermometer on the roof of the Post Office registered 91 degrees of heat.

A huge shark that followed the wake of a fisherman's boat into Matawan Creek killed two men, one of whom had entered the water in the hope of rescuing the other from the grasp of the sea monster, it also so seriously injured a boy that he may die. This makes four fatalities from this cause on the Jersey coast within a fortnight.

GENERAL.—The world's first submarine merchantman, the German underwater liner Deutschland, reached Baltimore on the 10th, after voyaging safely across the Atlantic, passing the allied blockading squadrons and eluding enemy cruisers watching for her off the American coast. She carried mail and a cargo of 750 tons of costly chemicals and dyestuffs, and is to carry back home a similar amount of nickel and crude rubber for the German army.

The annual agricultural bill, carrying approximately $24,000,000, was passed by the Senate on the 12th in virtually the same form as passed by the House. It contains provisions for Federal grain inspection and licensing of grain warehouses and levies a tax of 2 cents a pound on cotton sold for future delivery.

The resolution of the National Education Association in New York, characterized as a "straddle" in the military situation was in these words: "While it recognizes that the community or the State may introduce such elements of military training into the schools as may seem wise and prudent, yet it believes that such training should be strictly educational in its aim and organization, and that military ends should not be permitted to pervert the educational purposes and practices of the school."

The death of John D. Rockefeller's grandson from infantile paralysis led him to establish the Rockefeller Institute, whose researches were to be especially directed toward the discovery of a preventive and cure for this highly-dangerous malady. That these efforts have failed is evidence of the baffling problem with which New York City and so many other places are now confronted.

A prominent weekly has the following on the Mexican situation: "The passing of this war cloud will relieve the American people, but they should not allow the Mexican question to pass out of their minds without considering what they could do, as friends of Mexico, to lift that country out of its troubles. It is not improbable that the Carranza government, strengthened at home by the increased support it has received from all classes and factions of Mexicans when their country was threatened with a foreign war, will now prove the more worthy of confidence abroad."

Having stood first for many years in the production of wheat, alfalfa and the grain sorghums, Kansas is now about to take first place in the production of petroleum. This State has been third in petroleum production for several years with an annual output of a little more than 3,000,000 barrels, but it is asserted by oil men and geological authorities that the production this year is certain to go beyond 5,000,000 barrels.

On the level stretches of the fertile San Joaquin Valley, California, the rice industry is growing rapidly. Not only is rice one of the best paying cereal crops known, but it may be grown upon soil that will not produce other cereal or fruit in paying quantities. Thus it is practically all of the level land in the San Joaquin that is not of the best class will shortly be utilized in the growing of a crop that will pay better than alfalfa, barley or wheat.

The following is reported from Washington: "In 1915 the total number of motor vehicles registered in the United States was 2,445,664. The total road mileage in the United States outside of incorporated towns and cities is approximately 2,275,000 miles. This would mean that there is slightly more than one motor-car for each mile of rural road in the United States, if the distribution of the cars were uniform for all the States; but it is not, as in the State of Nevada there is one motor-car for every six miles of rural road, and in New Jersey six motor-cars for every mile of rural road. In the United States there is one motor-car registration for every 44 persons; in the State of Iowa there is one registration for every 16 persons and in Alabama only one registration for every 200 persons."

Postal receipts for the last two quarters broke all records, aggregating $84,564,447 for the quarter.

Congress approved, on the 28th, conference reports on the rural credits bill and the good roads bill and sent the two measures to President Wilson for his signature.

The great National Education Association resulted in a registration of over 30,000 last week in New York City. Many vital problems were discussed.

The Carnegie Teachers' Pension scheme is to be superseded by something more modern. What President Pritchett proposes is that the Foundation create a system of relief, including insurance and pensions, which will offer not only old-age allowances, but protection against premature death or premature loss of earning power; and that in the support of this system teachers, colleges and the Foundation co-operate.

FOREIGN.—The demand for iodine and its compounds during the war in Europe has led to the decision by the Russian Government to establish at Vladivostok an iodine factory. Experiments are in progress to determine the best method of gathering seaweed, the raw product from which iodine is manufactured. The use of divers has been abandoned because it was found that the available seaweed grew within 50 feet from the shore line. Agents of the Government on the ground are erecting buildings, and have let contracts for 800 boats to be employed in gathering seaweed.

It is reported that stone implements and household tools estimated to be 40,000 years old, when collected in 1300 B. C. by Merenptah, the son and successor of Rameses the Great, have been unearthed in Merenptah's palace in Memphis, the ancient capital of Egypt. These forms, part of an archeological museum, strangely like those of modern day which the ancient ruler maintained in his palatial household.

ROMAIN ROLLAND, one of the most famous of French literary men, has been living in Switzerland since the early days of the war. His pen has been very busy in the interests of Peace. The noble spirit in which he writes is indicated in the following from the pages of a recent book of his, "Above the Battle."—[Eds.]

"For the finer spirits of Europe there are two dwelling-places: our earthly fatherland and that other city of God. Of the one we are the guests, of the other the builders. To the one let us give our lives and our faithful hearts; but neither family, friend, nor fatherland, nor aught that we love has power over the spirit. The spirit is the light. It is our duty to lift it above tempests, and thrust aside the clouds which threaten to obscure it; to build higher and stronger, dominating the injustice and the hatred of nations, the walls of that city wherein the souls of the whole world may assemble."

THE EPISTOLARY GIFT.

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new," is a truth often driven home with sharp reality, and at times with a sense of pain, to those who have had much association with what may relatively be called the old order. Some of this class may be slow to feel and believe that one good custom could "corrupt the world," even though they would not deny that "God fulfils Himself in many ways."

Among the marks of a changing order is the decline, or decrease, of certain types of personal correspondence, religious and literary. Such a statement should, however, carry with it a reservation to the credit of some excellent and well-known letter-writers of times not far back, and in acknowledgment of the gifts and services of many individuals who are still "willing to communicate" in this way from their intellectual and spiritual supplies. "The present writer" is under a debt of gratitude for many messages of comfort, encouragement and instruction imparted by such persons through the medium of letters, and received in seasons of particular need.

The claim is not that letter-writing is a lost art, by any means. As a rule, short and frequent written communications probably answer the conditions of the present age better than long and infrequent ones. The convenience of the modern postal system favors this difference; whilst other means of quick and easy communication, or of personal interviews, render less necessary the "lengthy" epistle. In addition to these considerations, there are those of conferences, periodical journals, lectures and so forth, now so much used as opportunities for conveying messages of serious import, which formerly would have had fewer avenues of expression.

Still there is something of the personal touch in a good letter, when one heart speaks directly to another, which must be missed from most other addresses. Emerson says that the scholar may sit down to write and find that his years of meditation fail to furnish what he wishes; but if a letter is to be written to a friend, "troops of gentle thoughts invest themselves, on every hand, with chosen words." So it is with such troops of thoughts, preserved in letters, that biography has been enriched and history illuminated.

It was a saying of Addison's that the mind "never unbends so agreeably as in the conversation of a well-chosen friend"; and letters may, without much violence to the sense of words, be included in "conversation." Not to go far back in history nor out of the English tongue, one has but to mention the names of Lamb and Cowper and some of the Wordsworth family to intimate the place that letters have had in literature. It would be easy to produce examples from other times and different languages.

But that type of letter which most marked an earlier period of Friends' literature, and with which this essay is specially concerned, is that represented by such writers as Richard Shackleton, John Thorpe, J. Gurney Bevan and Rebecca Jones. The social and the religious elements, the personal and the historical combined, make them highly interesting, as well as instructive and informing. Written in most cases, it is likely, without thought of publicity or of permanence, they have the freedom of real friendship and the spontaneity of an immediate message. Prince among these letter-writers was Richard Shackleton of Ireland, and close in rank was Rebecca Jones of Philadelphia. In each of these was a touch of humor, an innocent playfulness; but neither of them could close a letter of much length without some observations or exhortations profitable to the recipient, and to us "who follow after." Some of us, indeed, would not willingly have missed what has come to us through the channel of such correspondence, although overmuch reading of it may become a sort of dissipation. There was perhaps, in some earlier times, less of reserve as to the expression of religious feelings than is often the case now, as there was doubtless more of the introspective character and habit of mind thus revealed. The change is not always one of loss, but it is a question whether there is not too much loss to be compensated for in the attendant gain. At all events, we may be heartily glad of what has come to us from those days of quill pens and a slow post, and may find therein some gleanings of a rich spiritual fruitage.

Perhaps there are men and women of the present generation who, possessing this epistolary gift, coupled with leisure and liberty and helpful experience, might do well to give it a little more play, so as not to "defraud" anyone in this species of "revenue." The service thus rendered may be described in the terms lately used by a Friend in reference to the publication of certain kinds of articles in this journal—namely, "It is one of the means of breaking bread."

FRIENDS IN NORWAY.

BY ALBERT J. CROSSFIELD.

Selected from a reprint from The Friends' Quarterly Examiner, in 1894, W. C. Allen.

In 1808, a young man still in his teens, Enoch Jacobsen by name, the son of a carpenter at Stavanger, enlisted, without his parents' leave, on board the privateer Havneren. His days of privateering were few, for three days after the Havneren was captured by a British frigate, and young Jacobsen was carried as a prisoner of war to Leith. About three years later he was removed to Chatham, where he remained till 1814, when the Norwegian and Danish prisoners were released. It was about the middle of his six years' imprisonment that Enoch Jacobsen, without any outward instrumentality, came powerfully under conviction for sin. He saw the folly of trying to find rest in the forms of the Lutheran Church in which he had been brought up; he began to read much in the New Testament, and after awhile, having been removed to another prison-ship, he met with a copy of Barclay's "Apology" in Danish. God honored the man who had faith to place a copy of Barclay's "Apology" on board a man-of-war! Being joined by three other seekers after the truth, one of whom was Elias Tasted, Jacobsen and his comrades began the practice of silent waiting upon God. Little as they knew of English, with the help of a dictionary, they managed to write a letter to a member of the Society of Friends in Rochester, who soon came to see them, in company with William Rickman. During the remaining years of their imprisonment, many Friends visited the Fyen, as the prison-ship was named. Most notable amongst these was Stephen Grellet, who held a meeting on deck, at which the officers of the ship and many other people were present.

By the time that the Scandinavians were set free, in the year 1814, about thirty of them had adopted the truth as held by the Society of Friends. . . . Four settled in Stavanger, a few in Christiania, and the rest were scattered through various parts of Norway.

Only in Christiania and Stavanger were meetings kept up. Enoch Jacobsen remained awhile in England, where he got employment in the service of a Friend who was an umbrella-maker; his object was to study English. His settlement in Christiania, two years later, was a great help to the little company of ten or twelve Friends there, amongst whom disturbing influences had already been at work.

In the year 1818, Stephen Grellet and William Allen paid a visit to Norway, the first of a long series of visits paid by English and American Friends. A voyage of "only ten days" from Christiania to Gravesend brought Enoch Jacobsen to England to go with them as interpreter. A vessel was chartered to take the Friends from Harwich to Stavanger and thence round to Christiansand. William Allen's connection with the Bible Society served as an introduction to some of the leading citizens of Stavanger, who gave him a very cordial welcome, and whom he was able to influence in favor of the Norwegian brethren. They found eight persons in Stavanger who were recognized as Friends, and who met with Stephen Grellet and William Allen in the first Meeting for Discipline held in Norway. In Christiania but four persons were recognized as Friends. Three years later Thomas Shillitoe followed in the footsteps of Stephen Grellet and William Allen. The dear, simple-minded man did not love the sea, and he records his wish to go from Stavanger to Bergen by land! His friends assured him he would not be able to endure an overland journey, so he submitted to their judgment. He little realized the circuit of hundreds of miles needful at that time to circumvent fjords, mountains, and rivers. Now, the "overland route" from Stavanger to Bergen is one of the most interesting and magnificent trips in Norway, and is made perfectly easy by splendid roads, though, strictly speaking, it is varied by steamers over portions of the inland fjords and lakes.

From the days of the Apostle Paul to the present time the experience of infant churches has been the same—"fighting without; fears within"; "perils among false brethren." During the next thirty years the little band of Friends in Norway had to fight the battle for freedom on very much the same lines on which it was fought by our English forerunners during the seventeenth century. It was not long before they found themselves in collision with the authorities. The chief grounds of offence were:—

- Marriage in a way not recognized by the State;
- Burial in unconsecrated ground without the aid of a priest;
- Refusal to pay the School Tax, on the ground that the Lutheran catechism was taught in the schools;
- Refusal to take judicial oaths;
- Assertion of the right of meeting together for public worship;
- Abstinence from the public worship of the Lutheran State Church;
- Refusal to bear arms;
- Refusal to allow the Lutheran priests to baptize or confirm their children.

So early as the year 1821, for the second of these offences, Elias Tasted was sentenced to pay 5 specie dollars (about £1) a-day until the bodies of his two children should be removed to consecrated ground, and buried according to the custom of the State church. (This sentence was at last revoked by the king.)

In 1833, one Maria Larsdatter was deprived of a legacy of £10 left her by her parents (probably a large sum to her), for refusing to take an oath, and was sentenced to ten days' imprisonment on bread and water.

In 1841, Endre Dahl and Maria Ingberg, having been married after the manner of Friends, were sentenced to ten days' imprisonment on bread and water, to be repeated at the magistrate's pleasure till all expenses were paid; and the marriage to be annulled. (This sentence, on appeal, was set aside by the king.)

Sören Ericksen Stakland had a horse, six cows, and some sheep, worth £13, taken from him for refusing to have two children baptized. His son Elias, at a later period, was imprisoned five times for refusing military service.

In 1848, for refusing to pay a school tax of two sp. dollars, Endre Dahl was deprived of a quantity of his furniture, the original demand having been run up by expenses to 25 sp. dollars.

In the same year Sören Olsen, a young man of two and twenty, for refusing military service, suffered twenty weeks' imprisonment, the last ten days on bread and water. He was sentenced to be whipped on three separate days—a punishment which, had it been carried out, would probably have cost him his life.

The above are a few of the outward trials to which the Friends in Norway were subjected. In the year 1845 a large share of religious liberty was granted to Friends by law, but they are still liable to imprisonment for refusing military service, and to distraint for refusing to pay ecclesiastical demands.

It was in 1840 that Endre Dahl, a young joiner, was received into membership. He was a man of energy, strong will, and devotion to the truth. In 1845 he came forward in the ministry, on which occasion, as a Friend wrote, "a shaking or motion was felt by the whole assembly." He . . . became an able interpreter for English Friends who visited Norway.

From this time forward, for about forty years, the growth of the Society in Norway was fairly steady, though checked by a constant stream of emigration to America, so that the number of Norwegian Friends in America has long been in excess of the number in Norway. Amongst the means which contributed to this growth, was a very large and wide-spread distribution of Friends' literature. The visits also of English and American Friends became very frequent.

In 1844 it was in the heart of William Backhouse, of Darlington, to pay a visit to Friends in Norway. He had obtained certificates for this service, and his passage was taken. Rising in meeting on First-day evening to take leave of his friends, he raised his hand to his head, as his custom was before beginning to speak, and ere a word was uttered he fell lifeless on the floor. The steamer Manchester, in which his passage was taken, sailed for Hamburg on the day of his funeral, and was lost with all hands. The life of his intended companion, Edward Backhouse, was thus preserved.

(To be concluded.)

A TESTIMONY CONCERNING THE LATE T. WISTAR BROWN.

At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Corporation of Haverford College, held Fifth Month 19, 1916, the following minute was adopted:—

"THOMAS WISTAR BROWN became a member of the Board of Managers of Haverford College in 1853, at the age of 27. For 63 years he has shown an increasing, and of late times, an absorbing interest in Haverford College. Since 1891 he has been President of the Corporation and of the Board.

"His benefactions to the College have amounted to more than three-quarters of a million dollars. For nearly every cause deemed wise by the managers he has liberally subscribed. Many of his donations of large amount have been paid quietly into the Treasury with a request that no public information should be given even to members of the Board. This was strikingly so in the case of the Moses Brown Fund for a Graduate Course in Religious Study, notification of which the Board has first received at this meeting.

"His greatest interest was in the teaching of Biblical literature, philosophy and kindred subjects, and three of our valued teachers are practically sustained by funds donated by him. But physical equipment, scholarships and college deficits have also received his generous attention.

"But with this liberality he has never attempted to interfere unwisely in details. His conditions have been easily met and never burdensome, because they were drawn in the spirit of broader-minded scholarship.

"It is interesting to note that a man who has been in business since he was 16 years of age should have had his main interest in the field of idealistic culture rather than in vocational or professional work, and should have been always foremost in urging Haverford to adhere to the lines of pure scholarship and spiritual nurture.

"He was a man of strong convictions but very tolerant of others; of bountiful generosity but within no narrow bounds, and governed by wisdom and a sense of duty and responsibility; of great usefulness but allowing the recipients of his help liberty of action in administration; of simple, earnest, devout piety borne out by a consistent life.

"We who have had the privilege of working with him, appreciate his wise advice, his personal worth and his Christian solicitude, and shall ever hold him in affectionate remembrance."

THE LIFE THAT COUNTS.

The life that counts must toil and fight;
Must hate the wrong and love the right;
Must stand for truth by day, by night—
That is the life that counts.

The life that counts must aim to rise
Above the earth to sunlit skies;
Must fix his gaze on Paradise—
That is the life that counts.

The life that counts must hopeful be;
In darkest night make melody;
Must wait the dawn on bended knee—
That is the life that counts.

The life that counts must helpful be;
The cares and needs of others see;
Must seek the slave of sin to free—
That is the life that counts.

The life that counts is linked with God;
And turns not from the cross, the rod;
But walks with joy where Jesus trod—
That is the life that counts.

THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF CANADA YEARLY MEETING.

Readers of THE FRIEND may be interested to see some account of the Yearly Meeting held at Pickering, Ontario, from the twenty-second to the twenty-seventh of last month.

The attendance this year by their own members was not so large as some years previous, but perhaps the deficiency was made up by visiting Friends from a distance, there being more of these than usual. There were two from Ohio, one from Kansas, three from North Carolina, four from New York and five from Philadelphia.

Those present with credentials were: John G. Hall, William Osborn, Marianna V. Wood, Henry T. Outland and Benjamin P. Brown. Anna B. Crawford, a minister formerly of Canada Yearly Meeting, now a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, was also in attendance.

The company of all these dear Friends, those with minutes and those without, was truly acceptable and they were made welcome. Returning minutes were granted to those who produced credentials and signed by the Clerks on behalf of the meeting. Epistles were received and read from all the Yearly Meetings in correspondence with Canada, except the one from Western which failed to reach them in time. There was also one received and read from the General Meeting at Fritchley, England, and one from a body of Friends in the Northwest. By the reading of these epistles, we were made thankful that the Friends issuing them are united in maintaining and upholding the principles of peace.

There was also read at this time an address from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting on peace, and a Committee was appointed to prepare replies to all, including one for Fritchley General Meeting, and one for the scattered members in the far Northwest.

A weighty concern was opened in the Women's Meeting by one of their ministers that an address should be sent to the young Friends and others in England who are now suffering for the cause of peace. Men's Meeting fully united with this concern and a joint Committee was appointed to prepare an address. The paper was read near the close of the Yearly Meeting and was fully approved and directed to be signed and forwarded.

A communication came from Scipio Quarterly Meeting, New York, that they were united in the belief that the time had fully come for them to be attached to some Yearly Meeting; the subject having been considered for three months by a Committee of both men and women Friends, it was felt that Canada Yearly Meeting was the most suitable to which to apply. The Yearly Meeting considered the request and full unity was expressed, so that Scipio Quarterly Meeting is now a part of Canada Yearly Meeting.

There are about fifty members in this Quarterly Meeting, four recorded ministers. One of these ministers, Marianna V. Wood and Louisa Richardson, of Pickering, had been liberated by their respective Quarterly Meetings for an extensive visit in the northwest and were to leave Ontario on the 3rd inst. There are several small meetings in the far Northwest of Canada and many are thankful that the Lord of the harvest is sending out his ministers into the various fields which are so white unto harvest.

Although Canada Yearly Meeting is small, yet we trust there are a few in all the subordinate meetings who are deeply concerned to maintain them, even though they are reduced in numbers.

At Norwich, there are about eighty members; most of these are young people. It is a very hopeful meeting. They feel keenly the loss of their valued friend Joshua Waring, whose death occurred on the afternoon of Sixth Month 17th, aged seventy-six years.

The Quarterly Meeting was held here on the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth of Sixth Month, and was felt to be owned by Him who presides over all rightly gathered assemblies.

Canada Yearly Meeting was indeed a season of Divine favor in which the Gospel streams flowed freely, many hearts were tendered and contrited to tears.

The writer having recently attended New England and Canada Yearly Meetings and Scipio Quarterly Meeting feels thankful to express that these meetings were held in the life and power, and if the members are only faithful to uphold the doctrines and testimonies in their ancient purity, there will be a gathering to Friends' meetings. Now in the day of wars and fightings among the nations of the earth there is no time for us as a Society to lay down the armor, but let each one be faithful to the gift which has been intrusted to him while the day of the Lord's visitation is extended.

BENJAMIN P. BROWN.

THE WELSCH AND SLATER BILLS.

No items of business before the late New York Yearly Meeting claimed more serious consideration on the part of that body than the two bills that had passed the Legislature at Albany, known as the Welsch bill and the Slater bill. The following is taken from a condensed report of L. Hollingsworth Wood:

The State of New York has now passed laws which are, at any rate, the first step toward universal compulsory military training in that the laws passed provide for military training of all boys between the ages of sixteen and nineteen, and physical training for boys and girls in elementary and secondary schools of such variety as shall be prescribed by the Regents of the State, after conference with the Military Training Commission.

The Welsch Bill provides that after Ninth Month 1, 1916, all children, above eight years of age, both boys and girls, in elementary and secondary schools, shall receive as part of their prescribed work, such physical training as the Regents of the State, after conference with the Military Training Commission, may determine. Instruction shall be at least twenty minutes each day.

The Slater Bill provides for the appointment of the Military Training Commission, composed of the Major-General, commanding the National Guard, as chairman, a member to be appointed by the Board of Regents (who control the educational system of New York), and a third, to be appointed by the Governor (very likely, as these bills were passed under the direct influence of the Governor, who signed the bills in the face of considerable protest, it would seem that it will be largely a military commission).

The duties and powers of the Commission are fairly extensive. It can provide "for observation and inspection of the training in schools and appoint an inspector for this purpose." It can also "maintain courses of instruction for male teachers and physical instructors," and it can recommend to the Board of Regents the establishment in schools of "habits, customs and methods best adapted to develop correct physical posture and bearing, mental and physical alertness, self-control, disciplined initiative, sense of duty and spirit of co-operation under leadership."

The Slater measure also provides that after Ninth Month 1, 1916, boys between the ages of sixteen and nineteen shall be given "such military training as the Commission may prescribe." The only exemption, unless excepted by the Commission, is the boy lawfully employed in gaining a livelihood.

The Slater Bill also provides for "state military camps of instruction under the direction of the Major General of the National Guard and for from two to four weeks during the summer."

It provides that the Governor may draft "portions of the Reserve Militia to make up or complete the complement of organizations of the National Guard or Naval Militia of the State."

These laws, although not going so far in many cases as the Security and Navy Leagues would like, have actually put the State of New York, so far as the popular imagination is concerned, in a position of leading toward universal military service; and when taken in connection with the provisions of the revised Chamberlain Bill, constitute a dramatic departure from the established institutions of our country.

"GRIEVE NOT THE HOLY SPIRIT OF GOD."

(Ephesians iv: 30.)

A MEDITATION.

This solemn appealing note by the Apostle Paul is heard among the echoes of depravity which suddenly disturb the heavenly atmosphere of his Epistle to the Ephesians. He pauses a moment, in the forbidding recital of heathen demoralization, to introduce us into the august and reverend presence of the Divine Spirit, impressing His Image upon those faithful ransomed ones who are destined to share the glories of Everlasting Day. This Holy Spirit he asks them not to "grieve," and by the use of this gentle word, does he not convey a very precious suggestion of the terms on which we stand with the infinite and glorious Spirit of our beloved Lord, who hath bought us with His most precious blood, and all the long hours of agony upon the cruel cross?

We can hardly be said to "grieve" one who dislikes us, one who is to us a hard master, a cruel tyrant, a deadly enemy. We may injure, provoke or enrage him. But a more tender relationship is involved, when one is said to inflict grief upon another. Thus we may "grieve" a friend, a lover, a parent, or our Saviour by our aloofness, disrespect or disobedience, and, sad to say, it is by these very things that the holy affectionate Spirit of our Lord is grieved, again and again, oh! how often! by thousands and thousands of those whom He hath "bought with a price."

Does it not seem a shame thus to treat One who is so kind? Whose long-suffering bears with us and waits for us; who returns again and again, though the very thought of Him may have been thrust out. So unwilling is He that any should go quite wrong, that any should fall victims to the error of the "natural mind," and yield to that contemptible selfishness which will greedily receive all from Him, and give nothing, no trust, no love, no service! So unwilling indeed is He that any should be drawn more and more under the darkness of the "outward" and more and more excluded from the great world of spiritual light, lest, for them, it might come to pass that the darkness of the outward should one day become a melancholy introduction to the "outer darkness." Must it not be because our beloved Lord knows so well this tremendous alternative, that He bears with us so long before He will give us up; that He takes so many gentle and attractive ways of arresting our attention, awakening our concern, starting us out of our dreamy sense of false security, by the dispensations of His providence; sometimes bringing us very low, that we may learn our own weakness and turn at last to Himself, that holy and benignant Spirit Who watches over us as beloved children, gently alluring and inviting, but never compelling our affectionate regard.

Who so sensitive to these ministrations of His as those whose souls have already opened for Divine Worship, and who have already profoundly honored in those secret temples the blessed visitations of their Lord? Surely it is they whom the Apostle calls "beloved children," and urges—not to grieve—but to be "imitators of God," being faithful to the Divine Life which has sprung up within them, until those Godlike characteristics which alone are possible for man have come forth in all their beauty. Then the garden of the soul, radiant with all the fruits of the Spirit, has become a scene of celestial light and fragrance, where the Lord Himself delights to dwell.

But while contemplating a consummation so delightful, must we not remember that ere this holy fellowship can become a constant privilege, the purging touch of the Divine Husbandman must be received? It may be again and again. Perhaps at times with tears and pain the heavenly work is wrought. As roots of bitterness spring up and trouble us they must come out, at any cost; sometimes the cost is great and sad, but the relentless purging must go forward until the self-renunciation is made complete. "He that renounceth not all that he hath," said our Lord, "cannot be my disciple," cannot suffer himself to be led by Me. No! it cannot be. One may carry out Christ's views—as he thinks—in his own way, in his own will and power, at his own convenience and time, no doubt greatly to his own satisfaction—for a time—but that is not to allow Christ to "guide his feet into the way of peace."

Such is the perversity of the human will, and its infirmity of purpose in adhering to the right, that, sooner or later, failure in some respect arises, and the cold shade of Divine disapproval chills the glow of self-satisfied pride, while some evil thing, greater or less, disfigures the soul's record before the Lord and robs it of its peace. How else could one be made aware that the Heavenly Friend is grieved? And how blessed will it be if pardon be sought at once, and the sweet sense of His love restored, before the rushing activities of life and thought have time to sweep away all tender impressions in a flood of indifference. The beginning of mischief may have been, perhaps, a lurid flash of selfish pride and supreme contempt for another; some angry retort on the spur of the moment—with a petty revenge in it; some wrathful impatience with another's weakness; some peevish refusal of apprehended duty; perhaps after manifest error, there has come from the Lord a tender summons to contrite prayer; yet even this has been hastily shaken off and gotten rid of.

Could we more deeply grieve that "Lover of souls who knows to prize what He has bought so dear?" Further lapses and a careless negligence may supervene, till the very thought of Him is irksome and a thing to be shunned, to be put away as a dismal nuisance! Alas, that such a thing should ever be!

But such is the long-suffering mercy of our beloved Lord, that even yet He may not be wholly estranged from us.

Peradventure, baptisms in the dark, deep waters may follow; and we may suffer many things until in days to come it may be that a penitent voice may be heard to say:—"Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now I have kept Thy Word."

The chastened spirit has heard wondrous things in the silences, for the Lord has visited the secret place, and through weakness has led anew the contrite one into the Life Divine.

NOBLE thoughts and purposes do much to bring joy and peace to the human heart. The soul that courageously strives for the best things is on the highway to happiness.

A PRAYER

Let me be a little kinder,
Let me be a little blinder
To the faults of those about me,
Let me praise a little more;
Let me be when I am weary
Just a little bit more cheery—
Let me serve a little better
Those that I am striving for.

Let me be a little braver
When temptation bids me waver.
Let me strive a little harder
To be all that I should be;
Let me be a little meeker;
With the brother who is weaker.
Let me think more of my neighbor
And a little less of me.

Let me be a little sweeter—
Make my life a bit completer,
By doing what I should do,
Every minute of the day.
Let me toil without complaining,
Not a humble task disdain;
Let me face the summons calmly
When death beckons me away.

SOME THOUGHTS CONCERNING THE LATE CYRUS W. HARVEY.

JULIANNA F. HARVEY.

In the passing of this dear Friend, the Society has lost a loyal and, while health permitted, an active member.

For generations his ancestors had been Friends, and from childhood he had been instructed in the principles for which they stand.

From very young years he had witnessed the visitations of the Holy Spirit, tendering his heart with a sense of Divine love, showing him the need of a Saviour, and begetting in him a longing for freedom from sin. And as he paid attention to these inward monitions, he came to see more and more of their value. So in early manhood he made a public testimony of his belief in Christ and his resolve to serve Him. This resolve included, as he already knew, a call to the ministry of the Gospel.

Being at this period of his life much among those not in membership with Friends, he said, "Soon after I began to speak in meeting, I was several times asked by a minister of another denomination to testify or to pray publicly. A few times I responded to his call, but very soon discovered that when I did I felt uneasy, whereas when I spoke because I was conscious of a Divine prompting to the service I had sweet peace. I was then but a boy, scarcely more than twenty-one, and quite inexperienced in such deep things. But I could not go on in a way which brought condemnation, so in my distress, I went to this same minister for advice. He could give me no help. I then betook myself more and more to private waiting and prayer to God. In infinite mercy He gave me the wisdom which I lacked, for I was so thoroughly convinced of the necessity of an inspirational ministry and of a fresh opening for every service, that I was never again in doubt on this subject. During my more than forty years as a minister I've tried to be obedient to this heavenly vision. In many, many meetings, some of them even appointed meetings, where I had gone under deep religious concern and where I knew the audience expected me to speak, I have kept silent and had great peace in it, although I do not remember the time when I could not have talked in meeting."

His gift was that of a teacher, and he endeavored to wait on his teaching. In a small note book or diary, which he carried in his pocket in his twenty-second year, we find this quotation copied:

"I seek all that is to be sought,
I learn all that is to be taught,
And beg the rest of heaven."

Those who knew him most intimately, knew he tried in large measure to carry out this thought thus early fastened upon his mind, for from childhood to old age he was a very diligent student and a man of prayer. When he knew that God designed to use him as an instrument to point the Way of Life to others, he sought the views of many authors on the great principle of Christianity.

As a minister he traveled extensively—attending nearly all the Yearly Meetings of Friends on this continent. Many of the subordinate meetings were also visited, some of them several times. It may truly be said of him that his heart was enlarged in Gospel love toward all men. He held many meetings amongst those of other persuasions, everywhere preaching and teaching salvation by Jesus Christ.

As he came to understand the conditions which prevail in Christendom, he clearly saw that it is outward things which have divided and sub-divided the Protestant church, and shorn her of much of her spiritual strength, and he labored much with both tongue and pen to set forth the spiritual nature of the new covenant. He said, "I want to do all I can to rid believers in the New Testament of these outward things—all which things are to perish with the using."

Indeed, so clear and strong was his gift in this particular line that some have felt as they have listened to him that it could almost be said of him as it was once said of an earlier reformer: "He dropped his plummet to truth's profoundest depths and marked his soundings with unerring precision. He took the figures of prophesy and wheeling them into line, made them do his bidding with great wisdom. He took the types and shadows of the old covenant, and, stripping the husks with a single stroke, revealed the living kernel fulfilled in Jesus."

He loved the Bible with the devotion of one who is personally acquainted with it and who is a true friend of its Author. Having come experimentally into the knowledge of the principles of the Society of Friends, he loved them, and earnestly contended for them, and in his broad catholicity of spirit he loved the good in all. His large and valuable library, through almost every volume of which marks of his tracing run, contained not only the works of Fox, Penn, Barclay, Penington and a host of other Friends, both ancient and modern, but also "The Anti-Nicene Fathers," "The Nicene Creed," "Neander's History of the Early Church," and "Early Planting," "Pressense's Early Years of Christianity," and many, many other works of religious history. Among the writers he most dearly loved, and with whom he was most familiar, may be noted those who wrote on the philosophy of the Christian religion, like Kant, Watson, Cook, Julius Müller, Harris, Sabitier and above all others, the Apostle Paul. Like Barclay and Penn, he drew from many authors, but most frequently from St. Paul. He was his ideal of a Christian teacher and preacher. A few weeks before his death he said to a friend, "Were I asked who the first Quaker was I would be sure to answer the Apostle Paul."

When the Society of Friends was introducing new methods, such as the pastoral system, and was here and there denouncing some of its cardinal doctrines, Cyrus W. Harvey was a fearless and faithful advocate of the principles of Early Friends. At one time when the doctrine of the Light within had been assailed as being both non-scriptural and unsound, after proving beyond question that it is the "root of the goody tree of doctrine," the cornerstone of the fabric of Quakerism, and clearly taught by both Christ and His apostles, he adds, as a stirring message to others, "From end to end of our land Friends should be aroused to the magnitude of this danger. . . . The world needs our testimony at this point now as much as in the days of George Fox."

As noticed above, he was diligent with his pen. Among his productions are: "A Historic Parallel, or George Fox and Martin Luther as Reformers," "The Resurrection as Taught by Early Friends," "Inward Revelation, the Primary Rule," "The Message of Quakerism and Its Relation to Modern Thought," "The Reign of the Prince of Peace or The Bible on Non-Resistance and War," "The Baptism of the Holy Spirit," "Toleration and John's Baptism," "Holy Spirit Baptism for Salvation," and "The Atonement." Besides these he was eleven years editor and part of that time publisher of a periodical known as The Western Friend, the object of which was "to draw sound Friends nearer together in sympathy and fellowship, to inform them of what was going on within the pale of the Society, to foster the spirit of enquiry and research, and to encourage a united concern and a firm stand for the principles of Friends."

So certain was he that "conscience is the seat and throne of God in man"—in all men—"of which God is the infallible Judge," that he hailed with joy every proof of this great fact. Even in his late years, as he read in the history of Shumar and Ackad of the wonderful phenomena of conscience in their far-off day, he gathered data for an article on that subject. Sometimes when he had been reading and meditating upon the Divine in the human, he would turn to me and say, "Yes, Jesus Christ is all in all." "The fountain light of all our day. The master light of all our seeing."

In the last meeting he attended, which was about six weeks before his decease, he spoke beautifully from 1 Cor. x: 1-2, clearly teaching that the Baptism here spoken of "unto Moses"—the Divinely appointed leader—"in the cloud and in the sea," typifying the Divine Presence and the surrendering of their former life to His government—"changed their condition from bondage to freedom." "On one side the sea," said he, "they were slaves, on the other side they were free men, all because of their obedience to their leader."

Now that his tongue and pen are stilled in death, may his fallen mantle be caught up by others—by young people—who through Christ Jesus the "captain of our salvation" shall lead the church militant on to victory.

The main drive of my thoughts, amid distressed faces and anxious questions, was this: I am abandoning homeland and relatives and friends to serve God in China. And I may say in truth I am returning a humbler man than when I first went out, and with a truer realization of the magnitude of the work and of my inadequacy, humanly speaking, for it. Yet I trust that I am better equipped to take it up. At least I have surrendered every other prospect to undertake it. Why must I face this ignoble end when I stand ready to serve? Is "the Victorious Life" for which I pleaded before so many young people in America a mirage? Is all that the Princeton Conference stands for and about which my friend Robert McQuilkin wrote so convincingly in The Sunday School Times just an illusion? In the ultimate analysis is God's will a hard, crushing, unlovely thing for our souls? And really is there no comfort even for crises of physical danger?

With considerable effort I turned from these hideous, insinuating doubts, and prayed earnestly to God for willingness and for light. And at once there flashed on my mind "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching;" and "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee."

Then the wonder and privilege of casting myself anew upon the will of God suddenly seemed to possess me. I was bathed in the blessedness of it.

Further answer quickly came to me in a strong conviction of the exceeding sinfulness of distrusting God's right purposes for his children. I remembered that "the wicked [and surely the doubting sinner is "wicked"] are like the troubled sea; for it cannot rest, and its waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

Then God gave me great joy even in the presence of the raging sea—the joy of realizing anew the faithfulness of God. Now I understood that it was of minor consequence whether God wanted our little family as an unbroken band to serve Him in China for a time or in heaven at once.

Then I began to praise Him. I couldn't help it. And verses that my mother had taught me out of the 34th Psalm poured like a beatific, healing flood into and through my mind:

I will bless Jehovah at all times:

His praise shall continually be in my mouth.

My soul shall make her boast in Jehovah:

The meek shall hear thereof, and be glad. . . .

I sought Jehovah, and he answered me,

And delivered me from all my fears. . . .

This poor man cried, and Jehovah heard him,

And saved him out of all his troubles.

The angel of Jehovah encampeth round about them that fear him,

And delivereth them.

My heart kept singing, as David's did in the 37th Psalm:
Feed on his faithfulness and "Rest in Jehovah."

And again in the 36th:

Thy loving-kindness, O Jehovah, is in the heavens;

Thy faithfulness reacheth unto the skies.

Thy righteousness is like the mountains of God;

Thy judgments are a great deep:

O Jehovah, Thou preservest man and beast.

How precious is thy loving-kindness, O God!

And the children of men take refuge under the shadow of thy wings.

They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house;

And thou wilt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures.

For with thee is the fountain of life:

And in Thy light shall we see light.

Just as the man with the withered arm stretched it out at the command of his Lord, so I trusted Him in that fearful hour and received His empowering might.

And something wonderful happened in my case, as in his. The ship began to veer around; it slipped down into a yawning trough of water, and now, broadside on to the wind, was slapped by a great green leaping wave. The ship heeled over farther and farther until it looked as if another Easiland tragedy was about to be enacted. Then the miracle occurred.

The ship, against the power of wind and wave, slowly, toilsomely righted itself, like a downed wrestler staggering to his feet, despite his clinging opponent. Before we could realize what had happened, the turn had been completed, and the ship was scooting before the typhoon, instead of plunging and rolling on in its teeth.

The maneuver accomplished was either idiocy or skilled, daring seamanship, for we were at that time running between islands of the Korean archipelago whose banks seemed to yawn near by, sheer and grim on each side of us, and through which the storm swept with fury, making a piling up of waters unusually violent. Like Paul at sea we certainly did encounter "a tempestuous wind" that caught the ship so that it could not face it, gave way to it, and we were driven, and running under the lee of a small island, we were able to secure the boat. Riding safely at anchor while the storm raged over our heads, we thanked the Lord for bringing us safely unto a desired haven.

God certainly did help those Japanese mariners, though they knew it not, and in so doing He made plain to us, as never before, that the Victorious Life does not consist in a Christian pushing through his will or in existing without sin, but in realizing the faithfulness of God, who is not a man that he can lie or deny himself. Praise His Holy Name!—CHAS. E. SCOTT, in Sunday School Times.

OUR NATIONAL PARKS.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

One of the natural results of the European war has been that we Americans have per force come to a fuller knowledge of the resources of our own country. In no sphere has this been more evident than in that of pleasure travel. One competent authority has estimated that last year over $100,000,000, usually spent abroad by tourists, had been kept at home, being expended here on similar recreations.

Among the men who have been quick to recognize this situation and what it may mean to the United States are the present Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane and his assistant, Stephen T. Mather, in particular charge of our National Parks. Most of us have not even heard of a number of these reservations, set apart at various times by the National Government to be held in perpetuity as pleasure grounds for our people.

In order to popularize these parks, Secretary Lane has issued recently two publications. The first, "Glimpses of Our National Parks," is an illustrated pamphlet of forty-eight pages, which gives a brief account of ten of the principal reservations and the characteristic scenery of each.

The other publication is "National Parks' Portfolio." It comprises nine pamphlets of beautiful half-tone pictures, each devoted to one of the National Parks. At the end of each pamphlet is printed a list of all the parks, a map showing their locations, with the principal railroad routes, ending with the reminder, "Remember that Yellowstone belongs to you. It is one of the great National playgrounds of the American people, for whom it is administered by the Department of the Interior." The name of the particular park is changed, of course, according to the pamphlet upon which it occurs.

In all there are fifteen of these reservations. One of them, the Grand Cañon of the Colorado River in Arizona, is called a National Monument, and is under the care of the Department of Agriculture. All the others are administered by the Department of the Interior.

The first of these parks to be created was at Hot Springs, in central Arkansas. In 1832 an area of about 1½ square miles was set apart. On this are located some forty-six hot springs, possessing curative properties.

It was forty years later, in 1872, that the next park was provided for, the Yellowstone, having an area of 3348 square miles. In 1890, the Yosemite and Big Tree Grove parks in California were added, and later, Casa Grande Ruin, Arizona; Mount Ranier, Washington; Crater Lake, Oregon; Wind Cave, South Dakota; Sully's Hill, North Dakota; Mesa Verde, Colorado; Platt, Oklahoma; Glacier, Montana, and Rocky Mountain, Colorado, the last named having been set apart only last year.

It is a satisfaction to every nature lover to know that our Government has been alive to the claims of all of the people upon these different areas, embracing as they do the most remarkable and beautiful natural scenery in the country, and in some respects in the world, as well as including the best preserved prehistoric cliff-dwellings in the United States. It is also a satisfaction to feel that at present these national possessions are under the guardianship of men who appreciate them and wish to have all our people share in the enjoyment of them. YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE GOLDEN CLEW, OR WHY WE CHILDREN ARE FRIENDS.—CHAPTER IV.—The Christian's Daily Bread.—It was now mid-winter, and one First-day morning the children awoke to find that a sudden fall of snow during the night had covered the earth with pure, sparkling whiteness. No one could go out that day, through the encumbered roads, and Kenneth came into his mother's sitting-room with a bright face and sat down close beside her fire, where she was quietly reading. "We cannot go out, so we may have a whole delightful hour to talk quite by ourselves," he said.

"Well," said mother, "what shall we talk about? What have you been doing since breakfast?"

"O, the little ones, nurse and I have all been busy getting crumbs for the birds. It is lovely to watch them, poor little things. They would have had no breakfast this morning if we had not thought of them."

"Yes," said mother, "it is very hard when we have to go without breakfast. It is one of the good things the Lord bids us ask for every day: 'Give us this day our daily bread.'"

"Yes," said Kenneth, thoughtfully, "and He has never once missed giving me mine."

His mother thought a moment and then she said, "Think of another kind of food that we all need, and sometimes forget to take or even to ask for?"

"What is it?" asked Kenneth.

"I mean that as we need our meals every day to keep our bodies strong and well, so our souls need regular food to keep them strong and well, too. And our Father knows we need it, and has promised it to us if we ask for it."

"I don't understand," said Kenneth. "Thy soul is that precious part of thy life that will live forever. We cannot see it or touch it; but it lives in thy body in some wonderful way no one can understand. But God can see it and knows all about it; and He is the only one who can really feed it. I can feed thy body, but He is the only one who can feed thy soul."

"Why must my soul be fed?"

"Our bodies would get weak and at last would die, without food, and it is just the same with our souls, if they do not get the help they need, they grow weaker and weaker and they may die at last if we do not care for them at all."

"How can we care for them?" said Kenneth. "I read my text on the wall and turn it over generally."

"Anything else?" asked mother.

"Let me think; what else do I do? I come into thy room sometimes and we read a little of our chapter; and if we have time, we talk about it. But I am often too busy to stop very long."

"Yes," said mother, "there is always so much to be done before breakfast."

"It's the busiest time of the day," said Kenneth. "I'm often sorry I cannot stop. But I have to feed the canaries and then we all go and look at our hyacinths in the nursery window. If I miss one morning they seem to have grown while we did not see, and that is such a pity!"

"Of course," said mother, "but still we would be sorry not to have our chapter sometimes?"

"O, yes," said Kenneth, "the chapter makes me feel better."

"What way?" said mother.

"It makes me want to be good," said Kenneth.

"Why?" asked mother.

"On First-days, when father tells us stories, it is just the same."

"That is because the Bible is speaking to thy heart," said his mother, "and telling thee what to do, and thy heart says: 'Yes, it is true, I will try and do as it says; I will try and do what is right.'"

"I suppose that is it," said Kenneth, "and when I feel like that, I believe I do get on better. It's a pity I don't stop every morning, then, if that is the reason."

"The Bible is God's message to us just as it is to everybody else in the world; and if we don't read it, how can He teach us out of it? I want thee to think of that, too, when father reads it aloud to us all. We may listen in two ways—one way it will help us a great deal, and one way it may not help us at all."

"I must pray, too?" asked Kenneth.

"Yes, pray that it may be a message straight from the Lord to thee; that is the way in which the Lord wants to help thee."

"Oh," said Kenneth, a light passing over his face, "when I am praying to God is He feeding my soul?"

"If we are really praying," said mother; "but many children when they pray only ask for things they want, and do not think about God's will, and do not wait for His answering word in their hearts. But in real prayer the Lord is drawing close to us and speaking to us and giving us just the strength and help we will need for the day."

"Do I want it enough?" said Kenneth.

"No," replied mother. "We all feel we should be more hungry than we are for heavenly things. But God sees the least desire we have in our hearts to be good, and He answers that little prayer of ours. He does give more strength to do right."

They were silent for a moment or two and then mother said: "There is another thought I should like to try to explain. We said just now that after we have been asking God to give us help, He does do it and if we do not forget afterwards and let no naughty thought come in, He keeps us from doing wrong. This is because He has made our souls strong with His Heavenly food, just as our bodies are made strong with the food we have every morning. When the Lord was on earth, He told the Jews about this Heavenly bread, and they were very anxious to have it. They said: 'Lord, evermore give us this bread.'"

"Yes," said Kenneth, "that is just what I would have said, too, if I had been there."

"It means, darling, that the help and strength which comes into our hearts when we ask the Lord to help us is really the life of the Lord Himself. It is not our life made stronger and better—it is a new life—it is Christ's own life which He gives to us and wants to give us more and more, till His strength and His love and His joy will show themselves in all we do and think and say."

"Fetch me that bowl of chrysanthemums, darling, that were put in water yesterday and let us look at them. Why are they so fresh and bright this morning, though gardener picked them yesterday?"

"The water makes them so," said Kenneth.

"Yes, they are living in the water," said mother; "and the water's living power goes right to the end of every one of these lovely golden petals. But here is one poor thing we did not put in far enough. See how drooping it is. The leaves are hanging loosely, the poor flower is shrunk and limp, and the stalk has no strength to hold it up. We are just like this poor flower, till we have Christ's power and life in us. Then all is changed. Paul meant just this when He said: 'I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me, and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith; the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me.'"

Kenneth looked thoughtful, at last he said: "I see now, mother. I should never miss my praying time, even when I am late, and in a very great hurry in the morning. I see what a pity it is that I should lose it. I do not want to grow weak and dying like this chrysanthemum."

He put the flower carefully in water and his mother said: "I think the flower must stay in the water, if it is to be bright and strong. But that needs a longer talk."—G. CROSFIELD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

94 SHEPHERD'S LANE, Leeds, England,

Sixth Month 20, 1916.

Dear Friend:—

I enclose a newspaper cutting or two concerning the unexpected death of Silvanus P. Thompson, who gave the Swarthmore lecture at last year's meeting of the Society of Friends in London.

At the Brighouse Monthly Meeting, held on the 7th inst. (including Leeds, Bradford, etc.), a minute was made as to the sufferings of the families of conscientious objectors, and a grant of money was ordered and subscriptions asked for a fund for the financial relief of cases needing help. This provision was also recommended at the Meeting for Sufferings held in London on the 9th inst., while it was suggested that such a proceeding needed great discretion, to prevent a charge of transgressing the law.

It was thought, that with a proper care, the outsiders of the Society, now numbering six hundred, might also be assisted with some relief. The children of these who were suffering might be afforded hospitality.

I am glad to hand over THE FRIEND so kindly sent, to the Swarthmore Institute for there are in it some views of the war, and of war generally, which do not get in English papers.

Thy friend,

ALBERT B. BAYES.

AN EMINENT SCIENTIST.—Death of Professor Silvanus P. Thompson.—A brilliant and eminently useful career in the realm of science is closed by the death of Professor Silvanus Phillips Thompson, D.Sc., LL.D., F.S., principal of the Finsbury Technical College.

Born at York in 1851 of Quaker parentage, he received his early education at the famous Friends' school in that city. Afterwards he went to the Flounders' Institute, then situated near Pontefract, and afterwards to the Royal School of Mines. As quite a young man he was appointed science master at York School, and in 1876 became professor of experimental physics at the University College, Bristol. In 1885 he was elected principal of the City and Guilds Technical College, Finsbury, a post he held at the time of his death.

In this position he trained a larger number of electrical engineers than anyone else in Great Britain, and the esteem in which he was held by his pupils is shown in the close association which so many of them maintained long after the relationship of teacher and pupil had ceased. He made many researches in electricity, magnetism, acoustics and optics, and wrote books which rank as standard works of reference in the subjects with which they deal.

His achievements were widely recognized by scientific societies at home and abroad and he held many important appointments.

Despite the exacting nature of his scientific work he found time in the course of a busy life to cultivate many artistic interests. Old books and manuscripts appealed to him strongly, and in addition to a wonderful collection of the works of early scientists he had many notable volumes of more general interest.

In water-colors and black and white he was an artist of no mean order, and his biography of Faraday was embellished by a portrait etching by the author. Socially he was one of the most popular and genial of men.

Dr. Silvanus Thompson's death was quite unexpected. A fortnight ago he was taking part in the annual meetings of the Society of Friends in his normal health and vigor. Dr. Thompson's was a manifold personality. Eminent as a scientist, he had considerable literary gifts, as his biography of Lord Kelvin testified, while those who knew him from within the Society of Friends recognized the influence he might have exerted on the shaping of religious thought if he had confined himself less loyally in that sphere to the Quakerism in which he was brought up. As a scientist he was less prominent in the public eye—owing largely to his aversion to newspaper interviews—than other constantly cited authorities of less distinction. But till the present generation passes his Christmas lectures at the Royal Institution a couple of years ago will be remembered by the children privileged to enjoy them. W. Watson, of Pennsylvania, is taken from the Congressional Record of Sixth Month 7th, and was forwarded to us by George Vaux, Jr.:

"I am in favor of the bill revising and amending the statutes relative to trade-marks now pending in the Committee on Patents. This measure amends the act entitled, 'An act to authorize the registration of trade-marks,' and so forth, by inserting the following amendment:

SEC. 5.—That no mark by which goods of the owner of the mark may be distinguished from other goods of the same class shall be refused registration as a trade-mark on account of the nature of such mark, unless such mark—

(b).—Consists of or comprises the flag or coat of arms or other insignia of the United States, or any simulation thereof, of any State or municipality, or of any foreign nation, or of any design or picture that has been or may hereafter be adopted by any fraternal society as its emblem; or of the name of any church, religious denomination, or society, or the name by which any church, religious denomination, or society is commonly known or called; or any name, distinguishing mark, character, emblem, colors, flag or banner adopted by any institution, organization, club or society, which was incorporated in any State in the United States prior to the date of the adoption and use by the applicant.

The Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, of which there are about 130,000 in the United States, asks Congress through this measure to prevent the name of their church, as well as other religious orders, from being registered as a trade-mark in the interchange of commerce.

Everyone reverences his place of worship with the highest inspiration which he is capable of receiving. The association of the church—through which we invoke the Divine blessings, and plead for strength in times of sorrow and death and for mercy when we sin—with commercialism, is repugnant to the sacred feelings of the human soul.

The Quakers rightfully maintain that the public should be restrained from indicating a grade of whisky, a brand of food, or a quality of a textile by the name of any religious sect. The church is a holy institution, and is sacred to those who are baptized therein, and it should be so held by the State. It was contended in the hearings that the word 'Quaker' is one of derision, and not the name of a religious sect. The Society of Friends was founded by George Fox in 1630, and it has been a continuous organization since that period. Fox constantly applied the name Quaker to his association. In one publication he mentions 'The Progress of Quakerism in Monmouthshire.' In another, entitled 'A Chief Upholder of the Quaker Sect,' he states that the Quakers are not a sect but are 'In ye power of God before sects was.' He also wrote an essay on 'The Quaker Challenge to the Papists' and 'The Quaker Testimony Concerning Magistracy,' in which appears the following sentence: 'All you that call yourselves Christians who have been so angry, Independents, Presbyterians, we have not forgot your anger against the Quakers.' The Journal of George Fox, by Norman Penny, records:

When George Fox breathed his last in the house of Henry Gouldney, the good Gracechurch Street merchant, the Quaker Society, which he started on its voyage, amidst the storm of persecution, had already passed into quieter waters.

The toleration act gave relief to the Quakers by permitting 'this harmless sect to hold their assemblies in peace.' William Penn affiliated himself with the Quakers, and Janney in his Life of Penn states:

William Penn, the only son of the famous admiral, much to the annoyance of his family, had embraced the principles of George Fox, the founder of the sect of Quakers.

Penn appealed to King James to use his influence to procure some remission of the persecution of the Quakers. In 1772 the people called Quakers petitioned Parliament that they be permitted to affirm when an oath was required of them. Whittier, who was a member of the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, wrote many poems in which the word 'Quaker' appeared. One is entitled 'The Quaker of the Olden Times;' another, 'The Quaker Alumni,' four lines of which are as follows:

The Word which the reason of Plato discerned;
The truth, as whose symbol the Mithra-fire burned;
The soul of the world which the Stoic but guessed,
In the Light Universal the Quaker confessed!

The above facts seem to be self-evident proof that the Society of Friends have been and are commonly called Quakers in all parts of the world where they are universally known. These people always maintained the right of religious liberty and expression, and for these reasons were imprisoned and persecuted. They greatly helped, through their perseverance, to establish that liberty which all religious associations now enjoy. William Penn brought these Quaker principles to America and upheld them in his province of Pennsylvania. This Society, commonly called Quakers, did as much, if not more, than any other people to bring about the conditions which caused Congress to add the first amendment to the Constitution, which guarantees to the 'citizens of the United States freedom of religion, of speech and the right of petition.'

The members of the Society of Friends having testified that their Christian sect is commonly called Quakers, they should have the legal protection of the name of their Society, that it may not be used as a trade-mark in the course of commerce."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

GENERAL.—Five known dead, and property damage estimated at $10,000,000 resulted from a cloudburst and flood over western North Carolina on the 16th.

It is pointed out that four northern states paid $85,000,000 of the $124,000,000 collected under the federal income tax in the last fiscal year, while 12 southern states paid but $5,389,670.

Jewish rabbis are the latest to enter pleas for pensions. They ask for $1,000,000. Their appeal with others lately made carry the total sum now asked by all ministers, either directly for relief or to put a pension system upon a sound basis, to an even $60,000,000.

The paraplane is a new idea in aeronautical science. It is said to be the safest, most practical and efficient flying machine ever devised. Its patented parachute arrangement makes falling almost impossible. The inventor of the paraplane believes his machine capable of flying across the Atlantic. The paraplane possesses considerable inherent lifting power and an automatic stability—which is due primarily to the shape of the wings and a tapered hood—together with other original features which, it is asserted, make this type of machine safer than any other form in known use.

The appeal to the Austrian Government made by prominent American women through the State Department in behalf of Alice G. Masaryk, a Bohemian girl and former Chicago settlement worker, who was believed to be in danger of death, has met with success. A cable to the department from Ambassador Penfield at Vienna brought the information that there is no danger of her being executed; she is being detained on a charge of having attempted to aid her father in evading military service.

In resigning as Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, General Goethals assured the President and the country that danger from slides is a thing of the past. The assurance is thankfully received. Some $400,000,000 represents the country's investment in the Canal.

The Canal Zone's population is 31,018, said a consular report received at Washington, giving a census just taken by the police and fire division. American residents number 14,876.

Lassen Peak is again in eruption. A great column of smoke and powdered ashes is hovering over the mountain at an altitude of 10,000 feet, according to reports received at Redding, Cal., last week.

FOREIGN.—Professor Elie Metchnikoff, the famous bacteriologist, died last week at Paris, aged 71. He died in an apartment at the Pasteur Institute, with which he had long been connected and of which he was a director. Professor Metchnikoff was world-famous as an exponent of theories for the prolongation of human life. He was most popularly known as the great advocate of the "sour milk cure" for old age.

In England the Salvation Army has completed the details of a great plan for the emigration of helpless victims of the war. It has started to raise a fund of $1,000,000, and part of the money is already subscribed, while the rest is in sight. This money is to be placed in the hands of the public trustee and applied under the direction of the Salvation Army for "correcting the sex distribution of the empire."

In Great Britain it is estimated that the number of women now working in war and peace jobs exceeds 7,000,000.

The Union of South Africa comprises the four British colonies, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, the Transvaal, and the Orange Free State. It is in this territory, in connection with stock raising, that many farmers have large numbers of ostriches, the last census showing that there were in captivity 746,736 of these birds, from which 1,023,307 pounds of high-grade feathers were exported in 1914, having a monetary value of more than $15,000,000.

Britain's treatment of her "conscientious objectors" is exemplified in the dropping of Bertrand Russell, one of the leaders in the movement to resist military service, from the faculty of Trinity College, Cambridge. The No-Conscription Fellowship, or N. C. F., as it is called, claims to have a membership of more than 10,000 men, who won't fight. Professor Russell is a leader in the N. C. F.

Failure promptly to renew a subscription is not regarded as a notice to discontinue.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"The one thing most needful at present is not more shells, nor more soldiers, but more saints. The average Christian is no longer any more use than the amateur soldier; and the worldly Christian—the man or woman who professes heavenly standards, but lives by the same ones as the world around—is not merely no asset, but a positive danger. We need to get back to the days when every Christian, as such, was at war with the world."

THE CHURCH NOT MOST AT FAULT.

There is much said about the failure of the Church to reach the people and to work out the redemption of the world as foretold when the new era was ushered in nineteen centuries ago.

There is doubtless much just cause for critical inquiry, but as this inquiry progresses it will be found that other elements of the problem have to be reckoned with quite as seriously as the Church.

It is one of these elements to which this brief paper wishes to devote a few thoughts.

We may admit, though we do it with sadness, that very many men and women to-day the Church stands for a catalogue of formulas that mean really nothing to them, and to which they render an apparent but not a real devotion.

The masses have grown suspicious of the honesty and single-mindedness of purpose of the men in priestly garb who officiate from the pulpits. They take little or no interest in their theological controversies. The Church to them, seems very slow to champion the cause of the oppressed close at home, and it fails to touch effectively the problems that so sorely beset them.

We hear continually the cry of the failure of the Church to meet modern problems. Every religious magazine devotes some space to the topic and flings its message of reproach at what it elects to call the Church's failure.

When Jesus Christ taught the multitudes as He moved up and down among them and won to Himself a little group of followers, why was His success, as we view it from a human standpoint, so meagre?

He who could have called legions of angels to His presence and who worked marvels before the eyes of those whom He taught, is recorded to have failed because of the unbelief of the people.

Are the conditions that confront us to-day very different from those which existed then? If it was the unbelief of the people that then retarded the advance of spiritual life, so in very large measure is it not the same to-day?

If we look about us and are fair in our inferences, we must admit that the Church is tasking herself to reach the people and to bring to them the message of hope and salvation. She is doing it honestly and efficiently. It is questionable whether she has ever done it with a greater earnestness than she is doing it to-day. All the addenda of church organizations, so numerous indeed that one sect knows not even the names of the societies of another sect, are busy every one of the six secular days of the week, and suspend only on First-day in order not to interfere with regulations that were in force long before they existed.

The spirit that Christ taught is surely not lacking in those who stand as the leaders of the people. A more devoted and abandoned interest in humanity the Church has never exhibited in a larger measure than is shown to-day. The Church using the pulpit, the press, the school, the missions, and other channels has never had a longer arm stretched forth to succor than she has just now and she is thoughtful to reach still further if she may. But what does it avail if the world will take so little heed to her lessons? A small congregation literally died out a few years ago because, some one said, the message and the life of the pastor were too pure and too Godlike to suit the people.

There may be more of truth than the author of this paper feels justified in acknowledging in the shortness of the Church in doing her part, but whether so or not, there is this thought that must be reckoned with and it seems to me largely the crux of the whole matter.

Have you ever noticed a child of tender conscience, openness of mind and simplicity of living, change in a few months his whole character? From a conscience sensitive to little promptings he has grown callous and indifferent to its calls; from a willingness to heed the counsels of his elders he turns to them now deaf ears, and from the simple, straightforward life he had been living, allowing each day to meet the duties that fell to it, he has become calculating, sly and at last untruthful. You must admit that you have known such, and some of you can confess how futile have been your efforts to bring back the old spirit that was all openness, sunshine and trust.

Is it not in large degree the fierceness of competition, the pace which men are setting for themselves and for their fellows, that crowds out best things and renders in return a life from which best things have been excluded; the religious faculties have become seered and can no longer respond to the sensitive touches made upon them.

To one who feels no need of worship, no worship can bring satisfaction. Without some natural hunger, we have little relish for our daily food; we have no more for our spiritual. There must be a hunger and a thirst before the righteousness on which we are exhorted to feed can be appropriated. Above all things we need to be fair in our judgments. There is far too much talk about adjusting the Church to the needs and conditions of the people and too little about adjusting ourselves to the ideals of the Church. There is too much lax talk about the shortcomings of the Church and too little close scrutiny into our own individual shortcomings.

FRIENDS IN NORWAY.

BY ALBERT J. CROSFIELD.

Selected from a reprint from The Friends' Quarterly Examiner, in 1894,

On Midsummer's day, 1846, Edwin O. Tregelles, Isaac Sharp and John Budge landed at Stavanger, and spent about six weeks amongst Friends in Norway. They found five settled meetings, with a total membership of sixty, exclusive of eighteen children; and sixty-three attenders, with forty-four children, a total of one hundred and sixty-five. During the next ten years, visits were paid to Norway by Thomas Arnett, John and Elizabeth Meader, John Yardley, Peter Bedford, William Robinson, Lindley Murray Hoag, James Backhouse, Eli and Sibyl Jones, Mary J. Lecky, Joseph Crosfield and William Tanner.

The visit which produced most fruit was probably that of Lindley Murray Hoag and James Backhouse, who spent over six months in Norway, going as far north as Hammerfest, which lies to the east of the North Cape, far within the Arctic Circle. Lindley Murray Hoag came from New England. His powerful ministry produced a great effect upon the simple Norwegians. The older Friends in Norway at the present day remember him well, as one who had wisdom rightly to divide the word of truth. Many were the crowded meetings which these two Friends held in and around Stavanger. Again and again they sailed up and down the great Bukn Fjord, on the shore of which Stavanger stands, holding meetings repeatedly on almost every large island, and at many points on the mainland, so that thousands of people heard their messages. In these labors they were warmly aided by their boat's crew, who were Friends. Endre Dahl, as interpreter, entered feebly into the spirit of their service, and often added his own testimony with weight and power. At other times they had as interpreter Asbjørn Kloster, a young man who had been at Ayton School, and who also became a singularly eloquent and impressive minister. The memory of his pure, blameless life, and of his zeal in the temperance cause, lives, and is revered by many far beyond the circle of Friends, to this day. Another helper was Peder Matthiasen Gronnstad, a schoolmaster by profession. He was very active in inviting people to the meetings, and in distributing thousands of tracts bearing on Friends' doctrines. Both he and Endre Dahl also did good service by conversation with inquirers. Crowded meetings at short notice, and great tenderness of spirit, was their experience almost everywhere.

Near Sövde, some fifty English miles north of Stavanger, James Backhouse records that they were met by Knud Knudsen, from Rödäl, who had come over the mountains to see them. This was the first time that Knud Knudsen had met any of the Stavanger Friends, but he was already himself a Friend by conviction. The Holy Spirit had taught him Friends' principles from the pages of the New Testament. It was the Lutheran priest who first said to him, "You are a Quaker." This led him to inquire who the Quakers were, and he corresponded with Friends at Stavanger. Rödäl is a wild, desolate valley, lying a thousand feet or more above sea-level. In 1853 its connection with the outer world was by means of rough mountain paths. In these days there is a good road through the valley, and it lies on a much-frequented tourists' route.

L. M. Hoag, Jas. Backhouse and some of their Norwegian companions crossed the mountains and spent a few days holding meetings in Rödäl, confirming the faith of Knud Knudsen, and those who met with him, and shared his views of religious truth. Following their visit, within three months seventeen people in Rödäl had withdrawn their names from the State Church, and many applications for membership in the Society of Friends were made to the Two Months' Meeting at Stavanger. Seven years later, James Backhouse, on a second visit to Rödäl, records in his journal:—"Nearly all the adult population of Botten have turned to the Lord and become Friends." A meeting-house was built and two meetings were established. Life in Rödäl was always a hard struggle. The ground is rocky, and often covered with snow for eight months out of the twelve. Yet it is with regret that I have to record that the little colony almost to a man left their bleak surroundings, and found a new home on the rich plains of Iowa. It seems to me that their testimony to the Truth was needed in Norway; and that their native land is poorer in religious freedom because they and many other Friends failed to maintain their stand in their own country in favor of the principles they were convinced of.

Summer had given place to autumn, and autumn was rapidly changing to winter. The Friends had returned to Stavanger. They had held hundreds of crowded meetings. Thousands of people had heard the Gospel message from their lips. Their theme wherever they went had been "Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." Very many were the seals given to their ministry. And yet Lindley Murray Hoag was cast down and oppressed in spirit. His mission was not fulfilled. Ere he left his home he had seen a valley full of light. In all his long wanderings up and down Norway he had failed to find that valley. He could not return home with his work unfinished. One day the map of Norway lay before him. He laid his finger on a certain place and said, "That is a bright spot. I must go there." His interpreter tried to dissuade him. The season was late for travelling by open boat. The Friends knew little of the place he pointed to. It was a hundred miles from Stavanger, away to the north of the Hardanger Fjord, in the neighborhood of Vossevangen. Lindley Murray Hoag was firm. "If you won't go with us, we will go alone," he said. Endre Dahl at last gave way, and . . . they once more put to sea in the open boat, The Arnett, to cross the fjord. A long day's sail brought them to the head of one of the northern arms of the Bukn Fjord, whence the boat, mounted on wheels, was dragged across the isthmus, seven English miles in width, to be launched again on the waters of the great Hardanger Fjord. Meetings were held almost daily en route with seldom fewer than 150 people present.

Six days after leaving Stavanger, Vossevangen was reached. Here people were met with who had withdrawn from the State Church, and were enquiring about Friends. One man had written to Copenhagen for a copy of Barclay's "Apology," but had failed to get it.

I have before me a manuscript copy of James Backhouse's journal, which has never been published. From it I quote the following passages:—

"11 mo. 23, 1853. We had another large meeting at Vossevangen, at 11 A. M., in which there was a deep feeling of Divine influence, and the Gospel was fully preached.

"In the afternoon we went out of the town about four English miles, to a place called Bakkethun, where, in the house of Torger Bakkethun, we had in the evening a meeting of about 200 people. Some were so anxious to hear what was preached, that they stood at an open window the whole time, notwithstanding the cold, the temperature being considerably under the freezing point.

"11 mo. 24. We went about three English miles further up the glen to Kløve, and had a meeting at the house of David Aadsen Kløve at 10 o'clock. This is a thoughtful man, above middle age.

"The meeting was of about 150 people. There was a sweet feeling of Divine influence over us. After I had preached Christ for some time, and referred the people to the teaching of the Holy Spirit sent through Him, and to the Holy Scriptures as the standard of faith and doctrine, and had taken my seat, the two priests from Vossevangen came up. After Gabriel Skordsen had spoken a few weighty words, and L. M. Hoag had prayed, one of the priests stepped forward, and said he was Sogne Prest (parish priest) of the district, and desired to know if he might speak a few words. Leave was at once granted him, and he addressed the people, telling them that he had heard that some of the people called Quakers had come amongst them; that he had been at one of their meetings at Vossevangen; that the Quakers held many things according to Scripture, but contrary to Scripture denied the Sacraments, and many things that were in Luther's catechism; he then proceeded to read some description of the Quakers from a work written by one of the Professors of Theology in Christiania, and which was partly true and partly false. I replied that the people present could bear witness that we had preached Christ Jesus the Lord to them, and had referred them to the Scriptures alone as the test of the soundness of our doctrines, and of their own faith and impressions on religious subjects; and that we had not dwelt on ceremonial rites, except that our grounds for not practicing them were briefly stated in some of our tracts. That as he had introduced these subjects, I wished to make some comments on them in his presence. I then briefly stated our views of the water baptism practiced in the days of the Apostles, and showed that there was nothing in the Scriptures sanctioning Infant Baptism, for which, as a Lutheran, he was pleading. I then made some remarks on the last Passover partaken of by Christ with his disciples, and on the misapplication of the words construed into a command for a standing rite. Endre Dahl also made some comments, as well as Rier Riensen, touching also the assumed office of Priesthood.

"After putting up a prayer for the preservation of the people, both priests withdrew, notwithstanding we invited them to stay longer till some points were further explained. Their visit led to some comparison between the simplicity of the Gospel and the trammels of priestly bondage. The meeting then settled to the more substantial and practical nature of vital Christianity.

"In the afternoon we returned to Bakkethun, and had another meeting of nearly 200 people. It was a very instructive and edifying time.

"These men seem before our coming to have seen into the formality of a State Church, but not into the simplicity and spirituality of the Church of Christ."

It was about the new year when L. M. Hoag and James Backhouse were free to return to England. Steamers had ceased running for the winter, so they were glad to embark near Christiansand on a fishing smack, the Gowland, of Barking, with a cargo of game, and 9000 living lobsters, and a crew of six men, bound for Lowestoft, where, after three days at sea, they landed.

When James Backhouse paid his last visit to Norway, in 1860, in company with Robert Doeg, he found nineteen Friends' meetings, with a total membership of about 130, and over 250 attenders not in membership. There were but four meeting-houses; the rest of the meetings were held in private rooms.

During the next ten years the tide of emigration thinned their numbers very seriously, greatly to the grief of Endre Dahl, who was looked up to, after Elias Tasted's death, as a father of the flock. It was Endre Dahl's practice during many years to visit at least once a year all the scattered settlements of Friends in Norway. Many were the occasions on which he had to act as peacemaker. He did much to improve the conditions of living and the standard of cleanliness amongst the country Friends, with most of whom life was a hard struggle.

I cannot believe that the work of the Society of Friends in Norway is done. In what way the Lord will revive His work I cannot say, but I trust this record of His goodness in the past may serve to arouse in some minds fresh desires for the spread of the Truth, as held by Friends, amongst a people whose simple character singularly fits them to accept the Gospel message in its simplicity and spirituality. Where are the anointed messengers who will go forth on this joyful errand?

WESLEY AND WOOLMAN.*

In Friendly circles we should not be inclined to associate Wesley and Woolman except by way of contrast. This is due, as is made clear by this small volume, to our misunderstanding of Methodism. The "Eternal Evidence" in Wesley's scheme, was "the witness" which every believer has "in himself." "The inward witness, son, the inward witness, this is the strongest proof of Christianity," were the words which Wesley's father used so frequently on his death-bed. In the written system of Methodism John Wesley finally gave this idea—the root idea of Quakerism—this form, "Perhaps what the best heathens call Reason; and Solomon Wisdom, Saint John Righteousness or Love; Luther Faith; Fénelon, Virtue, may be only different expressions for one and the same blessing—the light of Christ shining in different degrees under different dispensations." Other evidence like this establishes the fact that Wesley and Woolman were both "lineally descended" from the mystics. Emphasizing such a kinship of origin John Fort Newton in the three lectures that compose this book has justified its place in a series with the title, "Modern Messages." In Wesley and Woolman the "saintliness of character" and the "fruitfulness in social service" made them both "daringly radical" as well as "Divinely gentle." The author calls his little book "an appraisal and a comparison." Both men stood for a type of "social justice, and service" quite heroic. The appraisal in this matter is made in these striking words, "It is prophetic—this sense of human society as a family, and the effort to apply the truths of the Sermon on the Mount to political and economic relations." . . . "When the church forgets the street, or neglects it, religion becomes a hollow formalism or a dead respectability, and life in the street becomes a hideous scramble where heart treads on heart." "Have not Wesley and Woolman somewhat to teach us here? They, too, led a smug and indolent church out of doors into the street, even into the byways and hedges, as ever the Mystics have done."

In the matter of contrast, Wesley is classed as "tough-minded" and Woolman as "tender-minded." When we recall what has been named "the well-known tenacity of the saints," we may recognize this characterization as two sides of the same picture. Our author makes "sainthood" the Christian process of recovering a lost world. Here is his definition of sainthood: "It is spiritual health, humane sympathy, and moral thoughtfulness." And here again is his conclusion, "If the church of to-day cannot grow saints, she will be helpless against the incoming tide of an emancipated, atheistic, international democracy." "As for Woolman he was of the company of those who are led by the Shepherd of Souls, and who partake of the Sacrament of Sorrow from the hand of the Master himself."

The little volume, slight enough for the pocket, is calculated to stimulate one in the hour of seclusion whether that hour be in the study or on the rushing railway train in passing to and fro.

A HYMN OF PEACE.

ELLA TOWNSEND GAUSE.

Oh, God of all the lands!
Thou still shalt lead us on,
Shield, when the tempests come,
Protect 'till storms have gone;
Hasten the promised day
When all the wars shall cease,
And the glad trumpets sound
The glory of thy peace.

From Bethlehem angels sing
'Peace on earth,' sacred chords,
Nations prepare for Christ,
Who bids you sheathe your swords;
Through nineteen centuries old
Christ hath been calling you,
For his reign to prepare
And be his soldiers true.

He will not fail us now,
Rest in that love, nor fear,
The Lord, who slumbereth not
Shall bring deliverance here.
Our country, vast and grand,
Oh, keep thy garments pure,
And thou fresh strength shalt find,
Thy peace shall be secure.

COTTAGE AND PRISON.

THE COTTAGE.

An aged woman was sitting in the firelight, and people were dropping in to greet her after evening meeting. This was no ordinary day. A few years ago death had snatched away her husband, and now the law had taken her son to place him in a neighboring barracks as a "deserter" under the Military Service Act. And he is the only son of this widow woman. His arm has won for his mother and his sister much of the support they need; and in his leisure time his industry has supplemented theirs.

I stepped in to say good night. A chance visitor, I have often seen the beauty of that cottage home. There was a quiver in the voice of my old friend as she told me of the strain of the last few days when she was anticipating her son's arrest. I could see she was anxious (as any true mother would be) about his health in barracks—the food he would get, whether he would be warm, how he would bear the ridicule, and perhaps ill-treatment—for facts we are acquainted with had reached her ears. There came a moment, however, when the Spirit shone in this mother's face and even seemed to straighten her bent form. She, who so longed to be with her son herself, spoke with joy and trust of the good promises of God and of His presence with His children. Then, in ringing tones she exclaimed: "I never was so proud of my lad before—never, never!"

THE PRISON.

As the cell door was unlocked by a kindly spoken soldier (instructed by an equally kindly adjutant), a familiar face was turned towards me, the figure below dressed in strangely unfamiliar khaki. I noticed the lack of fresh air in the cell, and the soldier seemed to read my thoughts, for as he left us alone he said, "I'll put the door open so as you can get some air." Then he beamed at "Private" X—, adding, "There you've got yer friend, and I've brought him to yer."

We sat down, side by side, on the plank bed (which will haunt me to-night when I lie on my spring mattress), and I told X about his mother and her joy in him, but I almost repented the words when I saw tears rolling down his cheeks. The bright look soon came back, however, and I could not doubt him when he said he was very happy because he knew he was doing God's will.

I gave messages of love from relatives and friends, and he told me how kind the soldiers were and that he knew they did not wish to punish him when his conscience made it impossible for him to obey certain orders. He said an officer had begged him to join the army for the sake of his country—and his mother (the "pay" was mentioned); and how he had replied that he was unlearned and could not explain his convictions as he would like to do, but that he felt he was there by Christ's orders, to do His will—and he could do no other. He added that his mother would be cared for.

In the cramped, ill-lighted cell, I felt to be taking part in a communion service. A sense of the Real Presence came over us, and we fell into that silence which stirs the innermost being. Then a few words came—of thanks for strength in weakness; of prayer for those at home, for other men detained in camp, barracks or prison, for those who judge and guard conscientious objectors for our country and all other countries engaged in the war—for power to live in faith and hope and love.

As we said good-bye, face to face, hand in hand, the prisoner was the more joyful of the two men in the cell. The clang of the door saddened me, but it seemed to bring to mind the words of a seventeenth century prisoner of the Lord:

"I could have slept sufferings . . . but it was a thing I durst not do, but I counted it a great mercy that the Lord had blessed me with something to part with for His name and Truth's sake."—From The Friend (London).

AN OVERLAND TRIP IN CHINA.

The next day after I sent off my last general letter telling that we were about to start to Chengtu, orders came from the Chinese military authorities telling us that it was not safe for us to start. We were much disappointed but there seemed nothing to do but settle down to spend the summer in Chungking. Three weeks later, however, though we had not heard of any difference in the state of affairs in the country, another note told us that we might proceed, so proceed we did, and I am glad to say we are now really at our journey's end.

The overland trip was not nearly so uncomfortable as I feared it might be. To be sure we had an especially good time of year for it. It was neither too hot nor too cool (except on one rainy day) to be quite comfortable out in the open. Moreover the fruit trees were in bloom, and the wheat-fields very green and the fields of mustard very yellow, so that the scenery was beautiful all the way along. It was a great relief the first day to get out of the crowded city of Chungking among the fresh, fragrant, growing things.

There was quite a caravan of us, as it took twenty-five men in all to carry us and our belongings. The road practical y all the way was a narrow path about three feet wide paved with flagstones. When, as often happens, there were flooded rice-fields on either side of the road you almost held your breath when you came to the slippery stones or sharp turns. The men are marvelously sure-footed, but they did dump me into a rice field one day. I was reading away quite unconcernedly when I suddenly realized that something was wrong, and before I even had time to be frightened, over I went, chair and all. The mud and water had no regard for the fact that my steamer rug is an especially cherished possession because it came from the Westtown girls. That and several other things were gathered up out of the water and I myself crawled out of my chair into mud and water up to my knees. Fortunately most of my things recovered when they were dried and brushed, and thanks to other people's dry clothes and steamer rugs I came off with hardly a cold.

I did not find the chair at all uncomfortable for traveling, and for once in my life had plenty of time to read. We walked on an average about three hours a day so we were always ready for the nights when they came. On two days we climbed over regular mountain passes, and we always walked when there were long steep places. The chairmen think we are very strange people to walk thus when we are paying them to carry us.

We were on the road eleven days, but in that time only had to spend two nights in Chinese inns. The first of the two was the night after I had fallen into the rice-field when I would especially have enjoyed a clean, warm place. But we got along very well just the same. The rooms all have dirt floors and our little room only had cracks for ventilation. It, however, served as a place for us to set up our cots and the three of us were then quite comfortable. The total cost of lodging for ourselves and all our men for one night in one of these inns was less than fifty cents.

We had a cook with us on the road and he would rush on ahead to a respectable inn and there get our meals ready. Generally we had a Chinese meal in the middle of the day, as it took less time to prepare it than it would have taken to prepare our foreign food. Before many days had passed I really enjoyed my bowl of rice with a sort of sauce of chopped up meat and vegetables mixed with it for flavoring. As for the chop-sticks I had already had a few lessons in their use in Japan so that I did not have a great deal of difficulty with them.

At one of the small towns through which we passed the two members of our party who could speak Chinese went off to call on a foreigner who lived there, but Mary and I decided to stay in our chairs and read and write. We were just settling down comfortably to our work when our cook came up and tried his best to tell us something. We only knew about two or three of the words he used, but when a nice looking Chinese lady appeared in the background we put two and two together and decided that she was inviting us in. We had no idea who she was or why she should be paying any attention to us, so we said to the boy "Bu yao," which means "do not wish to." Thereupon the lady herself came out and began entreating us. By this time I had made up my mind that she must be at least a Christian, and that recognizing us as missionaries, she felt that she should do something for us. Fearing it would be rude to refuse any longer we got out and followed her. She ushered us into a very nice guest-room, and we soon gathered from the few words we could understand that that was a mission station and that she and her husband were the native Christian workers. We asked whether they had a school there, and they said "yes," and took us to see the school-rooms. We also found out how many scholars there were; also that these people knew the other members of our party. They asked us where we came from and we told them, also where we were going. They then brought us tea and little cakes which were very good. We tried to do the proper thing so far as we knew it, but our meagre vocabularies were quite exhausted before the other two members of our party turned up. We then found out that this is one of our own mission stations and that our hostess had been a pupil in our own boarding school at Tungchwan. It was in places like this that we spent several nights on the overland trip.

Now we are really in Chengtu, and I can well believe all that people have told me about its being the finest city in China. I have not seen Peking or Canton, but it is certainly cleaner and better than Nanking, even though the latter was the southern capital for a long time. I think you could drive through almost any streets here, except that they are not paved for wheeled vehicles. People travel about in sedan chairs, wheelbarrows or jinrikishas. The wheelbarrows are very crude looking affairs to go riding in. You sit with your back to the man who is pushing it and your feet over the wheel in front. Many of them creak incessantly. We did not see these at all till we were within a day or two of Chengtu. Of course they could not be used in the cities where the streets go up and down steps. I have not ridden in one yet, but they say they are not so uncomfortable as they look. I have my own chair and can call three men to carry it in less time than it takes to hitch up a horse at home.

My daily program now is about as follows: breakfast at about 7:30, preceded by family worship by ourselves with reading in English, and followed by more reading in Chinese with the servants all present. At nine o'clock I go to a little room above the meeting-room for an hour and a half session with a Chinese teacher. I pronounce words and read after him to try to get the sounds and tones correctly. He also talks quite a little and I do my best to understand what he is saying, and answer a question now and then. At 10:30 I come back and Mary Naish goes to the teacher. I generally have a little refreshment and recess and then put in another hour and a half of study before dinner. At 1:30 Mary and I start off for our language class. The teacher of this class is a missionary who has been out here for a good many years and is very good at the language. He explains the idioms to us in English as our Chinese teacher of course cannot do; he also helps us out with the little phrases used in every day life better than any book can do. We get back home about 4:30 and then have afternoon tea and a chance to rest. Supper comes at seven and the evening is spent sewing, writing or reading. People tell us we must not study Chinese in the evening as it is too hard on the eyes.

I have not told you yet about the beautiful place in which I am living. I am with Robert J. and Mary J. Davidson, who have been out here in China about thirty years; longer than any others in our mission. It is most interesting to hear them tell about the times when they had to live in a Chinese house and wear Chinese dress. They have one son who was born out here and who lived here till he was thirteen years old. Then he went to England to be educated, and last year came back to China, bringing his bride with him. They live in another house on this compound just across the garden from us. Mary is staying with them. The gardens all around both houses are simply magnificent; you would have to see them to realize how pretty they are. Three wisteria arbors are now just at their height, and there are several rose arbors and rose hedges just coming into bloom. I never saw such a wealth of roses. Rows of English daisies all around the flower beds have been and still are very pretty. You may imagine what a grand place it is for birds. There are very few that I ever saw before, but it is nice to make new friends and there are some beautiful birds and some very pretty songsters. You can buy all sorts of birds in cages on the streets, for the Chinese seem very fond of their songsters.

I wish I knew what the papers were reporting to you about the present state of affairs in China. It is very hard for us to know what is really happening, though we hear a great many reports. This province and city are very unsettled just at present, and are trying to decide whether to stand by the government or against it. People are afraid to speak about things, for anyone who is caught saying anything against the government is simply taken off and beheaded. We are not concerned for ourselves, for there seems to be not the least anti-foreign feeling. We only wish we could help to make it more comfortable for the natives. JANE C. BALDERSTON.

"A MOMENT, Lord, with Thee in prayer,

A moment on the street;
Amid the whirl, the rush, the roar,
My Saviour would I meet.

A moment 'mid my tangle work
Right where the wheels at play
Make dizzy now my tired brain;
Just here I stop to pray.

A moment when my courage fails,
When I am slow to own
That Thou art all, my all on earth,
In Heaven just Thou alone.

One moment, Lord, just one in prayer,
Give rest upon Thine arm,
Give strength to speak, give will to do,
And still my soul's alarm."

ELIZABETH PEARSALL SMITH.

A matronly lady in a parlor, where ancient furniture abounds, a broad bay window filled with plants, rare pictures on the walls, and a sense of welcome, as she holds out both hands to greet us—all these make a memory which lingers long with the friends of Elizabeth P. Smith.

Many of us only knew her in later life, and were touched that as her own immediate circle narrowed she clung to us, as filling the void in some measure. As her generation receded, she grasped their children and grandchildren, and like a bee drew honey from various human fountains.

If we went to condole with her over personal loss or ill-health, we often came away refreshed by her sunny outlook and that optimism which is only born of the Spirit. "I find old age the best part of my long life," she would say: "I see God's plans more clearly; I am overwhelmed with blessings." Her deafness was no barrier to her social enjoyments, for so much had she to impart, and also to learn, that she forgot this infirmity and made us forget it.

Her aunt was the wife of Stephen Grellet and her childhood memories of him, her possession of his table and medicine-chest, seemed a connecting link with that rare man. When, therefore, she heard of his tiny namesake, she felt that his record is still cherished.

She had for sale the "Life of Stephen Grellet," by Wm. Guest, and also donated many to those whom she wished to interest in this "Quaker Apostle." She owned, too, the plate of the engraving, "Wm. Penn's Treaty with the Indians," by Benjamin West, so that she disposed of these pictures in homes and schools. No doubt these will be placed by her heirs so that their lessons may not cease.

"The Colonial Dames" have done good work in restoring Mount Vernon and other historic places. So as one of this organization, she took a hearty interest in "Stenton," the country-seat of her great-grandfather, James Logan, who was Secretary for Wm. Penn. This fine old mansion on the northern edge of Philadelphia is now open for visitors, the interior and exterior as they were 200 years ago, the garden copied from its original plan.

Many an afternoon found E. P. Smith in her carriage, travelling a mile southward from "Ivy Cottage," her Germantown home, to show her guests the charms of "Stenton," or to greet strangers there and carry them back in thought to the days when Indian chiefs and Government officials made it a rendezvous.

Indeed, there was a flavor of the past and a courtliness that never left our dear friend. Her conversations in French, her written memorials of her father, John Jay Smith, in two large volumes, her inherited love for botany and horticulture, her several journeys to Europe, made her a woman worth hearing.

She treasured anecdotes and witty words with which to flavor the supper-table, so that to "eat with hilarity" was a natural consequence.

Referring to a faithful Roman Catholic servant, she once said to me: "See what grace can do in the demeanor and countenance of this good Ellen." The same attitude of appreciation was expressed concerning a Bible Class of young people gathered in her home; her comment being: "I love to watch the influence of the Holy Spirit on their hearts."

It is well that E. P. Smith was taken in 1914 from "the evil to come," for so earnest a worker was she in the cause of Peace that the devastations wrought by the present war would have crushed her.

She would in measure have entered into the "sufferings of Christ," the Great Physician, who is watching the symptoms of this sin-sick world, keeping His finger on its pulse to note the delirium, the stupor, the agony, longing for its moral and spiritual recovery at this crisis.

Westtown was remembered in a practical way by E. P. Smith, her legacy to be awarded for Peace essays by the students.

The Women's Christian Association found in her a champion from its very inception. Indeed, in her own parlor, in 1873, a group of her intimate friends, Mary R. Haines, Dr. James E. Rhoads and Mary Whitall, organized with her the classes for working girls and a boarding home, beginning with a very few and now numbering over 4000 members in Germantown. She befriended them as a teacher and was ever ready with counsel and pecuniary aid to raise the Association to a firm basis. Most of all she was concerned that the term "Christian" should stand for purity and sincerity, that the ideals should be high.

Among her host of friends was a gentleman who said: "She is the most feminine woman I have ever met." Certainly there was a graciousness, a quiet strength without aggression, a hospitality that never dimmed, a personality indefinable.

Her massive head was crowned with a coil of golden hair shaded with silver. In summer, we remember her in a white dress, bidding us farewell, standing in her quaint vine-clad porch. When she browsed in her ample library, she read without glasses, the picture of comfort in her carved arm chair, before the blazing fire in winter, her dainty slippered feet upon the hearth. Among the Friends of Germantown Meeting she was a reverent figure, a vocal message was sometimes given by her. To THE FRIEND she was partial and her pen often sent commendation to E. P. Sellev for his editorials. She was never lonely, for nephews and nieces and cousins felt the charm of the home and of its hostess. We know that a rare woman has left us, though her influence remains.

PROPHECY OF FRANCIS HOWGILL CONCERNING THE FUTURE OF THE TESTIMONY OF FRIENDS.

The cogitations of my heart have been many, deep and ponderous, some months, weeks and days, concerning His people which He hath raised to bear testimony unto His Name, in this the day of His power. And intercession hath been made often for them to the Lord, and a patient waiting to know His mind concerning them for the time to come, which often I received satisfaction in, as to myself. But yet still something I was drawn by the Lord to wait for, that I might comfort and strengthen His flock by an assured testimony. And while I was waiting out of all visible things, and quite out of the world, in my spirit, and my heart upon nothing but the Living God, the Lord opened the springs of the great deep and overflowed my whole heart with light and love, and my eyes were as a fountain, because of tears of joy, because of His heritage, of whom He shewed me, and spake unto me, in a full, fresh, living power, and a holy full testimony; so that my heart was ravished therewith with joy unspeakable, and I was out of the body with God in His heavenly paradise, when I saw and felt things unutterably, beyond all demonstration or speech.

At last the Life closed with my understanding, and my spirit listened unto Him. And the Everlasting God said: Shall I hide anything from them that seek my face in righteousness? Nay, I will manifest it to them that fear Me. I will speak, do thou listen, and publish it amongst all my people, that they may be comforted, and thou satisfied. And thus said the Living God of Heaven and Earth.

Upon the twenty-eighth of the Third Month, 1662.—The sun shall leave its shining brightness, and cease to give light to the world; and the moon shall be altogether darkness, and give no light unto the night, the stars shall cease to know their office, or place, my covenant with day and night, times and seasons shall sooner come to an end, than the covenant I have made with this people (unto which they are entered with me) shall end, or be broken, and my Word is unchangeable. Yea, though the powers of darkness and hell combine against them and the jaws of death open its mouth, yet I will deliver them, and lead them through all. I will confound their enemies, as I did in Jacob, and scatter them as I did in Israel, in the days of old. I will take their enemies and I will hurl them thither and thither from Me, even as stones are hurled out of a sling; and the memorial of this nation, which is holy unto Me, shall never be rooted out, but shall live through ages, as a cloud of witnesses in generations to come. I have brought them to the birth; I have brought them forth; I have swaddled them, and they are mine. I will nourish them, and carry them as on eagle's wings; and though clouds gather against them, I will make my way through them, and though darkness gather together on a heap, and tempests gender, I will scatter them as with an east wind, and nations shall know they are my inheritance, and they shall know that I am the living God, who will plead their cause withal that rise up in opposition against them.

These words are holy, faithful, good and true. Blessed are they that hear and believe unto the end. And because of them no strength was left in me for awhile; but at last, my heart was filled with joy, even as when the Ark of God was brought from the house of Obed Edom, when David danced before it for gladness and Israel shouted for joy.

FRANCIS HOWGILL.

AN OPEN LETTER CONCERNING SYRIA.

MOORESTOWN, N. J., Seventh Month 20, 1916.

Dear Friend—

As I have had many inquiries after my husband from Friends who have long been interested in the Syria Mission, may I, through thy columns, give the latest news which has just come to me from England?

Direct news from my husband is very scarce; I have only had one letter from him during the past twenty-three weeks, which was dated Third Month 27th. In it he still wrote of the exceptional kindness of the Turkish officials and says the confidence which the Pasha reposes in him is the greatest honor that has ever been paid him in all his life. He gave me no news of anything that was happening in the country, or of how he and our friends are situated, except as one or another passes away, and deaths have been many during the past year.

I am afraid he was not very well when he wrote, as he spoke of having a carbuncle on his neck. The enclosed extract is from a letter written about the same time to Caroline Cooper, of Wilmington, which she would be willing for thee to print any time thee has space for it and cares to do so.

A letter from the Secretary of the American Mission in Egypt to all our Syrian missionaries, now in England and elsewhere, was lately forwarded to me from the F. F. M. A. office in London. It offers us deep sympathy in the persecutions which our native church is undergoing now in Syria, and rejoices that all our Christians have stood firm and none of them denied their faith.

I knew that they must be suffering from famine and sickness, but did not know that persecution was added to their cup.

Following this letter have come the two last numbers of Our Missions, the official organ of the English F. F. M. A., in which are two articles that give a very sad picture of what our friends are passing through now in Syria. Can thee print the whole of them or at any rate the parts I have marked?

Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin writes me that efforts are being made to collect funds for the relief of the sufferers in Syria, which are to be in readiness for use directly the war is over, as there is no means of getting help to them now from England.

I learn, however, from Dwight H. Day, Treasurer of the American Presbyterian Mission in New York, that it is still possible to send funds from here to C. A. Dana, their Treasurer in Beyrout. He says: "We have a channel through which money orders for Syria are transmitted, and we are reasonably sure that they reach him. In fact they have been doing so now for a number of months." As this is so, why wait till the end of the war, when so many are dying of starvation now?

My husband has many friends among the Turkish officials and prominent Druses, a number of whom have extensive properties in the Hauran, east of Damascus, which is the great wheat-growing district of Syria. The fresh crops must be ready now, and if he had the money I believe he could buy in quantities of wheat, barley, lentils, and other foodstuffs grown in the country, and distribute these among the many who have no money to pay the high prices now charged for everything and who must otherwise starve.

The calls for help which come from across the water are many, I know, but our blessings and privileges in this land of peace and plenty are also many; and can we not always do a little more, even when we think we have reached the limit, in response to the call from Christ's suffering brethren, who, humanly speaking, have only this land to look to for help? Mingled with their cry do we not also hear our Saviour's voice saying to each one of us: "I to-day am afflicted, hungry, thirsty, naked, sick and in prison, will you not now come unto me with all that you love to me can prompt you to bring, for surely inasmuch as ye do it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye do it unto me?"

I am thine sincerely,
EMILY OLIVER.

EXTRACT FROM D. OLIVER'S LETTER.

I know how close hearts can be drawn together in a great cause and a united effort, and what greater cause can we seek than the bringing in of the Kingdom of God, which is a kingdom of love, peace, righteousness, of purity and liberty. The Society of Friends have a great opportunity at the present moment to stand up before the world and to make their testimony heard on behalf of peace and international good-will.

They may not be able to bring about peace, but they can at least show the world that there is a "better way," and that to remove all war is to remove the occasion for war by sowing a spirit of mutual trust and good-will.

The United States has a great opportunity, perhaps the greatest that any country could have, to take the lead for peace at the present time. It is not the time to think of increasing your commerce—that may be all right in its place—it is the time to think how you can be of service in bringing to an end one of the greatest and most appalling calamities that has ever overtaken the progress of mankind. To help to quench the fires of hate and strife, to bring all the moral influences of a great nation to smooth out the tangled web that has caused such woe and sorrow the world over, that is a task worthy of all the powers of the greatest statesmen in your country. May God stir them up to act, and to act quickly. For if not, great will be the judgment passed upon them by history.

The moral and spiritual forces everywhere, that are working for peace and good-will, must not be discouraged, but must go on working, remembering that all who work for the coming of the Kingdom of God, the kingdom of love, cannot but win in the end.

It may be long in coming, but I am sure that the time will come when war and all connected with war will be an impossibility. The conscience of mankind will revolt against it. May God in His mercy overrule all things for good and in some way we do not know bring all this struggle toward such an end.

I pray continually for peace and for the dispelling of this terrible cloud that envelops Europe.

DANIEL OLIVER.

The following are extracts from Sixth and Seventh Months issues of Our Missions:

Things in Beyrout, are, however, in no way to be compared with the state of affairs in other parts of the country, especially the Lebanon, where positive famine exists. Between Beyrout and the Mountain one meets crowds of starving men, women and children, many of whom die on the roadside. Grain is still to be obtained in a few inland towns, but has to be transported by the purchaser to its destination. The train service is at the barest possible minimum. Owing to the lack of coal, wood has had to be used on a large scale, and deforestation has begun.

The climax was reached in the sufferings of this unfortunate country when typhus broke out. It has spread in a most alarming manner, and is raging in Aleppo, Homs, Hama, Tripoli and has now reached Damascus. It is to be feared that it will attain most serious proportions, for there are no drugs or medicines left in the pharmacies, and all the able-bodied doctors have been sent to the war zone. The only doctors left are the staff of the American College at Beyrout, and a few old Syrians, who were unfit for military service. Eight thousand persons have died in Aleppo vilayet, and sixty cases have been reported in Tripoli.

The monasteries and also the Americans have done valiant work in relieving and assisting the people; but the Turkish authorities intervened, and refused to allow any relief to be given. It is suggested that it was evident that those in control of the country wished to see the inhabitants die off.

A reign of terror has been introduced through numerous political executions in public and private, and the so-called political offenders have included prominent Moslem and Christian residents. Some of the principal ecclesiastics have been most severely treated. As a result of this general state of affairs, crime has increased all over Syria, and the Lebanon (we read), which was one of the most peaceful and orderly districts, is now "a hot-bed."

Desperate efforts have been made by many of the residents on the coast to escape from the country; but the authorities have taken energetic measures to prevent them from doing so, even firing on any who were attempting to get away to the Allied warships by swimming.

It is now reported that the recent visit of Enver Pasha to Syria spelt disaster to the Lebanese because he actually cut off their rocky Mountain from the neighboring vilayets, and allowed only an unwholesome quality of flour, made up of dark barley and vetches, to enter the Lebanon, and be distributed at the rate of four kilos per head every twenty-five days. A sample of this flour was found, on examination, to be in bad condition, and to resemble a mixture of flour and sawdust. As the already poor Mountain had previously been laid bare by the locusts, the starving population were lately finding difficulty even in collecting weeds of the fields.

When some of the notables begged for merciful treatment the Mutesarif, Ali Munif Bey, replied that it was the Government's concern and not theirs. Most of the leading members of well-known families are said to have been exiled lately; beasts of burden have been taken away; and the weak and unfit, left behind, are dying of starvation, so that the land could not be ploughed and sown. The strict prohibition of shooting has barred the last door to the poor people's natural resources.

It is said that the death-rate is so appalling that the Mutesarif had to allow burial outside the cemeteries. Whole families are alleged to have disappeared, and some of the villages lost more than one-third of their population. One paper goes so far as to state that up to the beginning of Fifth Month the death-roll in the Lebanon had attained the appalling figure of 80,000. A telegram to The Daily Chronicle, six weeks ago, by wireless press, states that 24,000 persons have died of starvation in Syria and Palestine, where the famine is daily becoming more acute.

It is clear that with these conditions prevailing the situation in Syria must be rapidly developing for the worse, and be daily assuming a more alarming character. The military cordon drawn round the Mountain, to prevent any smuggling of foodstuffs from the neighboring districts, is active in its work, and the wealthy and influential clergy, including the monastic establishments, have been dispersed so as to bar the last means of succor to the starving population. "There can thus be little doubt left," adds The Near East, "as to the sinister designs of the Turco-Germans. Just as they have attempted the extermination of the Armenians, so now they are trying, by more silent means, to dispose of the Lebanese, as an equally inconvenient element."

To anyone acquainted with the Lebanon, it is not difficult to understand how the whole population of such a province can be starved. The chief means of livelihood of the Lebanese are the rearing of the silk-worm, the cultivation of fruit-trees and vegetables, the rearing of cattle on a small scale, and transport of mules, donkeys, etc. The blockade has killed the silk industry; the commandeering of all sound cattle and beasts of burden has ruined the limited agricultural resources of the Mountain and the muleteers' business; while locusts have put the finishing touch to the work of desolation of the Turk. Further, the seizure of the remittances from abroad has tightened the cord around the neck of the people to the degree of strangulation.

The presence of the Allied Fleets along the Syrian coast and the occasional reconnaissances, while acting as pin-pricks to the enraged Turco-Germans, have been feeding forlorn hopes in the hearts of the poor Syrians, and prompting some of them to overt acts of sympathy, which only led to the multiplication of the cases of hanging.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

WHAT BOBBY SAW.—"Bobby, did you ever see a hole in your hand?" asked Uncle Joe.

"There isn't any hole in my hand," said Bobby, positively. "The children were never quite sure when Uncle Joe was joking, for he always looked quite serious, although there was sometimes a twinkle in his eyes.

"Now, Bobby," said Uncle Joe, "take a large-sized magazine, or any piece of stiff paper, about eighteen inches long. Roll it up into a small tube; now, hold up your left hand, with the palm toward you, and place the tube against the side of your hand. Look through the tube with your right eye, and keep your left eye open. What do you see?"

"Oh, how funny!" shouted Bobby. "It looks as if someone had cut a little round hole right out of the palm of my hand!"

Bobby laid down the tube, and had to look twice to make sure that his plump left palm was just as sound and whole as the other.

"Bobby, how many fingers have you?" asked Uncle Joe. "Ten," said Bobby, looking as if he thought the question rather a foolish one.

"You never saw an eleventh finger, did you?"

"Why, no," said Bobby. But he did not speak quite so positively this time.

"Hold your hands before you, with the forefingers almost, but not quite, touching," said his uncle. "Now look—not at your forefingers, but at the floor just beyond them."

"O Uncle Joe!" cried Bobby, in great excitement. "I see—right between my forefingers—another little stubby finger, so short and fat! What funny things you are showing me to-day!"

"You see, Bobby," said his uncle, laughing, "no matter how good your eyes may be, there are times when you cannot believe all that they tell you."—ELIZABETH H. THOMAS, in Youth's Companion.

HEADING THE HONOR ROLL.—Antonio Caldini and Nicholas Haas went to the same school. Their fathers worked in the same coal-mine two miles away and their mothers were busy each day cleaning, cooking and visiting the neighbors.

"Our teacher, she shows us to-morrow to make a garden on our school. What you think I mak-a-grow?" Antonio excitedly asked his mother one afternoon in early spring.

"Tony, you mak-a-grow salad. Salad she com-a queeck," answered his mother.

When Nicholas asked his mother what he should plant, she said that onions were better than anything else. They were good in soup and other dishes. One could eat them raw, too. Nicholas himself liked them quite as well as he did apples.

The teacher showed the children how to make the garden beds, plant the tiny seeds in the shallow trenches, and cover them over with a blanket of soft earth.

My, but they watched for those seeds to grow! At noon, at recess, even in the morning before school they hurried to their gardens the first thing to see if there was the least speck of green showing. One night there was a soft, warm rain.

"Last night it make much nice-a-rain," said his mother as she gave Antonio his breakfast of cocoa, two prunes and a piece of bread at the stove. "Your garden it grow soon green."

Antonio could scarcely eat. He ran all the way to school and straight to his garden. Sure enough there were tiny specks of green poking through the rich soil. "My salad is up! My salad is up!" he shouted gladly. And all the girls and boys came to see, and teacher, too.

"Your garden is doing finely," praised his teacher. "Let us see if any of the other seeds have sprouted."

Each one examined his own bed closely, but not a tiny green shoot could he find.

"Tony, he has beaten us all," grumbled Nicholas.

"Yes," smiled the teacher, "lettuce comes up very quickly. Perhaps you will find something growing in your gardens tomorrow morning."

When the nine o'clock bell called the pupils inside, the teacher went to the blackboard and wrote, "Roll of Honor" in large plain letters.

"We'll examine the garden once a week," she explained, "and the girl or boy who has the best looking bed shall have his name at the head of the roll for the whole of next week."

The blue eyes, the gray eyes, the black eyes, and the brown eyes all sparkled with pleasure. In the days that followed, their owners pulled weeds, carried water from the school-yard pump, and watched.

Antonio constructed a sprinkler out of his dinner-pail—it was only a lard pail—by making a number of nail holes in the cover.

"It mak-a the water drop nice and soft so it no hurt-a the little plants," he told his playmates.

Whether it was the watering can, or hard work, or because lettuce grows rapidly and can easily be seen from the weeds, it is certain that Antonio had the thriftiest looking bed in the whole yard. For five weeks his name headed the honor roll, even though Nicholas Haas spent all of his spare time on his onion bed. But onions are such slow-growing things and the wee plants look so much like tiny blades of grass that he had to watch sharply or he would be pulling onions instead of weeds.

One morning Antonio had a severe toothache and couldn't go to school. It was a very warm day and all the plants were thirsty, for they had had no water for two days.

Nicholas hurried to the well to fetch his onions a drink. When he had finished watering them, he looked at Antonio's garden. The green leaves that were usually so crisp, were drooping.

"Ho, hi!" rejoiced Nicholas, "I guess Antonio won't get his name first no more."

At recess and again after school he visited the garden. Yes, the lettuce was surely wilting. Another day and it would be quite spoiled. He told his mother about it when he went home.

"Don't worry," she said. "If you water enough give, it will be all right in the morning."

Nicholas turned very red. What would his mother say if she knew that he hadn't given the lettuce a single drop of water! He thought about it the last thing before he went to sleep. He had a horrid dream, too. A whole bed of shriveled lettuce-heads begged and begged him for a drink.

He went to school very early the next morning and carried water until the bell rang. The last of the week, when Antonio came back to school, his garden was in fine shape. It looked better than any of the others.

"You still have your name at the top of the roll," smiled the teacher.

Antonio shook his head. "I lik-a you put Nicholas' name first. It is right, for, while I have the seekness in my tooth so hard, he carry water to the salad and keep-a it all green."

NEWS ITEMS.

THE [London] Friend states that on Sixth Month 30th last the total number of men reported as having been arrested and handed over to the military authorities was 1,451. Of these 616 have been court-martialed and 83 have been released.

At the last session of Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends, Philadelphia, Edith W. Hall was appointed to represent the meeting at the Young Friends' Conference to be held at Cedar Lake, Indiana, this month.

THERE is some food for reflection for all of us in the brief critical review of the recent adjourned session of London Yearly Meeting, passed by the churchman who acted as reporter on that occasion.

"There were several little matters which left my mind uneasy. I disliked the frequently expressed assumption that Quakers have an exclusive heritage in Christian virtues. I disliked the implication that the minority is always right. I disliked the tendency to accept the 'best possible under the circumstances,' and I disliked most of all the evident desire of the Society to hide its candle under a bushel. . . . I record my thanks for the opportunity not only to be among Friends taking notes, but for the real privilege of joining in their spiritual exercises."

POCONO NOTES.—The woods were never more beautiful than they have been this season on Pocono. The wild flowers have carpeted the ground in fascinating profusion, and especially has the laurel bloomed beyond its wonted beauty about "The Manor," while now the rhododendron appears in all its glory. The cold, rainy weather kept some at home in the Sixth Month, but we found the open hearth and blazing log fire had the same attractions as of old.

All the available cottages and bungalows both at "The Manor" and Pocono Lake have been occupied and never was there more solidarity and appreciation of the charms of this mountain in either community.

Jean Kane Foulke has been with us, instituting local rural centres in neighboring communities, and this subject was most sympathetically discussed at a Town Meeting, on the 20th, when a Committee was appointed to co-operate with the natives, some of whom were present and took part in the discussion. It has been a real concern to co-operate with these mountaineers in every way that would develop them helpfully. Their long, cold winters do not give many opportunities for social intercourse and their educational privileges are limited. So a public hall or center, with a library and such entertainment as would prove strengthening to their social interests, as has been provided in many counties and towns in Pennsylvania, will be a real boon. It was intensely interesting to hear this State organizer and one of our campers tell of the elementary and excellent work done in organizing these rural communities for mutual improvement both in Pennsylvania and New York State. The local rural visiting nurse was instituted by the late Ellen Wood near her own home on the Hudson less than twenty years ago and now nearly every community in Westchester, N. Y., is supplied with one.

We gather on Fourth-day afternoons at some camp about Pocono Lake to hear what may be said in behalf of any good cause and to sew for the Serbians. This week Lettice Jowitz was acceptably with us, as also at a camp-fire meeting on the 15th inst., giving many particulars of the War Victims' Relief Work carried on by Friends in England, France and Holland. The contrast between our sequestered life here and their field experiences was also emphasized by Felix Morley and Nurse Dunlop, of the Pennsylvania Hospital, as both of them had served in the Ambulance work in France. The saddest part of it all is that the same terrible carnage is still going on with unabated fury. No greater contrast could be afforded than that presented by our First-day afternoon meetings in this grove, when the dove of peace has rested so comfortingly upon all assembled in the hallowed stillness of the evening shadows.

POCONO LAKE, Seventh Month 24, 1916.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—More than 20,000,000 pounds of food products, not including upward of 18,000,000 dozen eggs and a liberal supply of fruits and vegetables, were packed away in the cold-storage warehouses in New Jersey on the first of last month, according to statistics completed by the State Department of Health. The supply, large as it seems in figures, is about normal for this season of the year.

Almost as many fatal accidents were reported from the various industries of Pennsylvania during the first six months of 1916 to the State Department of Labor and Industry as during the entire preceding year.

There are said to be 38 types of soil in Lancaster County. This is contained in a report of the soil survey of Lancaster County, Pa., recently conducted by the U. S. Department of Agriculture and the Pennsylvania State College. It has just been published by the Federal Department. This report covers 71 printed pages and includes a large map, showing in colors the different kinds of soil found in the county with reference to railroads, highways, rivers, streams, churches, schools and other landmarks.

Although New York City's population now is eight times greater than it was fifty years ago when the present fire department was created the fire loss in 1915 was more than $1,000,000 less than during the first year's existence of the paid department, according to the annual report of Commissioner Robert Adamson.

GENERAL.—A treaty for the purchase of the Danish West Indies by the United States has been negotiated between the governments of Denmark and the United States, and in the near future is to be submitted to the Senate and House of the United States and to the two houses of the Danish Parliament for approval. The United States will obtain from Denmark full possession of the islands of St. Thomas, St. John and St. Croix, or Santa Cruz, as it is better known. These islands lie about fifty miles off the east coast of Porto Rico. They are 142 square miles in area and support a population of 27,000 persons. Nearly all the inhabitants of the islands are Negroes, who live by the cultivation of sugar cane.

The Prohibition National Convention nominated J. Frank Hanly, former Governor of Indiana, as candidate for President of the United States, and Dr. Ira D. Landrith, of Nashville, Tenn., as candidate for Vice-president.

A million dollar campaign fund, of which $250,000 has already been subscribed, is planned by the Prohibition Party, according to a statement of Daniel Poling, of Boston.

The sinking of a steam collier in the Cape Cod Canal blocked that waterway for large vessels the past week as effectually as a landslide would have done.

James Whitcomb Riley, died at Indianapolis, Ind., on the twenty-second of last month. His death was the result of paralysis.

Approximately 1,000,000 acres of agricultural land of the Oregon and California land grant will be thrown open to entry and settlement by fall, it was announced at Portland, Ore., by the United States land office. Settlers will be permitted to file on tracts of 160 acres each, paying the Government $2.50 an acre.

It is reported from Washington that an agreement for an adjustment of the differences between the United States and Mexico through the offices of an international joint commission was reached. The commission will be given broad powers that will enable it to take into consideration every matter that has served to imperil the friendly relations between the two countries. The basic principle of the understanding reached is the prevention of war, but beyond that, the commissioners will endeavor to effect an agreement that will provide for a permanent settlement of the troubles that have so frequently brought the two nations to the verge of hostilities.

FOREIGN.—Sir William Ramsay, eminent as a chemist, died on the twenty-third at his residence, Beech Croft, Hazlemere Bucks, London. Sir William Ramsay was born in Glasgow in 1853, and was made a knight in 1902. He was President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science.

NOTICES.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING comes in regular course on the 8th inst. The hour is now 10.30 A. M. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders is at 2.30 P. M. the previous day.

An appeal by William C. Allen for funds to assist English Friends in their relief work for Russian refugees was published in THE FRIEND and some other papers. C. Walter Borton reports that in response to this appeal he has received eight subscriptions amounting to $595.00, one of these subscriptions being for $500.00 from a person not a Friend.

The following reference to the recent loss of Penn College is taken from a personal letter of President Edwards:

We were visited by a great calamity on the morning of Fifth Month 27th, when our principal building was destroyed by fire. We were engaged at that time in a great campaign seeking to accumulate $400,000, and this calamity has compelled us to increase that amount to one-half million dollars. Recently I was in the east and solicited assistance from Friends in Philadelphia, Baltimore and elsewhere, meeting with a very sympathetic and liberal response. President Isaac Sharpless went with me in my calls upon Philadelphia Friends and recommended our cause.

The service which Penn College has rendered has been of such wide-reaching influence and has benefited so nearly the entire Society of Friends that we feel we have a right to call the attention of Friends everywhere to our need asking them to assist.

TESTIMONY—PROPAGANDA.

This is not an age of fine distinctions. Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards could hardly get a hearing from modern audiences. Their ponderous volumes of religious discussions, intended to clarify the thinking of their day, are little better than curiosities now. At the same time this is an age that insists that clear thinking is a greatly needed safeguard in the religious world. And clear thinking often is little more than a presentation of distinctions so that "he who runs may read." Indeed the history of religious movements is in good part the record of some genius in making distinctions so clear that they appeal immediately to the understanding. Thus George Fox could not be said to have discovered the doctrine of the Inner Light. It was written in the Scriptures and in the life experience of Christians from the very beginning. He defined it; put it in such a practical form that "multitudes" at once recognized that it expressed their inmost conviction. Perhaps it is not an exaggeration to say that our lives can express no truth until such clear distinctions are mastered. Truth becomes truth to us only as we get it out of the mists of vagueness and obscurity.

If then these observations are justified it is likely no merit in our age that it does not have the art of discrimination. Perhaps the actual situation is more clear if we remember what a world of difference there is between the distinctions of Truth and the long-drawn out distinctions of argument. It is the latter with which our practical age is impatient, and this impatience is often so great that the whole matter of making and maintaining distinctions is condemned. Religious societies are founded upon distinctions; their life depends upon maintaining these distinctions. It is therefore worth while to understand what those distinctions are, and to determine for ourselves candidly whether they are worth maintaining. In an honest effort to find a common ground of militancy against the assaults of wickedness, present-day religious movements are undoubtedly in the direction of eliminating all meaningless differences. It were foolish, if not sinful, to withstand such an effort, but some who are foremost in it have pleaded that great care be used lest in the attempt to be rid of the meaningless, something that is vital shall "go by the board." The aim of this editorial will be to emphasize something that seems vital in the inheritance of Quakerism that may be threatened by present-day efforts.

In 1911 Dr. Thomas Hodgkin gave the Swarthmore Lecture in London as the preliminary to the Yearly Meeting. His subject, "Human Progress and the Inward Light," seemed most significant, and arrested attention in a marked degree. Not only his scholarship as one of the leading historians of the day, but his long service as a devoted Friend were guarantees of a real message under Divine guidance at his hands; and so it proved. There were those who expected that out of the depths of his scholarship some new relation between the Inward Light and biological law would be disclosed. That, however, was not his line of treatment. With simplicity, but with the force of irresistible logic, he showed that Quakerism contained not only a message but a method. That method required at his hand no new phrase for its description. It is the method of testimony bearing, of "individual faithfulness;" and our great scholar-Friend did not shrink from using the well-worn expression. To elucidate his meaning he recited the case of "a young tanner of Philadelphia, named William Savery." After picturing "the civil war of his soul—which ended, not in successful revolt, but in the full surrender of his will to an unseen Lord"—Dr. Hodgkin outlined very briefly William Savery's religious visits to the Indians, his service for the freedom of the slaves and "his missionary journey to Germany, France and the British Isles." Finally, he is brought in the recital face to face in the Norwich meeting with "the seven motherless children of John Gurney, of Earllham." The effect of that meeting upon Elizabeth is given from her journal in her own words, but Dr. Hodgkin makes it clear that William Savery was permitted, doubtless in wisdom, to return to his Philadelphia home without an intimation of the far-reaching significance of his "faithfulness" in the case. The account as given in the lecture concludes: "None could foresee that thirteen years later that delicate young wife and mother would be entering the Gehenna of an English gaol as it then was, and beginning her marvellously successful battle with the rampant wickedness, squalor and wretchedness of Newgate. If William Savery on his death-bed thought at all of his fair-haired young convert, she was probably to him still his dear child; certainly not the sweet-voiced preacher, the world-famed prison reformer, the founder of the first Nursing Sisterhood in England, probably the best known of the Saints of Quakerism."

Compared with this particular type of "individual faithfulness" in service to which Dr. Hodgkin is able to trace such momentous results, we have the popular method of propaganda. It were easy to show points of relationship between testimony bearing and propaganda. The latter undoubtedly often develops from the former. The faithfulness of an individual becomes the foundation of an institution, and world-wide results are recorded. This similarity or relationship between the two methods in religious work should not, however, blind us to the great difference between them. An organized propaganda cannot in many instances safely supersede the method of individual testimony. Dr. Hodgkin's treatment of the subject suggests the question whether the connection between Human Progress and the Inward Light can be properly maintained by any system of organized propaganda?

We cannot at least escape the conviction that the method practiced by William Savery still has vitality, is still serviceable. In any event it has the Gospel quality of unquestioning faith. The call is heard for service in the individual soul—the service as proposed finds response in other souls; finally it is performed in absolute simplicity of obedience, and the results are not to be counted in a day or a year—not unlike the actual appraisal of their value will never be openly disclosed.

In some important directions Friends have lately engaged in considerable efforts at propaganda. They have found a host of others united with them in these efforts, and many means new to those who have only cultivated the method of personal or corporate testimony-bearing have been employed. We have no word of discouragement for these efforts, but it does seem desirable that the distinctive line that belongs to our special profession of the Inward Light shall be preserved and stimulated into every rightly authorized activity. For in the final analysis there are situations where the plea or the protest of a divinely called individual has a bearing and a weight even when a regularly organized propaganda is held under suspicion. Any enlargement of our capacity for service is good, but we must not permit our special tools to become dull, because even the most highly perfected machine is doing a work along similar lines.

THE PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING PEACE COMMITTEE.

Nearly four months have elapsed since Philadelphia Yearly Meeting appointed a large Committee (thirty-four men and twelve women) to maintain its Peace propaganda, to do all in its power to bring to a close the great war which has raged for two years in Europe and Asia, and to promote such international concord and the establishment of such legal and moral agencies as might through all time prevent the recurrence of such a calamity. To this Committee the Yearly Meeting appropriated the meagre sum of $1500 as an assurance of its confidence, and urged upon its members to support the work with liberal contributions. From the latter source about $3000 have thus far been received. Probably $10,000 more—possibly even a larger sum—will be needed during the current year, if the expectations of the Yearly Meeting are realized.

Why so large a sum? What has been done to assure us that it is required, or that it would be judiciously expended? Why so much delay in getting to work? Such are the reasonable questions with which members of the Committee are constantly confronted.

First of all, the work contemplated is varied and world-wide in its operation. Forty-six Friends, many of them very forceful characters, must be brought into concert of action. Immediately they came together the variety of view-point became evident. The moral and religious arguments appealed to one group, the social and economic to another, the political to a third. Waiting at the mercy seat was a necessity. It has yielded blessed fruit. Friends are coming to understand one another, learning to work together for common ends by common means.

The large Committee has been divided into five working sub-committees—on Governmental Relations, on Literature, on Publicity, on Meetings, and on Churches and Schools. Every member has been assigned to one or more committees, according to his or her qualifications and choice. These committees have met some several times. Work has been planned in their several spheres, and within the limits of available means these plans are being worked out. As a preliminary it was felt necessary to be assured of the underlying motive for all our action. This was to be found in the Christian testimony for Peace professed by Friends from the middle of the seventeenth century to the present time. A special committee was entrusted with the formulation of this motive, the outcome of which was a Statement of Principles, which has been printed not so much for outside distribution as for the guidance of sub-committees in all their action, and of individual members in their intercourse with others. From it, I quote:—

"We reaffirm our belief that all war violates Christian love. But we cannot stop with protest or negation; a more positive work demands the efforts of all Christians. The task which confronts this generation is no less than the reconstruction of the world upon a true moral basis. For this task there is supreme need for men and women to dedicate themselves to the unflinching application of Christ's principle of Love in every relationship of life. Only as we enter with confident faith into this Christian discipleship, willing to suffer cheerfully whatever consequences it may involve, shall we be able to weave this principle into the fabric of our national life."

The Committee on Governmental Relations has produced a vigorous paper which has been printed under the caption, A Program of Constructive Peace. The distribution of this among National and State officials, diplomatic representatives of other nations at Washington, Friends' papers throughout the world, the leading religious weeklies and monthlies in America, several hundred ministers of religion, et al, is now in progress. Any one may obtain a copy by application to Peace Headquarters, 111 S. Thirteenth Street, Philadelphia, or Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. Where larger quantities are desired for circulation requests should be filed, that the Committee may decide upon the size of a second edition which may judiciously be printed. The Program deals with the questions: Oriental Relations, Immigration Legislation, Help to Mexico, and Organization of the World for Peace, with practical recommendations on each subject.

The Meetings Committee has planned three campaigns in which open air meetings in towns and rural communities are being held at which an address is delivered by one or more speakers and literature freely distributed in elucidation of the policies under discussion. The first of these embraced towns in West Jersey. The second was along the main line of the Pennsylvania Railroad, from Ardmore to Christiana, Penna., inclusive. The third is planned in southern Chester County and at a few points in Delaware. Several members of the Committee are participating in these campaigns, aided by other experienced speakers.

I trust those who read this simple statement of our beginnings will enter sympathetically into our efforts to fulfil the solemn trust reposed in the Committee by the Yearly Meeting; that they will recognize that even the modest program already adopted will fall short of accomplishment without liberal contributions; and that such will be sent with little delay to the Treasurer, Albert L. Baily, Jr., 1508 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, without waiting to be called upon personally.

JOHN B. GARRETT.

POCONO MANOR, Pa., Seventh Month 27, 1916.

How soon the millennium would come if the good things people intend to do to-morrow were only done to-day.

HE SHALL NOT STRIVE NOR CRY.

Why is the Master so patient yet
 In the world where wrong is wrought?
 Takes He no heed of the riot of sin
 While His will is treated as naught?
 Could He not thunder His judgments down
 Where men His power defy?
 Oh, the Master is great through His gentleness—
 "He shall not strive nor cry."

Not in the whirlwind, not in the storm,
 But the still, small voice of love
 Is His power to reach to the world's hard heart
 And its rebel will to move;
 He finds His way through the silences,
 He hears the prayer of a sigh;
 In wooing whispers the Master pleads—
 "He shall not strive nor cry."

How does the Kingdom of Heaven grow?
 Never through War and noise;
 But as the snowdrops do in spring,
 And as love through household joys.
 No blatant trumpet, no rush of war,
 Proclaims the Christ-King nigh;
 Though the kingdoms of earth shall all be His,
 "He shall not strive nor cry."

He shall not fail nor discouraged be,
 For Him the isles shall wait,
 And He shall reign ever from sea to sea,
 All nations shall call Him great.
 And thus shall His Kingdom be ushered in,
 As the light in the eastern sky.
 He shall save the world by the might of love,
 "He shall not strive nor cry."

THE INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY UNION.

There meets every year in the town of Clifton Springs in central New York State, a gathering which calls itself the International Missionary Union. It is certainly international in that it brings together people from all corners of the world, and a union, for its members are united in a common sense that they have been sent to these distant points to bear a message to the folk there. There are many things that seem to divide them. All denominations from the Moravian to the Episcopal are represented, and there is as great a variety in the individual types. The kind of work that they are doing also is widely divergent. One is running a saw mill in Burma; one is teaching school in Egypt; another is traveling through an African jungle on donkey back; another doctoring physical ills in China; and another is preaching to a cultured congregation, gathered in a Gothic church building in Japan. And yet they seem to consider it the same work, because it is all shot through with the same motive—that of delivering their message.

But I do not want to get too far away from the Union, with which I started, for I have not yet told you of its origin. About thirty-three years ago some missionaries home on furlough, got together up in the Thousand Islands for conference. A Dr. Henry Foster, founder of the large sanitarium here at Clifton Springs, attended the meeting, and was so impressed with its possibilities, that he invited the conference to come to Clifton Springs the next year as the guest of the sanitarium. Since then it has met here regularly every year, and although Dr. Foster died some time ago, the trustees of the institution still continue his generous policy. The only qualification necessary for a welcome is some years of service in a foreign country.

And so for the last five days we have been hearing news from many of the countries of the world, from men and women who have just come from them, and who bring us their personal impressions. One needs to have an atlas at hand. Do you know where Micronesia is, or Assam? We have been hearing how these people have been climbing up the ladder from savagery into the Kingdom of God.

One of the most thrilling sessions—how cold-blooded the expression sounds!—was that spent on Turkey and the Armenians. You may imagine that people who had seen their friends shot down before their eyes, their dormitories invaded by soldiers, and the girls carried off, would feel a little warm on the subject. Some of their heat found its way into our gathering place. Of the two million Armenians living in Turkey before the war began, 750,000 have been massacred. They are said to have been the most progressive of every community and to have largely monopolized the professions, so that in a sense the Turks have been committing economic suicide. The speakers bore witness to the fact that it is the government at Constantinople, and not the Turkish people, who have instigated these massacres, and they told of some localities in which Turkish officials had condemned men to death for killing Christians. The Armenians have given a splendid witness to their faith. Again and again they were promised exemption if they would embrace Islam, and again and again they chose death. "We heard something of the relief work among those who have escaped to Russia from one who has been distributing the funds collected in America, clothing and feeding twenty thousand.

Quite different are the problems connected with the work in the great continent of South America—the "neglected continent" as it has been called. Instead of religious fanaticism, is found agnosticism and infidelity and a Christian church, the Roman Catholic, is held responsible. It has had undisputed sway there for four hundred years, and as some one said, monopolies are demoralizing. At any rate, if the present condition of 90 per cent. of illiteracy, and from 40 to 60 per cent. of illegitimacy is any index, it has been so in this case. In the past the priests made Protestant work almost impossible, but now their influence is gone, and there is a better opportunity for missionary work than ever before. The young people are anxious for education, and from various points come reports of the revival of spiritual religion. Peru, the last stronghold of conservatism, last year established religious liberty in its borders.

My principal impression of the evening devoted to India was the report of the Lutheran missions by a German gentleman. The Lutheran mission is an old one and the second largest after the Church of England. At the beginning of the war the 350 German citizens working there were asked to leave the country, and the Indian Christians were thus deprived of their spiritual fathers and mothers. Into how many phases of life has this war spread its malignant influence! However, it was pleasant to hear that Baptist missionaries and others were doing what they could to lend a helping hand.

You have heard so much about Japan that I will not take time to repeat more than one incident that was told at the Conference. Twenty-seven years ago, a Christian mass-meeting was held for the first time in the city of Nagoya. The speaker addressed the audience for an hour and a half, but he assured us that they did not hear more than ten words, because such a constant hooting and determined opposition was kept up that listening was out of the question. When the meeting broke up there was a great surge forward to the platform and the speaker escaped from the violence of the intentions with some difficulty. Last year, just before he left Japan, another Christian mass-meeting was held. After the talks on Christianity were done, and the meeting was about to close, a Shinto priest in his flowing robes hurried to the front of the room and tried to get a hearing for his side of the question. But in a few minutes the students from the government schools, not themselves Christians, attempted to drown his voice by shouts of "Kuriantokyo, banzai!" (Hurrah for Christianity!) As he still continued to talk, however, they came forward, picked him up bodily and turned him over to the police station. I tell the story not to commend their method, but as an illustration of the change of sentiment within the twenty-seven years.

It was interesting to hear a missionary from Korea say, that he thought as long as Christian teachers there kept to religious and social activities they had no difficulties with the Japanese officials. But it is hard for Anglo-Saxons to keep their hands out of political matters. In spite of the troublous times that the Korean church went through as a result of misunderstandings with these officials, it still continues its remarkable growth and prosperity. It was astonishing to learn that for every dollar that comes across the water for its support the Koreans themselves raise ten.

China was represented by a Chinese woman who for eighteen years had had charge of a hospital in central China and who came to Johns Hopkins last fall for a graduate course in medicine. She was one of few who were brought up in Christian families, and the first girl in her part of the country who was allowed to grow up without bound feet. Her whole family, and the nurses whom she has trained, are devoted to relieving the suffering that is around them, and thus to teach the law of love. Her message to us was full of inspiration. If Chinese womanhood can be what she is and do what she does, what trouble is too great to take for them!

It was Christian missionaries who first opened up the great continent of Africa. Traders rapidly followed them and European governments stepped in later and took possession. This order—church, trade, state—was almost universal at the beginning, but it has not been maintained. A man and his wife who had tramped or ridden donkey-back over 5000 miles of native trails in Africa told us that they found that the trader had been everywhere before them. Tramping was not the whole of their activities. They had learned languages, reduced them to writing, translated the Bible, composed hymns, written text-books for their schools, and in many forms tried to serve these poor, dark people. The reward of seeing the furtive, burdened expression of the savage give way to upright manliness and hope was all they asked for.

And so all over the world the work of the Kingdom of God is going on. Messengers of His love have penetrated everywhere. Everywhere they have met grave difficulties, perhaps nowhere more so than in the countries that boast of European civilization. But those who see—and it was the joy of this Conference that it helped us to see—can say that the light is breaking.

SOME CAUSES OF INTEMPERANCE AS OBSERVED THROUGH SOCIAL WORK.*

This paper is written in an attempt to present briefly some of the causes of intemperance as observed through the social work of the Society for Organizing Charity. This Society during the past year has had intimate contact with over ten thousand families which were brought to its attention for assistance. Out of this number of families, there were 1172 cases, or 11 per cent., where drink seemed to be the striking disability. Such low percentage, no doubt, will be a great surprise to many. It is, in fact, a much lower percentage than is shown through collected statistics given in Amos G. Warner's "American Charities" for 7225 cases, which show that an average of 15 per cent. of poverty and distress is due to alcoholism alone.

Some of the other principal causes of distress among the poor shown in these statistical records are lack of employment, sickness or death in family, providence and inefficiency.

When first taking up a problem where we find a man is neglecting his family and turning to alcoholism, there is a prevalent tendency to send him to the Keswick Colony, or some such institution of reform, or to jail. I do not in any way want to belittle the work done in colonies or in institutions of such character as I have mentioned, but I do desire to stand out against the lack of results from imprisonment. At the same time, the former scheme for reform seems only to be a small part of the plan and purpose for readjusting the home which has become disorganized through alcohol and consequent intemperance in its use. We must not consider the man as a drunkard alone, but must go beyond and back of that and study the personality of the individual, the previous and existing environment and the reasons and causes underlying his intemperance, so that if through a Keswick Colony we have been able to administer to the disease and to temporarily reform the individual, the cause and excuse for future failure may be removed through change of environment, friendly interest and the establishment of a firmer and higher moral code.

During my work for the past few months in connection with the Society for Organizing Charity, I have been in constant relationship with three families where the dependence and misery have been directly traced to alcoholism, and to-night I will briefly relate to you the story of one of these families and endeavor to point out the causes which we are seeking to overcome and obliterate. An effort of this character is usually a long and tedious one, but when seriously undertaken and conscientiously followed up and worked out, the result obtained is frequently most gratifying and lasting.

The case to which I refer is one which I will designate, for the mere purpose of identification, as that of Michael Kelly, whose use of alcohol has brought suffering and misery to his wife and children. There are four of these children, the oldest one, James, aged twenty-two, is now married and living in a home of his own, so that we have before us the problem of the father, mother and the other three children.

Perhaps it is hardly necessary to state here that this man is of Irish parentage, the nationality in which Amos G. Warner in his collected statistics for over 7000 families finds that the percentage of those addicted to the drinking habit is 23.62 per cent., which is 8 per cent. above the average for all other nationalities.

We have been unable, of course, to talk with the parents of Kelly, but we understand from him that they left Ireland when he was quite a small boy to live in one of the mill districts of Yorkshire, England. The father secured employment and was able to earn a modest living for his wife and four children. It was possible for Kelly to attend school only until he was thirteen years of age, and from that time and for three years afterwards he worked on different jobs about the town, which was small, and upon that account probably earned very little money for his efforts. He must have been, however, at this time a bright, enterprising fellow. An older brother and sister had come to America and he felt that by going to London he would obtain better and more remunerative work, which would enable him, through careful saving, to be able within a short time to earn enough money to make it possible for him to join his brother and sister in this country.

Kelly married his wife in 1893, twenty-three years ago. In the early winter, however, of that year we first knew him in connection with the Society for Organizing Charity. He was taken sick shortly after his marriage and had been out of work for six months when application was made to us for assistance. Here we find the first difficulty, sickness, and the consequent unemployment, which apparently was due to no fault on his part. Without work, he became discouraged, the weakness arising from his sickness created a craving for stimulants, and while in better times he had been able to take an occasional drink without in any way affecting his earning capacity, our records at this time show evidences of intemperance, but as yet little impairment of efficiency.

A few words about the wife. It is evident that there has been a marked difference in their environment, although their inheritance was very similar; she too is of Irish parentage, but was born in Pittsburgh. Her father unfortunately had a hard struggle to support the family and died when she was a child of only nine years of age. She continued to attend school irregularly until she was ten, and then she was sent to work in a mill to do cleaning, scrubbing and other odd jobs, earning $3.00 per week, which were turned over to the mother to supplement her own meagre earnings for the support of the family. This struggle continued all through her girlhood. As to what she was then we have no record, but she is now a thin, worn-out, little woman, discouraged with life, telling those with whom she comes in contact an incoherent story of an early life, spent in struggles and work among the mills of Pittsburgh. After awhile her mother died, and then she came to Germantown to live with an uncle, continuing to work in different mills in this locality.

Here, in 1893, she met Kelly, and shortly afterwards married him. From this brief outline, it will be seen that when she married she did not have any training in cooking, or in keeping her house in order, home-like and attractive. To look at her now one can imagine the inefficient and improvident house-keeper right from the start. The knowledge of domestic science accessible to girls of this class of the present time was denied to her. The odds were all against her. We find her now a great contrast to Kelly, who is naturally bright and alert and takes pride in his personal appearance and in his surroundings, although so frequently addicted to drink.

I cannot help feeling that, had there been more co-operation, efficiency, knowledge of simple home cooking and a pride in the care of the house upon her part, the sad conditions which surround this family to-day could have been averted.

After a time Kelly regained his health and was able to secure work, so that we did not hear from him or his family again until twenty years later.

During these years, Kelly had braced up again and had become a competent chauffeur and had been earning right along from $16 to $20 per week. Evidently, he had developed. His employers thought well of him, stating that he was at all times a hard worker and a competent man. Their only criticism of him was that he had a tendency to drink occasionally, although they had never known him to neglect his work on account of intemperance, or through that habit impair his efficiency. Through an accident, however, at this time, which resulted in an injury to his back, he had been out of work for a period of two months, the savings had all been used up, he and the family were up against it again.

On the other hand, through all these years, the wife had been slowly breaking down in health and generally going backward, due to an overworked, unpleasured childhood, and, at three different times, we have record of her having been committed to institutions for the care of the insane. This condition was brought about to some extent, no doubt, through the abuse which her oldest son, James, before he left the home, used to heap upon her, frequently beating her in the most terrible manner.

As soon as the children, James and Jennie, were old enough to go to work, Kelly seemed inclined to give up and to depend on them for support. These earnings, with what he added from time to time, were insufficient and meagre, but, after James left the parental roof, Kelly has made some efforts to obtain work in various garages in Germantown. Since his residence in this locality, he has become a heavy drinker and so undependable that he is now one of the large class of the unemployable. Long since he has been unable to secure employment at running a car, so that the only field open to him now seems to be the odd jobs here and there when the regular fellow is absent or sick.

His wife lately has tried in vain to make her husband support her through an appeal to the Court of Domestic Relations, but he seems to be able to evade the police so far successfully, and nothing has come of this attempt. Last week we had a long talk with Kelly and his wife, charges and counter-charges were made, so that there seemed to be faults on both sides, each becoming excited in turn. The trouble at the start came about, no doubt, from the improvidence and inefficiency of the wife to spend intelligently and to the best advantage of the weekly earnings of her husband and to take charge of and build around her the home which a man of Kelly's temperament craved and desired. He states to us that morning after morning he would get up and go to work without so much as a cup of hot coffee for breakfast, and that she, lazy and careless, would lie in bed late in the morning and sometimes well on toward noon. Her excuse for this was that during the winter without coal for fuel she was unable to warm the house and had to keep in bed in the mornings for the reason that it was the only place in the house that was comfortable. We tried to impress upon her that the one thing which she could and must do to keep Kelly away from the saloon was to prepare the morning meal for him.

As an illustration of the incompatibility which has arisen between these people, Kelly pointed to his wife, who was of necessity poorly clad, but whose hair was disheveled and uncombed, her person unclean and filthy, and asked us, "What can you expect of a man who has to look at such a lazy, good-for-nothing thing all of his life?"

At first Kelly had been in the habit of turning whatever money he had earned over to his wife, but now he seems disinclined to let her have the spending of any portion of it, and with the run-down and un-homelike conditions existing about the house, and his wife's improvidence and inefficiency ever before him, I fear that much now of what little he earns is spent for liquor. Apparently, he does keep the rent of the house paid. The daughter, Jennie, is now working and the father insisted soon after she started that she should provide the food for the rest of the family. This was an unreasonable and impossible demand at her present rate of wages.

With the view of getting some little order out of this chaos, we have succeeded in getting these various people to enter into an agreement whereby the daughter, Jennie, is to turn over a portion of her wages, which are now $3.00 a week, to her mother for food; the father upon his part to pay the rent of the house and $3.00 in cash per week to his wife; the wife upon her part to get up early in the mornings, prepare breakfast for her husband and the family, clean up and get the house in order and keep it so.

This home, through all the recent years that we have had any knowledge of this family, has been unkept, disorderly and always dirty, but through kind friends money has been given to us to be expended for warm covering for the beds and for paint for coating the woodwork and furniture inside as well as the woodwork on the outside. The red and green which have been selected are certainly effective and striking and seem to afford real pleasure to the members of this family. We are accordingly working on the principle that, if the good work along these lines is continued, the change of environment will appeal to the mother, create new interests and tend to make her change her habits so that the home will assume attractiveness for Kelly and, in that way, assist in breaking off this drinking habit.

This is a much longer story than I had started out to relate to you, but to me it is one of the most interesting of any which I have known. The first real difficulty seemed to arise through ill-health, which resulted in unemployment. The weakness which came from this condition perhaps had a tendency to increase the desire for something stimulating which would make his real physical weakness less apparent.

(To be concluded.)

"LET all seek to live upon the tree of life and not upon the tree of knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, and leadeth away from that inward quietness, stillness and humility of mind, where the Lord doth appear and His heavenly wisdom is revealed."

"HE is already half false who speculates on truth, and does not do it. Truth is given not to be contemplated, but to be done. Life is an action, not a thought; and the penalty paid by him who speculates on truth is, that by degrees the very truth he holds becomes to him a falsehood."

A TRUE AMBASSADOR.

While Europe is setting before the world a group of fighting men, the figure of a great maker of peace comes to us from Japan. Bishop Harris has not been talking peace among the Orientals for forty-five years, he has been breathing and living it; he is a contemporary illustration of the power of love. Many people understand love as a sentiment; few people have ever worked it out as a principle with more striking results than this Methodist missionary bishop who has now retired after a lifetime of unselfish service. When he went to Japan forty-five years ago, the Island Empire was just emerging from the isolation of its long feudal period. Shortly after his arrival a young Samurai, after ceremonial purification and meditation, killed a foreigner as a sacrificial offering in defense of his country. The other day when Bishop Harris left Japan a large company of the most distinguished Japanese of today united in a testimonial dinner to him!

When he went to Japan, a friend of the young missionary sent him a revolver in view of the disquietude then prevailing in the section where he was staying, but the preacher threw it into the sea; he had no need of that kind of protection. He went to the American Consul, reported that he had taken up his residence, and said that he and his wife had come to devote themselves to the teaching of Christianity. After some conversation the Consul said, half humorously and half seriously: "I suppose, Mr. Harris, you will soon be calling for a gunboat!" to which the young missionary replied that he should under no circumstances ask for that kind of protection; that he had come to serve the Japanese, and that he and his wife would accept whatever that service involved.

To the Japanese on the Pacific coast of America, in Hawaii, in Korea, in all parts of the Japanese Empire, his name is a synonym for peace and good-will. The traveler in the East who goes with a desire to understand the people whom he visits, and not simply to confirm the impressions he has already formed of them, speedily finds that from no class of men and women can he get such trustworthy information of the character of the different races as from the missionaries, and if he keeps his mind open he eventually makes the great discovery that they all alone understand a people who work with and for them. The men who go among a foreign people for profit often secure an intimate knowledge of the ways of the country and the habits of its people; but no man ever yet learned the soul of a people who lived among them chiefly for his own profit. It is a significant fact that the missionaries, as a rule, are zealous believers in the superiority of the races among whom they work. The missionaries in Japan, Korea, China, and India, for instance, believe devotedly in the superior capacity of the races among whom they live. They know them from within; instead of "working" them, they work for and with them.

Dr. Harris is an elderly man. It will not harm him, therefore, to say of him that there is a luminous quality about him; as he moved in and out among the Japanese and the Koreans he has lighted the path to a higher and happier life. He has also lighted the path to peace. If such a man as he could interpret the different countries to one another, the very roots out of which hatred and distrust grow would perish.

At the Methodist General Conference at Saratoga, recently reported by The Outlook, Dr. Harris made the last report of his stewardship, but no report which he could make, save by its reflection of the great advance of Christianity in Japan and Korea, could in any way suggest the extraordinary service he has rendered by simply being a Christian in those countries. At a farewell dinner given him in Tokyo by a group of the most distinguished Japanese, including the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Viscount Kaneko, the President of the lower house of the Japanese Diet, many spoke with the utmost gratitude of the service which Dr. Harris had rendered to the Japanese people. The Minister of Foreign Affairs said, "If all Americans dealt with us as open-heartedly as Dr. Harris does, and if we revered the Americans as we revere Dr. Harris, friendship between Japan and America would remain unchanged forever." And on the eve of his departure from Tokyo the Emperor decorated him for the third time.

Such a man is in the truest sense a national ambassador. America has been fortunate in sending to the Far East many high-minded interpreters of the American spirit. Commodore Perry, who opened the country to Western influence, and Townsend Harris, who drew the first treaty made by Japan with this country, are known to every school-boy in the Empire because they represented the spirit which Dr. Harris has expressed in all his relations with the Japanese. Charles Cuthbert Hall's two visits to India are historic, because foremost among the men of the West who have endeavored to explain the West to the East, he approached the Indian mind so sympathetically and with such a desire to understand and to find common ground between the Occident and the Orient that he secured a hospitality of hearing and an earnestness and depth of attention which were a revelation to many who supposed that they were perfectly familiar with the temper of the Indian mind.

The time will come when such careers as that of Dr. Harris will cease to be prophetic; they will become the practical rule of living.—From The Outlook.

WHEREFORE, WHITE MAN?

BY MEDICINE ARROW.

White Man, you taught us that war was wrong. You told us to turn from the war-path; you said we should live at peace with other tribes of our own people and with yours. We listened to your words. We have remembered them. All that you told us to do, we have done. Our lances are broken. Our bows are burned and our arrows are lost. Our tomahawks are buried so deep that they have been forgotten. The once keen edge of the scalping knife is dulled with the rust of many years. The useless shield hangs on the wall like the picture of an age that is past. The drum of the war-dance is heard no more. The green grass of the prairie has spread its cloak over the last trace of the ancient war-path to hide it from our eyes forever. The bright path of peace is the only one known to our young men. Our people sing the songs of peace. It is well.

White Man, you told us it was the will of the Great Spirit that we should go to war no more. Do you think He will be unmindful if you draw your sword against another people of your own race? If war was wrong for the Red Man, can it be right for the White Man, or has truth itself become untrue?

White Man, you still sing the songs of war. You teach the stories of war to your young men. Your horses are trained to travel the trails that lead to war. The tread of your armies is more terrible than the flood or tempest. The thunder of your mighty guns makes the earth heave and tremble. You soar to the clouds like the war-eagle. You defy the demons of the deep with craft that are wafted beneath the waves. Yet vain are all the powers thus called to your aid!

White Man, despise not the words of your Red Brother, who is humble and weak. Listen to the message of him whom you once called a savage. Learn for yourself the lesson you once taught him. Turn from your ways of war into the paths of peace.

The words of your Red Brother's tongue are as the impulses of his heart.—Copied by J. W. B. from "Tributes to a Vanishing Race."

O, THERE is a time to be empty, to be stripped, to be poor, to be buffeted by the wintry winds, to be deprived of all sense of life, and any relish for, or savor of good; and then, I have found it safe to lie in littleness in true insignificance, waiting in the abandonment of self, in the silence of all flesh, for His re-appearing, "in whose presence there is fullness of joy," and abundance of consolation, saith my soul from undoubted experience.—J. "THE FAMILY OF LOVE."

AN OPEN LETTER.

"When I am with our Beloved, in the enjoyment of Him, I enjoy thee & the rest of the family of love of which He is the head, yet hath become servant of all."—George Fox to William Caton, from Launceston Jail.

It has been my privilege for some weeks past to move about among Friends in the Eastern States, and also to make a flying visit to the Middle West and get into touch with at least a few of the Friends there. Now that I have returned to the home-land it seems only fitting that I should send back a few lines of loving gratitude for all the wealth of kindness received and for the ready response to the tale I had to tell. And with this message of thanks I would couple a strong appeal that the members of "the family of love" in America would continue to bear upon their hearts their fellow-members in this warring country.

To return to England at this time is like coming back to a beloved household on which has fallen some great shadow or which has sustained some great loss.

Certainly the shadow and the loss were both there already months ago, but one feels them more after an absence in happier scenes. Also the fact remains that the shadow has "deepened down" in the weeks that have elapsed, especially over the members of our own Society and others who share their point of view and line of action. Changes and gaps there are many. This one and that has gone abroad, to France, to Holland, etc.; this one and the other is preparing to go; this one is missing, also, though he may be near at hand, for prison walls conceal him; another is still with us, but any day he may disappear and join his comrades in bonds.

The ordinary First-day meeting-for-worship is a "meeting for sufferings." Friends come there indeed gladly, there is a feeling even of eagerness and anticipation, but there is a new feeling also of solemnity, of sorrow, of tenderness, of depth, a new anxiety to feel out for and to find "the everlasting arms," and "the underlying unity." There is no question but that the gathered company is a loyal part of the great "family of love." Their first privilege and duty is "to remember those that are in bonds as bound with them," to remember also in prayer those that are in danger or pain and those that are bearing heavy burdens of rule and responsibility. We are reminded of our own members whose places are empty and who need our special love.

Then we are led on into wider spaces and live over again something of the living experience of the recent Yearly Meeting, which sought and also to some extent, at any rate, found an "underlying unity." In great humility and need hearts were opened out to see a vision of the great purposes of God and of the possibility of a unity in Him, above and below all differences of thought and action. To seek His will and the power to fulfil it, this is the great quest which calls us all to go forward, humbly, unitedly, prayerfully.

It comes to us at this time with renewed meaning when it is borne on the lips of a widowed mother, who has one of her sons in prison for conscience' sake and the other feeling it his duty to enlist. We are drawn out of ourselves into fellowship at such times and yet there is a new solemnity in the question, "What wouldst Thou have me to do?"

As we separate there is a new sense of privilege in all the common intercourse of heart with heart that still remains to us and new joy in the young life and in the little children who have hardly yet realized the unknown future which it will be theirs to shape.

The time of social intercourse is precious, for there is much to be told and learnt of the happenings to Friends and others in the tribunals, the courts-martial and the prisons, and much has to be planned for in the coming week. Some of the Friends are already appointed "Quaker chaplains," authorized by the military authorities to act as spiritual advisers to such of the "conscientious objectors" as desire their ministrations; some are only visiting occasionally with permission to hold meetings for worship on First-day in this or that prison; some are busy watching the proceedings of the law-courts and following up the legal issues. Day by day the burden becomes more weighty, but day by day also the vision becomes clearer of the spiritual issues for which it is worth while to work and to suffer, to live and to die, and day by day the bonds become closer among those who are striving for these spiritual ends.

We knew something before the war of what George Fox meant when he spoke of "the family of love," but we know more now, and we shall know more and more as the months go by. Already the bonds of this family have widened over here, and our fellowship actually embraces many more than those who call themselves by our name. But may we not also say that the thousands who call themselves by this same name on your side of the Atlantic are also one with us in family love at this time, and are prepared to hold out to us the hand of sympathy and to bear us on their hearts in the one all-embracing love?

M. CATHARINE ALBRIGHT.

BROWNSGROVE, England.

"THERE WAS GIVEN ME A THORN IN THE FLESH."

Some of us would be rather at a loss without our "thorn in the flesh." We ask God many times to remove it, but if He does not, we make it into a standing apology for ourselves. It is an excuse for every blunder, every omission, every failure. We say that we are so heavily handicapped! What did Paul do? He turned his handicap into dynamic, enthusiasm, efficiency. It became a limitation no longer, but a valuable asset. He grew to think of it as something given him by God to knit his life more surely to the eternal life and strength. So far from it disqualifying him for service, it made him able to serve more abundantly.

Would it be impossible for us to treat some of our handicaps in a similar fashion? To-day a very common thorn in the flesh is "nerves." The word has almost become a modern equivalent to "Satan." The nervous strain of duty is too great for us: certain people "get on our nerves;" we are compelled to avoid all unpleasant tasks, all painful situations, because we are so sensitive and highly strung! How obvious it would have been to Paul, that here, if anywhere, God's strength could be made perfect in weakness. A finely wrought nervous organization, sensitive in every fibre of it—what a channel for God to work through, if once it yielded itself to the grace of God! What a mediator of sympathy and comprehension, and help, a person could be who was really, as we say, "all nerves," and gave God his nerves to keep and use. Yet we make nerves our apology for forgetting God and man!

There is the handicap of poverty. Some of us believe firmly that bigger incomes, the relief from grinding daily cares and duties, would indefinitely increase our capacity for doing good. We would set the world such splendid examples if we were millionaires! As it is, we say to those yet poorer and more helpless: "Silver and gold have we none," but we do not offer what we have. Yet if we did, if we only let God take our poverty and supplement it with His wealth, what gifts we should be! Say no longer: "I cannot give because I am poor," but say rather, "Because I am poor, I must give!" So it is with mental, even with moral handicaps. We may be dull, but there is always access to God's wisdom—the infinite wisdom of infinite love. Our lives may be stained and seared by moral failure. But there has never been a life too broken for Him to use, who never fails. We try to palliate our own futility by saying that we are "weak as water." But God's strength is still made perfect in weakness.—MAY KENDALL, in The Friend (London).

"Loud upon our blindness Thy pure radiance pour;
For Thy loving-kindness make us love Thee more.
And when clouds are drifting dark across our sky,
Then, the veil uplifting, Father, be Thou nigh."

THE WAR RELIEF WORK.

Of late a good deal has been said regarding the work of relief and reconstruction accomplished by young English Friends and at last the rank and file of us are beginning to realize that something out of the ordinary has been going forward. The various reports and circulars which have drifted westward, the weekly accounts in The Friend (London), more especially the narrations of those who know the work at first hand, have combined to give us a glimpse of the quiet, efficient manner in which our English fellows have met their ordeal and are carrying Quaker principles into courageous practice. Yet a vast number among us still know virtually nothing of what is being done. Nor indeed can one always avoid the thought that not all desire information. We are cognizant of the war in Europe, but we would much prefer not to be afflicted with knowledge. Especially to-day, when all our concentration is needed for business—so that we can get off for a week-end on Sixth-day. Besides it is painful to hear that young Friends have been wounded, have died from sickness, and have been killed by shells and bombs during their service. Why mention such unpleasant topics? "It is a great work," we cheerfully admit, "a wonderful work; but" (this we infer) it must not obtrude upon the business day or raise its head in recreational conversation. "The war is not our business and while we greatly sympathize—etc., etc."

When all is said and done, if we mean anything by our vaunted professions of Christianity, this war in Europe is very much our business. Starving folk cannot appreciate abstract sympathy—square meals and roof trees more content them. Words help of course, but just now there is rather a striking need for something a little more relevant to the system of the good Samaritan. The purpose of this writing you have by this time probably guessed. Perhaps you already understand the financial problems which face the committees behind the English Friends' Relief Work. Otherwise here is insight to an unpleasant, essential, extremely crucial and little apprehended topic.

The relief activities which English Friends maintain require a total monthly expenditure of close on fifty thousand dollars. As the workers are unpaid volunteers, practically all of this sum goes into actual constructive work. In England there are only twenty thousand Friends—about one-sixth of the number in this country—and for two years the burden of support has been carried by this handful. To date English Friends have given thirteen-fourteenths of the contributions on which the work is entirely dependent, the remaining fraction has come from this country and Canada.

Affairs in England are now such that this proportion must be altered. The more well-to-do among the English Friends—those who have hitherto been instrumental in keeping the work alive and forceful—are losing half their income under the new fifty per cent. war tax. In addition the factories of several have been sequestered for munition making and other war purposes. Under such conditions limitations hedge the most willing spirit. Without alternative the Relief Work will be greatly curtailed, perhaps cease altogether if Friends in this country are unwilling to do their share.

My own personal experience has led me to feel that one of the most splendid features of the work is the practical way in which it materializes Quaker doctrine. It is positive pacifism; constructive work carried through against great obstacles at a time when all other resources are turned to destructive ends. Even now, when conscientious objectors are (to say the least) unpopular in England, tributes to the effectiveness of this Quaker Relief Work are coming from many unexpected sources. When the Conscription Act went into effect all members of the Friends' Ambulance Unit were granted total military exemption. No one would accuse the British War Office of showing partiality towards our set, yet even the school of Kitchener realizes that non-combatant work is the proper and well-merited province of these young English Friends. After the war recognition of what has been achieved will lead to a deepened and more general appreciation of that for which the Society stands. It means a big boom for Quakerism. Should the work cease for lack of financial support?

In and around Philadelphia a few meetings—Twelfth Street, Haverford and Germantown—have instituted campaigns to obtain from members regular monthly donations for supporting the work. This form of contribution is most valuable. It assures the London Committees of a settled income, establishes a working basis and enables plans to be made for enough in advance to render their fulfillment efficient. Moreover, if successful, it gives birth to a democracy of interest which the support of a few wealthy donors must lack. Ten donations of five dollars a month are more valuable than one of fifty, for they show ten times as many people to be actively behind the work and the great ideals and principles for which it stands. There are not many to whom donations of from one to five dollars a month would be a very vital drain. Among the wives and children of the interned aliens in England, in devastated provinces of Belgium, France and Poland, among the Belgian refugees in Holland and the exiled Serbians in Corsica and Salonika—in all the war-stricken communities where Friends are doing their essential work, such sums would to-day be saving life, and other things more precious.

Here is no mention of the great scope and vitality of the work already accomplished. That is of the past and has been well treated in the various reports from London. Looking at facts we see how crucial and precarious is the present situation of the Friends' Relief Work. Without semblance of exaggeration its future depends on our own generosity and exertion. The monthly donation scheme is of tested value. Has it been discussed in your Meeting?

FELIX M. MORLEY.

NOTE.—F. M. M., a recent Haverford graduate, has but lately returned from a ten months' visit abroad. The visit was undertaken on a sense of duty and much of his time was spent in ambulance and relief service, so that as one reads what he has written, there may be no discounting the story he tells.—EDITORS.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

THERE is a loftier ambition than merely to stand high in the world. It is to stoop down and lift mankind a little higher. There is a nobler character than that which is merely incorruptible. It is the character which acts as an antidote and preventive of corruption. Fearlessly to speak the words which bear witness to righteousness and truth and purity; patiently to do the deeds which strengthen virtue and kindly hope in your fellowmen; generously to lend a hand to those who are trying to climb upward; faithfully to give your support and your personal help to the efforts which are making to elevate and purify the social life of the world—that is what it means to have salt in your character.—HENRY VAN DYKE.

TWELVE QUESTIONS.—1.—We hear that alcohol gives strength. If so, why do athletes abstain while training for a race or other contests requiring strength?

2.—We hear that alcohol gives endurance. If so, why do the great employers of labor cut off the supply of drink when work of an especially arduous or lengthened nature is required.

3.—We hear that alcohol gives heat. If so, why is it that the temperature of a person unconscious from drink is always sub-normal?

4.—We hear that alcohol keeps out the cold. If so, why do travellers in Arctic regions, who take drink, succumb to the extreme cold, while total abstainers remain unharmed?

5.—We hear that alcohol is good in hot countries. If so, why did Stanley refuse it to his men during his forced march across Africa in search of Emin Pasha?

6.—We hear that alcohol steadies the nerves. If so, why do surgeons abstain before performing a delicate operation?

7.—We hear that alcohol is needful in illness. If so, how can it be that the London Temperance Hospital has a well-known low death rate?

8.—We hear that alcohol sustains the health. If so, why do Insurance Societies admit total abstainers at a lower premium, or give them a larger bonus than others?

9.—We hear that it is dangerous suddenly to give up the use of alcohol. If so, why have prisoners, most of whom are obliged suddenly to abstain, a lower death rate than almost any other class of men?

10.—We hear that alcohol promotes happiness. If so, why are drunkards' homes proverbial for their misery?

11.—We hear that alcohol is necessary for mothers in the care of their children. If so, why are about 1,000 babies suffocated every year in London alone by drunken mothers, and 27 per cent. of these on Saturday (drink) nights?

12.—We hear that it is easy for moderate drinkers to keep moderate. If so, why do so many slip over the boundary line of moderation and sink into a drunkard's grave?

NO PURCHASE OF LOCAL OPTION.—C. T. Gibboney is an advocate of the purchase of liquor establishments by the Government. He is opposed to local option, on the theory that it is equivalent to the confiscation of private property. Drive out the liquor industry, he argues, but drive it out by purchase, not by edict.

John Jones had a dog and he paid a license to keep it. It was not a bad dog ordinarily, but one day it went mad, sent its venom into three or four children, killed a wife or two and otherwise inflicted great damage on the community. "Don't touch that dog," cried Jones, "it's licensed." But the big policeman drew a bead on the animal's heart and there was nothing left but the carcass.

There comes into court, calling on the law for protection, an industry which has viciously violated the law, which contributed its money and its influence to corrupt the law, which has degraded the very sources of the law by crowding into the gutter citizens who make the law. Yet it is an industry which exists only by toleration of the people. Indeed, the property value of which it prates is almost wholly a franchise value and nothing more. The value of the saloon is not in its stock of liquor, but in its authorization to sell that liquor.

The industry, obviously needing regulation, has resorted to insidious political activity to prevent that regulation save in such form as it approved. It has induced the demand for its eradication in such communities as are opposed to its continuance. It has constituted itself a public nuisance. Why, therefore, should it be recompensed for its own malfeasance in behavior?

But local option is not Prohibition. It simply confers on a governmental unit the right to decide by vote whether the liquor business within that unit shall be treated as an outlaw. Local option gives the liquor business the same chance that it gives the opposition. A business so rotten that a majority of the citizens want to strangle it has no particular claims on the consideration of the public.

The liquor industry is not a vested right; it is in many cases a vested wrong. Its franchise is held subject to the pleasure of the people. It simply must cease to exist when the people so will, just as the great racing plants ceased to exist. Nobody, we believe, ever advocated that race-track gamblers should be reimbursed, although part of their profits had gone to the State. A business that becomes repugnant to the morals of the age, no matter what its former standing in the law, must go, just as slavery went, and the only consideration it can expect is the warnings of approaching action, a warning which the slaveholders had and a warning which the liquor business has been getting for more than half a century.—The Evening Ledger (Phila.)

PARTIES AND PLATFORMS.—"No real fight was made for a prohibition plank in the Republican and Democratic platforms," we see it stated, by which is meant, we suppose, that no contest over this question took place in either of those party conventions. It appears, however, that pleas were made before the Resolutions Committee of each party named on behalf of such a plank.

Prohibition appeals had no weight; and, of course, they were not carried to the floor of either body.

The Progressives were more hospitable to prohibition, for they did consider it in open convention, after their committee had made a report ignoring the question. A pledge to submit an amendment to the National Constitution opened the debate, delegates from North Dakota, Colorado, Texas and Kansas strongly favoring it. Henry Allen, of the last-named State, declared that it was "designed to conserve humanity." James R. Garfield said that he favored prohibition, but was against putting it in the platform, because in that case it would become the main issue of the campaign.

Says Oliver W. Stewart, in The National Enquirer, edited by Governor Hanly and himself: "The man who is tempted this year to vote the Prohibition ticket as a protest against the failure of politicians and old parties to declare against the saloon, will not be deterred for fear that his ballot for the Prohibition party may be the means of permitting a weak candidate of one of the old parties to win. He can vote with the Prohibitionists, feeling confident that the ship of State is safe with the hand of either Wilson or Hughes at the helm."

NEWS ITEMS.

We have given as a matter of interest the names of some of those who expected to attend the Cedar Lake Conference. A Friend has sent us a list of those who left Philadelphia on the third. Most, if not all, went as delegates from their Monthly Meetings.

Ethel M. Whitson and Harold M. Lane from Philadelphia Western District; Rebecca Carter and Esther Rhoads, from Germantown; Edith Hall, from Frankford; Julia Branson, from Lansdowne; Eleanor Stokes, from Moorestown; Arthur Pennell, from Chester, Pa., Monthly Meetings; Robert H. Maris and Rebecca Rhoads, from Wilmington, and Ryu Sato and Hannah G. Dewees, from Haverford.

Anna Walton had expected to go as an older representative, but at the last moment was prevented.

On Ninth Month 25, 1915, the Friends of Woodbury, N. J., celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of the erection of the building in which both branches now worship. The pleasant recollection of our working together in preparation for that occasion led to the thought of having an informal social gathering of the members of the two branches on the afternoon of Seventh Month 29, 1916. Both meetings are very small, but over fifty people found much pleasure in a picnic on the large meeting property, with its fine old trees and ample lawn.

By way of entertainment some of us entered heartily into the merriment of an old-fashioned spelling-bee, in which young and old and middle-aged were equally matched. A box supper, to which ice cream was added, was followed by lively games until darkness dismissed us. Cordial appreciation was expressed of this simple little get-together effort, with the pleasure of those hours in the open under ideal weather conditions. E. B. S.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Seventh Month 31st was reported as the hottest day of the year in Philadelphia, with a record of 95 degrees, not exceeded on that date for forty years.

An army of 150,000 school children of this city attacked caterpillars this week. The Board of Education is supervising the work, which is done through the playgrounds and garden centers and will be conducted in the nature of a contest to encourage the children to gather as many egg masses as possible.

The caterpillar which is doing all the harm is the tussock moth, and is extremely prolific this summer because of climatic conditions. The 140 playgrounds and 16 garden centers of the city will be the clearing-houses for the children's collections, and record will be made of each child's work and the winner will be announced.

The appointment as chief of the State Bureau of Economic Zoology has been tendered to Prof. J. G. Sanders, recently picked by the State Agricultural Commission to succeed Dr. H. A. Surface after Governor Brumbaugh had approved the appointment. Professor Sanders is at present State entomologist of Wisconsin.

GENERAL.—Property loss in the vicinity of New York City estimated at $20,000,000 was caused on the 30th ult. by a series of terrific explosions of ammunition awaiting shipment to the entente allies and stored on Black Tom Island, a small strip of land jutting into New York bay off Jersey City.

The epidemic of infantile paralysis is unabated. In New York the total number of cases of the disease since the epidemic began has been more than 4000. While the health authorities assert that they have the situation well in hand, they admit that unless cooler weather sets in the number of new cases probably will be increased by several thousand before the epidemic stage passes.

Balloons of one-fourth of the 400,000 members of four railroad brotherhoods who are voting on the question of calling a general strike on 225 railroads already have been canvassed and they were virtually unanimous in favor of a strike. The Federal authority has been invoked to avert the strike.

Charles E. Hughes has twice declared himself in favor of an amendment to the Federal constitution granting the vote to women throughout the United States.

The "Institute for Government Research," the latest Rockefeller philanthropy, is to be launched in the fall with headquarters in a building which has just been rented in New York City. The Institute will prepare "service monographs," "service manuals," critical and constructive reports disclosed by these manuals, special reports on the organization and administration of the government, and so on.

A Christian school of religion and Christian social center is planned for a site adjoining the campus of the University of Illinois. The land is to be bought with a fund raised for the most part among people of Urbana and Champaign. The plan is projected by the Methodists, and is a part of a general one that hopes in time to provide such schools and centers, with adequate equipments, at great educational centers in Minnesota, Missouri, Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, Washington and California. The four Methodist conferences in Illinois are behind the project at Urbana-Champaign.

Senator La Follette made a successful effort to force the Senate to adopt an amendment to the army appropriation bill prohibiting the enlistment in the regular army of boys under 21 years of age without the consent of their parents or guardians. This prohibition was part of the law before the recent enactment of the Hay-Chamberlain bill.

The worthless stocks and bonds found in the estate of the late J. P. Morgan by the appraisers had a par value of about $8,000,000, yet J. P. Morgan had as sound a judgment in regard to securities as anyone, probably. In all of the great estates appraised in New York in recent years, worthless securities have been found amounting at par to several millions of dollars.

The following is from the Springfield Republican: "At Amherst, Pa., is located one of the most remarkable institutions in the United States—a school that is each year turning out young women qualified to run farms, to be florists, market gardeners, proprietors or managers of fruit farms and orchards. This is the school of horticulture for women which was founded in 1910 by the club and college women of Philadelphia."

M. C. Hutchins of the Massachusetts State Forestry Department says that Canadian officials have been obtaining information regarding the Massachusetts system of combating forest fires. The principal feature of this system is the chain of lookouts stationed on hills which command a long view in all directions. There is no reason why it should not be applied to the hilly portions of Canada except that population is sparse and there are few local fire departments to call out.

FOREIGN.—Three chief objects are attained by the recently concluded alliance between Japan and Russia, according to the ideas of well-informed political critics in Japan.

The first is the mutual elimination of the menace of hostilities between the two empires, which has existed for more than half a century, and which was not completely eradicated by the Russo-Japanese War.

The second is the strengthening of each other's hands in dealing with the situation in China and the affiliation of their special interests in the country and the Far East generally.

The third is the relieving of Russia's anxiety as to the protection of her rights and spheres of influence in the Far East.

Toronto, Eighth Month 2.—Estimates to-day of the number of dead in the bush fires in northern Ontario Seventh-day and First-day at put at 500 by refugees arriving from the various places in the fire-sweep zone. A score of refugees, some with burns and all showing signs of suffering, arrived here to-day with stories of thrilling escapes.

BETTER LIGHTING AT TUNESASSA.—Friends who read Joseph Elkinton's appeal for improved lighting at Tunesassa will be interested to learn that an electric lighting apparatus, including gasoline engine generator, and storage battery, is now being installed, the cost of which is estimated not to exceed $1500. It will be placed in operation before school opens next month and will light the main and school buildings also the barns and dairy.

The Committee believes that Friends will appreciate the conveniences and relief which this improvement promises to afford to both caretaker and children, and will contribute towards it. One thousand, four hundred and thirty dollars are needed. Contributions may be sent to Wm Bacon Evans, Treasurer, 205 E. Central Avenue, Moorestown, N. J. Contributions received to date, $70.00.

THE FULL MEASURE.

In the Gospel of John we find these words as a part of the Master's farewell prayer: "I pray not that thou shouldst take them from the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil one."

Friends abroad in the world to-day among thinking and talking men and women, or indeed any warm and ardent advocates of the doctrine of "peace at any sacrifice" find it almost impossible in these times, when the very savagery of war has a grip upon the nations, to argue for their principles without receiving a reply something like this: "You contend so valiantly for peace, why do you not with equal fervor argue for and live out other principles and practices which the Lord coupled with it, and for which He pleaded with a like earnestness? Why do you not literally share with your neighbor the good things of this life which fortune has lavished upon you and which she has denied to him? Why do you go counter to the injunction to lay not up treasure here? Why after possessing the treasure do you share it with others only on the basis of exacting as much interest as the law will sustain you in demanding?" And when you find yourselves a bit puzzled to return a satisfying answer, is your position made an easier one by their continuing: "Is there any consistency in laying such stress upon one part of our Lord's commandments, while you neglect and even violate other parts given with equal clearness?"

No one probably has attempted to argue the question of peace at any price, who has not been met with an opposition that embraces some one of several such objections as these just alluded to. We are not about to advise a line of argument, for we believe such has never been formulated and the very nature of the case forbids us from thinking that it can be done now to the satisfaction of those who do not see with us.

We have a thought, however, that the Society of Friends has a unique and an important position in this matter and it is to this that we want to devote a few words.

It seemed to be given to the Early Friends to see very clearly that the teaching embodied in the commandment,

"Love your enemies" and repeated in other forms had a very positive and direct meaning and was not capable of other than the one interpretation. To them the injunction, "Do good to all men" was as real as it was simple, and the record of their "testimony-bearing" is ample that they tried to act this out and in many cases made a triumphant success of their trial. They did not argue along lines that properly enough commend themselves to the modern economist and statesman, the simple teaching of Jesus was enough, and they rested their case, first and last, on His plain declarations, and in these they were satisfied. So satisfying to them were His teachings that no trials seemed so severe as to shake them from their position. Have we any record that they were as diligent to live out in all literalness all the other commands of their Master?

Some of them we know did, but the peace testimony which they bore from the very first has been the most conspicuous of all their testimonies and has attracted to them more than any others the notice of strangers.

We know that God uses people, men and women individually, one here and another there, one at one time in the world's history, another at a later time, one in one part of the world and one in another, one with a definite mission for Him, another with a call as clearly defined but totally different, these all in their respective fields working out His righteous ends.

To the devout historian no fact is more patent. Is it not natural to assume then that just as He uses individuals in special and isolated cases, He may use communities or groups to witness for Him, and through the slow process of leavening He may advance the race. Christ's symbol of the growth in spirit life—"first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear" is in harmony with this or rather the two are but illustrations of the one law, that natural advancement in all things is slow and continuous and regular, that things evolve, and after the evolution is sufficiently advanced he who can look with the eye of reason can trace the steps of progress, while however the evolving was taking place it was the eye of faith and not of sight that did the seeing. It has not been the record of history that as any great evil has been testified against by the world, and has been wiped from its statute books and virtually blotted out, that the nations which have achieved this record have come forth spotless and radiant; as a matter of fact, they have long retained the associated emblems of impurity.

The reform work in every cause has been slow and always discouraging and the generation that has won a great victory has been far more ignorant of any advancement achieved than have the generations that followed.

For two hundred and fifty years Friends have been testifying against all war. They have not been universally faithful to the teaching, but the opportunities when they might have been recreant to their great trust and were not have been many in contrast to the number of times that they have backslidden.

They have preached peace in their sermons, they have written about it and argued in its favor, they have taught it in their schools and practiced it in their business enterprises, and they have in good measure lived it among themselves and their neighbors. They have been both passive and active in their opposition to war and their annals are not lacking in instances of heroic suffering for this cause. Who questions that when the end shall be accomplished, and the obscuring line be drawn through the infamous practice of war that has been drawn through other relics of savagery, that one by one have yielded to Christian advancement, who questions that it may not be God's plan to lay another testimony upon a people who will receive strength from Him to bear it.

It is not for us to glory in any achievement. It is rather that we should be thankful for any little part we may have had as a religious Society in openly testifying to one of our Lord's commands, even though to our neighbor we seem to have fallen to his platform in neglecting others.

The eyes of many thoughtful men and women are opening upon problems which seem to them very new because they have never looked for them; the war has turned men's thoughts into many channels where previously they had not searched. Christ's teachings on social questions are to receive an interpretation that they have not received since the days of the Christian fathers. May the farewell prayer of our Lord be realized by the new Society of Friends in no selfish seclusion, regarding personal security and personal salvation as the goal of attainment, but with a broadening outlook each one regarding the welfare of others as equal with his own.

When any body of people has attained to this standard, then He who knows the end from the beginning and who wishes to use us as instruments to further His cause, will lay upon us new tasks and these may give rise to new testimonies. It may be all we can do at present is to be faithful to what we feel He calls us to do, but somehow in our best moments of reflection, we seem to know that there is a pattern set for us to imitate here in this world among our fellows, which pattern we do not measure up to until we fulfil all those requirements which will call down upon us from above all the blessings uttered so long ago upon the Mount.

AN APPEAL.

HAROLD EVANS.

Last Fifth Month Harold Evans spoke to the Annual Picnic supper held by the Auxiliary of young men and women at Crum Creek. He was much appreciated there and I asked him for a copy of the address which he gave me permission to use as I liked. I have wondered whether it would not be acceptable to THE FRIEND.—M. J. MOON.

As we have sat here this evening around our camp fire beneath the moon and stars, doubtless the thoughts of many of us have turned to the battlefields of Europe where the same moon and the same stars are shining upon far different camp scenes than this. And yet the young men in those camps are made of the same stuff as we. They are our brothers different from us only perhaps in this, that many of them are pouring out "the last full measure of devotion"—are giving their lives—for their ideals, whereas we are living in ease and comfort, many of us taking no part in the great world agony.

How much are you and I sacrificing to-day for our ideals? And if we are not sacrificing, what is the reason? Is it that our ideals are already realized? Surely no. Is it that the struggle to make them realities does not involve suffering and sacrifice on our part? No reform has ever been achieved without its martyrs. Or is it that we have not enlisted in the battle, that we are drifting with the crowd, content like many another to engage in a continual compromise of our ideals, hoping no doubt for a better world order of society, but unwilling to take the risk of living out our ideals unflinchingly in a world that does not accept them?

What splendid possibilities are in this gathering! What might we not accomplish if we were only willing to give our lives for the spread of the Spiritual Kingdom of Love as thousands, yes, millions, of young men in Europe are doing for the spread of the material kingdoms of the world. We have much to learn from them. If we are to be Christians in more than name we must surely find for ourselves the spiritual equivalent of war. It is not an easy task. If we were to-night being mobilized for the defense of our country, if we were stirred with martial music and the enthusiasm of a false patriotism, it would perhaps be much less difficult for us to arm ourselves and march out to battle than it is for us to put on the armor of God and fight our spiritual battles.

And what is spiritual warfare? It cannot be merely the warfare within ourselves to overcome evil thoughts and evil habits. The Gospel of love is personal, but it is also social. Spiritual warfare means conquering all that keeps men from their best wherever we find it, but conquering with spiritual not material forces. I ask you which requires the greater courage and faith—to go out to defend the neutrality of Belgium, to overthrow Prussianism, with machine guns, bayonets and howitzers, or to go out armed only with the Gospel of love and brotherhood and reconciliation to meet "the serried rows of Prussians" in our social, industrial and political life? And let us not imagine that the Prussians are not among us. We are out of the great war, thanks not to any virtues of our own, but to three thousand miles of ocean. The seeds of war are in our very midst and where the seed is there will the fruit be also. It may not take the form of international conflict, but industrial war may be as baneful as international. It is no worse to kill with a Gatling gun than with a low wage.

The problem of war is not an isolated one. It is bound up in our everyday lives and we shall never have peace until we as individuals live out the gospel of love. It is useless, yes, worse than useless, for us to preach peace in international relations which affect us but remotely, unless we are willing here and now to consecrate ourselves afresh to an endeavor to live out this gospel in our everyday relationships which affect us very intimately.

And what is the essence of the evil of war whether it be social, commercial or international? Is it not that it negates love as a basis of human society and disregards the supreme value of personality? We talk about "the French," "the Russians," "the Germans," "the enemy," "capital" and "labor" as though each were of itself an entity. We forget that each is but a group of individuals like ourselves, our brothers, children of the same Heavenly Father. So, too, in our daily lives. Our servants—well, they are just servants; the car conductor—he is merely a car conductor; the telephone girl—she is scarcely human. Each of them might almost as well be a mere machine so far as our treatment of them is concerned. We deal with them because it is necessary in order to get what we want. We forget that they are individual souls, each of infinite value in the sight of God. We daily commit the sin of impersonality.

Surely this was not Jesus' way. The multitudes that thronged Him, clamoring for food or health were not merely "the crowd." They were individual children of God, each with his own priceless personality. And as such He dealt with them, giving to each what each most needed. Even the despised classes—the publicans, the harlots—were not merely classes to Him. They were individual personalities, children of His Father, whom He must reach and bring back home. Surely otherwise no Levi could have been found among His disciples, no Mary to wash His feet with her tears.

And is it not this spirit of Christ that has made the work of our English Friends so effective? In France and Belgium and Holland the name "Society of Friends" has become a passport to the hearts of the people, because those who have gone out to help in the work of relief, reconstruction, and reconciliation have shown themselves to be friends in very truth.

And our task here and now is not different. We, too, are to be friends wherever we may find ourselves, striving to bring together again man and man, class and class, denomination and denomination, race and race, nation and nation. Nor can this great end be accomplished except as individuals are brought back again into unity with God—are reconciled with God. Ultimately, we must love man unto their best. We must seek them with a love that will not let them go; we must trust them even before they have shown themselves worthy of trust. We must take the venture of faith and rely on the great spiritual forces which we have never really tested. A child before he learns to swim dreads the water because, until he trust himself unreservedly to it, he knows nothing of its buoyant power. So we with the spiritual forces.

But what are we going to do about it? If we go away tonight and do not strive to put our thoughts and emotions into action it were better for us to have stayed away. Better not to have seen the vision than having seen it to turn away from it. "The Dead Sea is dead because it has no outlet." We must find channels of expression for our faith. We must strive against the sin of impersonality. We must trust ourselves to the spiritual forces. And as we each one give ourselves to the endeavor to find out what it means for us individually to live out the gospel of love wherever we are called, I believe that we shall not only find our individual paths, but that collectively we may see some great field of service before us.

To-day in our own country hundreds of young men are giving up their vacations to train at Plattsburg to defend the country from an unknown foe. Are we to be less willing to sacrifice than they? May we, too, not give up our vacations, yes, even a year or a decade or a lifetime to spread the gospel of love and brotherhood in the prison camps of Europe, in the schools and hospitals of China and Mexico and Japan? To many such a call may come, but surely all of us are summoned at home or abroad, in business, church and social life to consecrate ourselves afresh to living out in a strength not our own that gospel of love and good-will of which He whose name we bear is the one perfect pattern.

LET ALL WHO HAVE EARS GIVE HEED.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

"If any one is eager to lead others into captivity, he must himself go into captivity. If any one is bent on killing with the sword, he must himself be killed by the sword. Here is an opportunity for endurance, and for the exercise of faith on the part of God's people." (Revelation xiii: 9-10) (Weymouth's N. T.)

In these days of fearful carnage and distorted vision with regard to our Christian duty, it is well to refer to the words of wisdom, especially as no greater opportunity has come to this generation for "endurance" and "the exercise of faith."

One of the saddest results of the world-wide struggle is the weakening of the erstwhile Christians and terrible moral decline of the public mind.

This is notably manifest in England, when such a man as George Adam Smith is reported as saying, in his moderatorial address at Edinburgh quite recently, "that the doctrines of non-resistance or of political peace-at-any-price found no sanction in the Gospels." Contrast this with his own words when the clamor for defense and revenge was not so popular and insistent, "We perceive that the one fact which, amid the mystery and chaos of our inner life gives certainty and light, is a fact which is a Voice. Our nature may be wrecked and dissipated, but conscience is always left; or in ignorance and gloom, but conscience is always audible; or with all the faculties strong and assertive, yet conscience is still unquestionably queen. And conscience is a Voice. It is a still, small voice which is the surest thing in man and the noblest; which makes all the difference to his life, which lies at the back and beginning of all his character and conduct. And the most indispensable and the grandest service which a man can do his fellow-man is to get back to this voice and make himself its mouthpiece and its prophet." (Isaiah, vol. II, Expositor's Bible.)

This is exactly what the conscientious objector to military conscription and practice is trying to do in England to-day, and just what the Christian pacifists in America are asserting as the basis of their protest, not only against the present hysteria for "defensive" armament—which unhappily is so easily used for offensive purposes—but against all militarism. The pity of it all is and the surprise, that men and women who under ordinary world conditions plainly see and wish to represent the spiritual order, lose their nerve or faith when it comes to the test, as in the present awful conflict. Jesus Christ did not do that way, for the nearer He came to the final test the more forgiving He was and the firmer His faith in God.

Jesus set an example for all ages and all possible conditions of human stress, and he who runs can easily read His advice when facing His murderers. The prophetic and martyr spirit generally go hand-in-hand, and George Adam Smith, himself, when his vision was not perverted by the astigmatism of war, said, "However fatal men's treatment of their enemies in war or of their criminals may be, it is, nevertheless, subject to a certain order, code of honor or principle of justice; but in all ages the prophet has been the target for the most licentious spirit and cruelty for torture, indecency and filth past belief. A Book of Battles is horrible enough, but at least valor and honor have kept down in it the baser passions. A Newgate chronicle is ugly enough, but at least there is discipline and a hospital. You have to go to a Book of Martyrs to see to what sourness, malignity, pitilessness and ferocity men's hearts can lend themselves," and yet the writer is backing up the Local Tribunals in England who are committing men with consciences to the barrack detention-rooms—and the same spirit is rampant in our own land.

But while we object to the un-Christian method of the militarist—whatever may be his excuse or "cause"—nothing but a practical suggestion will answer the present need, and it is most gratifying that we have just such suggestions from our Yearly Meeting's Peace Committee in the form of "A Program of Constructive Peace," drafted by one of their committees and alluded to by John B. Garrett in a paper in last week's issue of THE FRIEND.

OUR STAR.

I

Ever up, and afar, is set
The thing for which we strive, and yet
The common wayside path of life
With rare, uncommon flowers is rife,

II

That shed their fragrance sweet, unought;
Swinging their charred censers, fraught
With God's dear blessing, did we know,
And stoop to gather as we go.

III

With eyes upraised, we seek our star
And watch for gleams that shine afar,
Nor see the light in tiny bloom
That brightens all the wayside gloom.

IV

The blossoms round our feet may be God's blessed light, by which we see
The guiding radiance of His Star,
That shines beside us, not afar.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

A PROGRAM OF CONSTRUCTIVE PEACE.

FOREWORD.

Many of our fellow-citizens are urging on us "preparedness" and increased military and naval equipment in order to defend our country by force of arms. At the same time, in the hearts of thousands of other American men and women, there is a growing desire that the United States should seek another and a surer defense. These persons look forward to a defense originating, on our part, in a policy of justice and good-will and resting on the sympathy and friendship of other nations. Broad vision and faith in God and man alone lead nations from the bondage of force to the liberty of service; but faith and vision must be embodied in visible forms. They must be transformed into the terms of a work-a-day world. With the feeling that to peace-makers—not to the peace-dreamers—is the ultimate victory, we put forward these suggestions, few and imperfect as they may be, for a program of constructive peace.

FIRST, ORIENTAL RELATIONS.

Through its possessions and interests in Hawaii, Samoa and the Philippines, the United States is directly concerned with oriental conditions, and our relations with Japan and China, in view of the immigration problem and questions of trade and government, grow constantly more important and more intricate. These questions concern independent peoples whose civilization antedates our own by centuries, and whose ideals, life and practices are foreign to us.

Public opinion should be formed and treaties and conventions made, not through ignorance, caprice, prejudice or selfish interest, but on a basis of accurate knowledge, sound judgment and a desire to safeguard the peace, well-being and development of the Orient.

Such results can be secured only by consulting and acting on the advice of men of good judgment who are specialists in the life, history and institutions of the oriental peoples. Therefore we recommend the creation, by act of Congress, of a Commission on Oriental Relations, to consist of men of recognized ability, whose broad experience and accurate knowledge of oriental conditions, enable them to speak with authority.

The Commission should be appointed by the President and should be amply financed by act of Congress. It should be the duty of the Commission to advise the Department of State and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and House of Representatives on all questions of importance involving oriental countries, and to mold public opinion and foster agencies that tend to promote good understanding, friendship and co-operation between the United States and the Orient.

SECOND, IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION.

The large numbers of immigrants to the United States form vital connections between our country and their native lands. It is of great importance that the immigrants be incorporated into our citizenship in a way that makes them genuine Americans, while still retaining the best racial and national arts they have brought with them.

It is also important that so far as possible causes of friction, misunderstanding and ill-will existing between the United States and foreign countries on account of immigration conditions be speedily removed.

To this end we advocate the appointment by the President of a National Commission on Immigration Laws to study the whole problem and report to the next Congress.

We recommend for careful consideration the "Comprehensive Immigration Policy and Program" of Sidney L. Gulick. This plan provides briefly for (1) a restriction law applicable alike to all countries; (2) a bureau of Registration; (3) a bureau for the education of aliens; (4) the securing of citizenship only by passing educational tests based on ability to speak English and an acquaintance with our history and institutions.

THIRD, HELP TO MEXICO.

The present strained relations between this country and Mexico render it difficult to outline any immediate constructive action. We do, however, believe that the present state of affairs has arisen from the failure to apply the fundamental principle that should govern the relationship of nations.

It should be the constant effort of our government to cooperate with the Mexican people on the basis of service and forbearance. The Mexicans have not had the same advantages of education and democratic government that we have enjoyed, and it is therefore our duty to prepare the way for service by doing all in our power to win their respect and confidence.

If we would appropriate liberal sums for rendering Mexico the help she needs along the line of education, sanitation and medicine the necessity for sending an army to Mexico would never arise. The teacher, the engineer and the physician have it in their power to solve forever the Mexican problem.

FOURTH, ORGANIZATION OF THE WORLD FOR PEACE.

The safety and progress of the world, as of our own country, depend upon the maintenance of peace and established government based upon justice and the safeguarding of the rights of the individual states. To this end the trend of history has been the substitution of law for force, through conciliation and confederation.

We therefore urge that the government of the United States participate in the formation of a League of Nations whose object shall be to make future wars increasingly improbable and finally impossible by the establishment of international courts of justice, and councils of conciliation that shall hear and adjudicate all differences between nations, and the substitution of international pressure, economic and moral, for the present military system, which proves a constant menace to the peace and progress of the world.

We earnestly desire that the government of the United States acting alone, or together with other neutral powers, shall, at the first opportune moment, extend its good offices to the nations at war and exert its influences to restore peace. We recommend that our government vote a generous appropriation to be applied at the conclusion of the war to the recovery of the European peoples, without regard to nationality. To this suggestive program we invite the attention of all men and women of broad vision and faith in their fellow-men. It can be realized by our country only as the people understand it and wish to apply it, and as our Representatives in Congress come to feel that the enactment of laws to secure the peace and happiness of all mankind is the highest service the statesman can render his country. Such a program only is worthy of a Christian nation. It is broad enough to embrace all races, and to include all the religious, social and economic movements of our time. Let us conceive of humanity as a whole and learn to think internationally.—Issued by the Peace Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, 1916.

TAKE IT TO GOD.

Hast thou care within so deep
It chases from thine eyelids sleep?
To thy Redeemer take thy care,
And change anxiety to prayer.

Hast thou a hope with which thy heart
Would almost feel it death to part?
Entreat thy God that hope to crown,
Or give thee strength to lay it down.

Whate'er the care that breaks thy rest,
Whate'er the wish that swells thy breast,
Spread before God that wish, that care,
And change anxiety to prayer.

In contrast with this case, and as an illustration of what a change of environment can do in the breaking up of the drinking habit of a husband, I had an interview some days ago with the relative of one of our dependent families, a thrifty, hard-working, Irish woman, who made up her mind, on account of the drinking habits of her husband, to break up their association, change their environment and to make a new home for herself and her family in this country. I wish I could show you the picture of the thriftiness, cleanliness and the home-like surroundings in that little house in West Philadelphia. Everything within is scrupulously clean, flowers in the windows, a piano in one of the rooms, showed that the effort of this woman had been successful. She told me in the course of her story that her husband in the old country had gotten into the habit of drinking and was steadily step by step going down hill. She made up her mind that the thing to do was to break up the old home and to start out afresh in a new place and in a new country. She talked this over with her husband, who, after much persuasion, consented to the move. She certainly has done her part in the rehabilitation of that home. The husband appreciated the effort and is proud of his wife. The children are clean, well-dressed, healthy and happy. There is no loafing around the street corners for any of those children. When they are through at school, they are employed at some of the tasks which she finds for them to do. In the evening she keeps them around the home with their youthful friends enjoying the fun and frolic innocent and natural to youth.

When sickness has been prolonged, and when the man is unable afterwards to obtain some sort of light work, the dangers from drink are imminent. To avert it, employment fitted for the strength of the person must be found and at once. Unemployment, statistics show, to be one of the most frequent causes of intemperance. This applies to young men as well as to adults. This case is one of many where the need of education for girls of this class in the rudiments at least of domestic science is shown to be necessary, in fact, most essential. A girl turned out into a mill at such a youthful age, with no experience or knowledge of real home life, starts out when married under the greatest of handicaps, the chances are all against her for making her home sufficiently attractive to keep the man who is moderately inclined to drink away from the lure of the saloon.

During these last years that we have known the Kellys, we find that they have drifted away from their church and now they are inclined to consider only the material relief to be obtained from it instead of the spiritual uplift. Frequently such a family may be benefited and inspired through the church visitors or the priest, and then, when the confidences of such people has been won, the father, mother and children receive new interest through the various church activities. The recreational lines are always most helpful. Indeed, recreation is a most important factor in our program for the reform in the family of the drinking man. Jennie is now attending the gymnasium classes of the Young Women's Christian Association. This is building her up physically and she is having many new interests awakened through friends made and the activities around her. She comes home with a new spirit for work, both there and outside, and brings with her some measure of cheer to her mother.

I would place personally very little importance upon the inherited taste for alcohol, although there are a great many families which we deal with superficially which are of the degenerate drinking type. We find grandparents, children and grandchildren following each other in the same worthless strain. The tendency for drink does not seem to be inherited so much as the low vitality and inefficiency of the parents. When the children of such parents are removed from them at an early age and placed with relatives or friends who are able properly to care for and build up the body, strengthen the mentality, and exert healthy home influences, the intemperance inheritance is frequently corrected and avoided. But, when inheritance and environment follow the same strain, there is little hope for the physical, mental and moral development of the child, and unless there is some natural influence to change the environment of the family, or, unless the law steps in to protect the child, we find, without these changes, usually that the degenerate and intemperate qualities of the parents are reproduced and continued.

I have already spoken of the lack of education along domestic lines as a cause of intemperance. In the instance which I have given you it played a most important part in the present condition of the family. The home of the parents is, in my estimation, the proper place to bring up the child. Any education along the lines which will enable the young wife judiciously and economically to spend the wages brought to her weekly, to cook the food and to enable her to see the great importance of keeping her home clean and attractive is education well spent and will, I am sure, abundantly repay the effort.

The lack of education and knowledge of the danger to the physical man through drink is the cause of much intemperance. Could a more complete and thorough education be extended to children in our public schools along these lines by sympathetic teachers who would understand and point out the dangers to these young people of the use of alcohol and the effect produced socially, mentally and morally, and who would be able to appeal to their better natures, much could be accomplished. Through public lectures, the press and the various church organizations, much of the misery and want which are now taxing the efforts of so many social and charitable organizations could be removed.

Unemployment and idleness we find also to be a very common cause of intemperance. The man with outdoor or seasonal work, who, of necessity, is often unemployed, is in danger of falling into this habit much more than the man who has regular work. When unemployment and idleness result from accident or sickness, there is the added temptation to turn to stimulants to overcome the weakness and forget the suffering. Misfortune in business is another cause we have had under observation in several cases recently, where we have not been able to find any evidence of the immoderate use of alcohol until after this occurred. Environment, however, it would seem to me, has more to do with intemperance than any other cause, and I would place it at the very head of the list.

MARGARET PENNOCK.

TRUE UNITY.

Extracts from an Epistle written by John Woolman, 1772.

Feeling at this time a renewed concern that the pure Spirit of light and life and the righteous fruits thereof may spread and prevail among mankind, there is an engagement on my heart to labor with my brethren in religious profession, that none of us be a stumbling-block in the way of others; but that we may so walk that our conduct may reach the pure witness in the hearts of those who are not in profession with us.

How weighty are those instructions of our Redeemer concerning religious duties, when he points out that they who pray should be so obedient to the teachings of the Holy Spirit that humbly confiding in his help they may say, "Thy name, O Father, be hallowed! Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven." In this awful state of mind is felt that worship which stands in doing the will of God on earth as it is done in heaven, and keeping the holy name sacred. To take a holy profession upon us is awful, nor can we keep this holy name sacred, but by humbly abiding under the cross of Christ.

I often feel a labor of spirit, that we who are active members in a religious society may experience in ourselves the truth of those expressions of the holy One: "I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me." In this case my mind hath been often exercised when alone year after year for many years, and in the renewings of Divine love, a tender care hath been incited in me, that we who profess the light of Christ Jesus to be our teacher, may be a family united in that purity of worship, which comprehends a holy life, and ministers instruction to others.

The church is called the body of Christ. (Col. i: 25). Christ is called the Head of the Church (Eph. i: 22). The church is called the pillar and ground of Truth (1 Tim. iii: 15). Thus the church hath a name that is sacred, and the necessity of keeping this name holy appears evident; for when a number of people unite in a profession of being led by the Spirit of Christ, and publish their principles to the world, the acts and proceedings of that people may in some measure be considered as those of which Christ is the author. While we stand in this station, if the pure light of life is not followed and regarded in our proceedings, we are in the way of profaning the holy name, and of going back towards the wilderness of sufferings and persecution, out of which, through the tender mercies of God, a church had been gathered.

"Christ liveth in sanctified vessels," and where they behold his holy name profaned, and the pure Gospel light eclipsed through the unfaithfulness of any who by their station appear to be standard-bearers under the Prince of Peace, the living members in the body of Christ, beholding these things, do in some degree experience the fellowship of His sufferings, and as the wisdom of the world more and more takes place in conducting the affairs of this visible gathered church, and the pure leadings of the holy Spirit are less waited for and followed, so the true suffering seed is more and more oppressed.

A trust is committed to us, a great and weighty trust, to which our diligent attention is necessary. Wherever the active members of this visible gathered church use themselves to that which is contrary to the purity of our principles, it appears to be a breach of this trust and one step back to the wilderness; one step towards undoing what God in infinite love hath done through His faithful servants in a work of several ages, and is like laying the foundation for future sufferings.

I feel a living invitation in my mind to those who are active in our religious Society, that we may lay to heart this matter, and consider the station in which we stand; a place of outward liberty under the free exercise of our consciences toward God, not obtained but through the great and manifold afflictions of those who lived before us. There is gratitude due from us to our heavenly Father, and justice to our posterity. Can our hearts endure or our hands be strong, if we desert a cause so precious, if we turn aside from a work in which so many have patiently labored?

May the deep sufferings of our Saviour be so dear to us that we may never trample under foot the adorable Son of God, or count the blood of the covenant unholy!

Where people are divinely gathered into a holy fellowship, and faithfully abide under the influence of that Spirit which leads into all truth, they are the light of the world.

On reading what follows, taken from THE FRIEND of Seventh Month 20th, I was led to make the foregoing quotations.

When one not a Friend can write: "I sat at the head of an old-fashioned Friends' meeting for five years, so I can never forget the characteristics that gave to their gatherings a remarkable religious power. There was the silent meeting—a living meeting, for the atmosphere was alive with the presence of the Eternal, and God spoke home to human hearts with a still, small voice."

Many Friends' meetings, especially those of the West, now have a pastor. Many of their meetings have lost the dignity, the quietness and the waiting for God to speak, that characterized them formerly; it shows there is a difference between the old and the new method of worship.

Does not this description of the two kinds of meetings bring out clearly the prophetic writings of John Woolman?

I think that it also shows that it is perhaps of greater importance to have the demon of talk cast out than the "demon of silence." I think that it may be truly said that the demon of talk was the prime cause of the separation in the New England Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends in 1845.

At the present time the Society of Friends may be compared to a divided house, concerning which our Saviour said: "Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand." Then what a blessing would come to the Society and to the outside world if all of its members, even now, would heed the good advice of John Woolman, and be brought once more by the Prince of Peace into true and living unity.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

EXTRACTS FROM THE GOLDEN CLEW, OR WHY WE CHILDREN ARE FRIENDS, BY G. CROSFIELD, CHAPTER V—The Lord's Supper.—Winter had given way to spring, and spring to early summer. All had walked home one First-day evening under the light of a lovely sunset, and it was difficult for Kenneth to go indoors to rest. The others sat down in the garden and watched the glow fading in the sky.

"May I not stay a few minutes longer, mother?" he pleaded; "I want to say good night to cousin Edith. I have not seen her all day."

"Where was Edith at breakfast-time?" asked Ralph. "Edith came in late," said Kenneth, "because," and he lowered his voice reverently, "she went to early communion." "And so did I, my dear child," said father, equally solemnly. "Do tell us what thou means, uncle. I know thou did not go with Edith, for I overheard thee saying to Aunt Mary thou was afraid she was drifting into feeling the early services a necessary part of her life. Then what did thou mean?" said Dorothy.

"I mean that, before I came downstairs this morning, I had a blessed time of communion with my loving Saviour; and that later on, when I met my dear friends at meeting, I again realized His presence, when He was in very deed amongst us, though we could not see Him, breaking amongst us the Heavenly Bread, and giving us to drink of the Heavenly Wine; and that in this way my soul has been cleansed, and strengthened, and refreshed. And I trust many others to-day have been helped, too.

"At any hour, in any place, with any of His people, I feel it is my inestimable privilege to hold communion with Him, as He alone shall show me."

Dorothy said, "I understand that, uncle. But is there not something spoken of in the New Testament besides this; some fixed plan that our Lord made, and wanted us to keep up in memory of Him?"

"Yes," said Ralph. "I have never quite seen Friends' views on those words: 'This do in remembrance of Me.'"

"This do in remembrance of Me," repeated his father, but emphasizing the last two words instead of the two first. "What were they doing? What were all the Jews doing on that solemn night when every house was busy and awake? What were they crowded into the city from the ends of Judea to remember that once in all the year?"

"It was the Passover," said Dorothy.

"Yes. They had all gathered together to think over again, and repeat to their children, the story of their great redemption; their escape from Egypt on that awful night when their fate hung in the balance. God's way of saving them must have seemed very strange to the Jews. Just at the moment when the Angel of Death hung over the land, they were in more danger than from Pharaoh's cruelty. All the Israelites would have had death in their homes, but for one thing—one little thing it must have seemed to them—which saved them."

"The blood on the door-posts," said Dorothy.

"Yes. Each home was saved by the blood of the little lamb they had just killed. Now this mystery was about to be made plain; and you must recollect what a mystery it must have always seemed to them. The very next day, as you know, Christ went forth to be the Passover sacrificed for all the world. So the next time, and the next, and as long as the Temple was standing and the feasts kept up, He now tells them, they should not keep it in memory of the escape from Egypt any longer, but in memory of Him, the Lamb of God, whose blood was shed for their redemption, and in memory of the escape from death, an escape which all may know who believe on Him.

"You will see it was not a fresh feast which our Lord was setting. It was a fresh meaning to an old, strange ceremony, which had been showing forth, as in a picture, what our Lord's death was going to do for the world.

"But now that the real Passover had appeared, and the real Lamb was about to be slain, this type lost its use; as it says in Hebrews, these grand new realities made the shadow old: 'Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.' In early spring you see the horse-chestnut buds have a thick, dark envelope, which covers them quite up from the cutting winds. When the days get warmer, this opens, and the beautiful, delicate cluster of tiny, light green leaves pushes through; and later on the blossom spike uncurls. What becomes of the useful red covering that looked so lovely in its time? It has shriveled up and is gone! Its little work is done. So these types wrapped up the living truths which are to endure for all time. 'They themselves fall off and die.'

"How are we ever to understand what the Lord really meant to us do?" said Ralph.

"Indeed, dear Ralph, you may both ask that question! For if we try to find out, by looking through all the decisions and counter-decisions of the Church, it would be hopeless."

"Then what must we do?" asked Dorothy. Her uncle did not immediately reply, and she, glancing at him, went on: "I know what you will say. That after all, we should not look to other Christians at all, but just to the Lord Himself."

"But what does that mean?" said Ralph; "because of course the Apostles and the other Christians did that, and yet they sometimes made mistakes."

"I do not know," said his father, "that we must jump to the conclusion that they were always wrong, because those who came after them differed from them. The needs of the Church changed at each stage, and men had to be gradually trained to do without things which once had seemed necessary to them. Both the Jews and the heathen clung to their old feasts and their old rites; and it took time for them to find out that none of these things could touch the conscience or the soul—that spiritual part of us that can only be helped by spiritual things."

"Then is that the reason," said Dorothy, "that the Corinthians had their feasts, and that Paul explained to them how to hold them?"

"I must say," said Ralph, "that is always a puzzle to me. But I begin to see now that perhaps it was one of those things that was even right for a time, till men saw more clearly what the Lord really meant."

"I believe it was just that," said his father. "In these matters of immense importance to us, it is as thou said just now, Dorothy, and I am glad thou saw it for thyself. We have to look, it may be, a little at what men did, the men who were striving with all their hearts to follow Christ; but a great deal more at what our Lord taught by His deeds and by His words, and at what He further revealed through His apostles. And more than this, we must not be guided alone by one command here and another there, but by the whole spirit and teaching which we can only understand by prayerfully studying all that He said and all that He did. And the more we do this, the more we find that all His teaching and all His deeds lead us up from things that we can see, to the things we cannot see, and we learn that, if we really want to please our Father in heaven, our worship must be in our hearts, a spiritual worship, interfered with in no way by outward symbols and outward ceremonies."

He stopped, for mother, who had been upstairs repeating hymns to Kenneth, his First-day evening treat, now came out to them.

"I think," she said, "it is now too late to stay out any longer; the dew is heavy to-night."

They all rose and turned toward the house. Dorothy lingered a moment to look once more westward. The brilliant glow had faded long since from the sky, though a pale, yellow light showed where the sun had been, and higher up the stars appeared, one by one.

"There are lights which fade and change," she said to herself, "though they are all beautiful in their time; and there are some things which never change, though we cannot always see them. They are always there; they endure forever."

A GARDENING SONG.

Supreme I rule in my domain,
Teaching my subjects the way to go,
Out in the morning, sun or rain,
Hoing and weeding each slender row.
But, dwellers in gray city streets,
How should ye ever know
The joys that Youth and Age both share,
Watching the garden grow?

Flat brown beds 'neath a cloudy sky,
My kingdom looks to your town-bred eyes,
Yet beauty to haunt each passerby
In a few short weeks shall there arise.
But ye who live in towers of brick,
How should ye ever know
The peace of mind that comes with eve,
Watching the garden grow?

Open my gate when May is here,
Pass by the wallflowers in velvet-brown,
Waiting their welcome far and near—
There is no perfume like that in town!
O pent-up folk of stony streets!
Wait not too late to know
All that ye miss each budding year
Watching no garden grow.

CORRESPONDENCE.

OUR dear friend Margaret W. Haines gladly shares the following with us.—[Eds.]

BIRMINGHAM, Eng., Sixth Month 6, 1916.

My Dear Friend:—

Our Yearly Meeting is now over and I must write and tell thee that the loving message to Women Friends from Philadelphia Friends was very warmly received. There is a little mention of it in The Friend. We have valued very much the sympathy of American Friends at this time.

Our young men are having difficult times just now as some do not feel it right to take any alternative service. A young cousin of mine is in Warwick jail with many others. A meeting was held last First-day with them and will be continued, I expect, as also at Lichfield and other places.

We have been spending much time over the subject of Peace, hoping that by prayer and waiting some definite way might open for us to act unitedly in helping the nations. We have been exhorted to reconsecrate our lives to the service of Christ and to our fellow-men, following in the "Spirit of the Quest after God and Truth," and the path will be opened before us.

My husband and I had a very good voyage home and were very thankful to escape any dangers by the way. I feel that we were kept in safety by the prayers of our friends on both shores.

We are having a very cold Sixth Month and the Daylight Saving Bill makes an hour earlier in the morning for breakfast very chilly, but we love the long light evenings. Our garden is looking very green and it is very pleasant to be at home again after a year and two months.

Thy sincere friend,
EDITH M. MORLAND.

READERS OF THE FRIEND of a year or so ago will recall a series of letters from England signed A. K. These were written by a recent Westtown student, known to many hundreds of our readers. In the last of these letters which we were able to secure for publication A. K. alluded to his strong desire to be joined to a relief organization working in Italy. We learned later through another channel that this opportunity was not granted him, but that instead he was sent to Belgium.

A letter from a near relative of A. K. and addressed to this office was received a few days ago and has been such a satisfaction to us that we print it just as written, thinking many besides ourselves will enjoy it.

EDMORS.

Seventh Month 24, 1916.

Dear Friend.—

In answer to thy inquiry about A. K. I am sorry to have very little definite information to give. He writes with constant regularity, numbering each letter so that we know when one has been lost. We receive them from four to seven weeks later—sometimes three or four at a time, but often there are gaps—for instance, one received this morning shows that three have been written between this and the one last received. These may turn up later or they may not. As a whole, they are colorless, in no way alluding to the war or the suffering in Belgium. Indeed, in Brussels, where he has been constantly employed from his first entry into the work, he sees very little evidence of the country being overrun. Such expressions as the following often occur: "We are far too comfortable for war times," "One would never think to walk through the streets of Brussels that a war was going on," "My life is wholly uneventful, like that of an ordinary business man—I go to the office in the morning, visit the stations to which I am assigned, and keep my accounts straight. After hours we play tennis."

"The concierge and his wife spoil me—they seem to want some one to be kind to." (He and his associates I infer are living in the beautiful home of one of the families that has been forced to emigrate.) Or again, "Many social advantages are open to me, but I go out but little, mostly spending my evenings reading or studying." "It is wonderful to be part of such a superb organization—without a single exception the greatest business concern in the whole world." "I have been approached by a member of the Rockefeller Foundation urging me after the war to take up relief work under them as my experience here will be invaluable to me then. They are contemplating very extensive reconstruction agencies all through the east—Poland, Servia, etc.—after the war."

Once or twice he has said: "I don't know how long I can stand the strain of this." We suppose he means the strain caused by the war, which after all must be telling in a very sinister way on the population of Belgium, although he makes no allusion to disturbance of any kind.

In to-day's letter he has grown a little more daring, he says: "We read a good deal about the Mexican situation which indeed seems very grave. It brings things home to us very strongly! I will be most interested to have thy views upon it—I do not think the censor will object to news about that. For me everything seems chaos—when I try to follow out any one line of mental thought I become hopelessly confused. To think for one moment seriously of what this war means, is so absolutely terrible, that one is forced into playing the role of indifference. One does not think of this or that particular nation involved—all are as one."

There is no doubt if the present offensive continues to be successful for the French, British and Belgian armies, if they succeed in driving the Germans back, that Belgium will again be the scene of heart-stirring events. If, on the other hand, Germany is able to hold her own to a certain extent, and continues to prevent the allies from releasing Belgium—the suppressed animosity of the population can hardly be prevented from arising in terrible explosion—evidently this is the strain that must rest upon every one behind the battle line—like the tension felt in nature before the cyclone bursts. No one can foretell what will happen, but evidently every neutral onlooker, who sees the struggle through to the end, will have unutterable experiences to look back upon.

Thy friend,

E. S. K.

NEWS ITEMS.

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE ASSOCIATION FOR PROMOTING COLLEGE EDUCATION OF WOMEN.—A year ago a full report was made of the work of this Association. It is therefore perhaps not necessary to repeat the statistics then presented except to mention that in the fourteen years of the Association's existence thirty-five girls have received scholarships.

For the year 1916-17 four renewals of $200 scholarships and three new Scholarships of $150 each have been applied for. Of the renewals one is a fourth-year Wellesley and three are second-year Cornell, Teachers' College and Oberlin, respectively. Of the new applicants two desire to enter the University of Pennsylvania and a third Bryn Mawr.

It is not in accord with the policy of the Association to encourage girls to board at home while attending college, since it is undoubtedly true that a great part of the benefit of a college education comes from participation in the college life. But unusual circumstances have led us to make exceptions of the three new applicants, as it would require more than the full Scholarship of $200 each to enable them to live at College.

Our subscribers may with reason ask if the T. Wistar Brown Teachers' Fund will not become available for the purposes of this Association.

We hope that this may be the case, but it will depend very largely on the construction of the twenty-one year clause in the Provision of the Trust. The girls who receive our Scholarships cannot wait until they are twenty-one years of age before beginning their professional training. Besides, not all who receive these Scholarships enter the teaching profession.

In whatever way these points may be settled in the future, the Trustees of the Teachers' Fund have already announced that there will be no disposition made of its income until another year. Hence the granting of these Scholarships will depend for this coming year, as heretofore on the generosity of our subscribers.

We doubt if a greater amount of genuine value to individuals and to our Society can be obtained by an equal expenditure in any other way.

THOMAS K. BROWN, President; DR. ANNA P. SHARPLESS, Treasurer, 3926 Chestnut Street, Phila.; SAMUEL L. ALLEN, RACHEL HAINES BACON, JANE W. BARTLETT, DAVIS H. FORSYTHE, JOHN B. GARRETT, ELIZA STOKES NICHOLSON, ANNA WALTON, ASA S. WING, EDWARD M. WISTAR, AGNES L. TIERNEY, Secretary, 118 W. Coulter Street, Germantown.

The number of Christians outside the Society of Friends who share the views of Friends in regard to war has been a noteworthy feature of these present days. Upwards of twenty Wesleyan Methodist ministers, together with a few other members, including two doctors and several ladies, have issued an address to their own people declaring it to be their duty, as disciples of our Lord, to utter their "united protest against the wickedness and futility of war. It is our deep conviction that war, at all times and under all circumstances, is utterly contrary to the teaching, the example, and the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. As His followers, we believe that, if need be, we must be wronged rather than wrong others, and in the last resort, be killed rather than kill. . . ."

"We believe that wars will continue until the Church of God realizes that it is a melancholy apostasy for Christians to engage in the slaughter of men, who are their brethren, and for whom Christ died. If every Christian man refused to bear arms, there would soon be no armies and no wars. We feel it to be unspeakably sad that to-day thousands of English, French and German Methodists are trying to kill each other. We fear that the Christian religion will be greatly prejudiced in the future by the fact that almost every Church in Europe gave its blessing to those who went forth to slay."

We believe that the letter is being sent to all Wesleyan Methodist ministers and to other leaders in that Church.

SOME one recently sent us the following clipping from an English paper. The writer, it appears, had been visiting for the first time among English Friends and says:—

"Altogether, in my crude and misinformed state, I considered the Friends a rather depressing portion of the community, to be avoided by folk with a healthy appetite for pleasure. Staying for awhile in a Midland town I was welcomed in one of the most charming of homes, and entering as a prejudiced outsider, I was made to feel that my presence interfered not at all with the ordered quiet of their thoughts or tranquil pleasures of their life. It was made plain to me that a man who took life seriously, and who held views on war which in time of national conflict met opposition from the military portion of the population, was not necessarily a dour person who believed in black ties and milk-and-water, nor, I found, need he shrink from a romping game with his children, or a holiday party, as savoring of reprehensible frivolity."

The visitor also discovered that the Society of Friends was doing great practical Samaritan work in France; that in the shell-shattered villages of France and Belgium they had built hundreds of wooden huts where the thousands of desolated peasants can live in comparative comfort.

Dr. A. E. Winship recently made a visit to Westtown as the guest of the faculty. He gave an address in the evening to the teachers and others and made an inspection of the school plant. The following is a cutting from a well-known daily:—

Dr. A. E. Winship, one of the best known school men in America, has the following in his magazine, the New England Journal of Education:—"The Quakers are as interesting a people as can be found under the starry flag, and they are especially interesting, educationally. It had been my privilege to know their educational institutions . . . but the most notable of all their academies to me I had not seen, until in March last I was at Westtown School, about thirty miles out of Philadelphia. Here on 600 acres is a preparatory school established 117 years ago (1799), always thrifty and scholarly, in which there has never been a teacher who was not of their Quaker faith, and practice, and with an enrollment above 200 they have never admitted a student who is not of the same strain of Quaker faith. Although the teachers are loyal to the faith of the fathers they have been educated at such colleges as Columbia, Cornell, Wellesley, Earlham, Mt. Holyoke, Haverford, Bryn Mawr, Michigan Agricultural College, Ohio State University and Teachers' College. Of the twenty-five teachers in the Westtown School, twenty-one are graduates of standard colleges and universities.

"Is there any other school in the United States more than a hundred years old of any Protestant faith in which there has never been a teacher or student of other than that faith?"

DESCENDANTS OF WM. PENN.—We have received a most interesting letter from George D. Hoyland, of Vancouver, British Columbia, calling attention to the fact that some lineal descendants of William Penn are now living in the interior of British Columbia. There is enclosed an extract from a letter received by G. D. H. from Hilda Mary Lanyon (nee Hilda Mary Penn). The Lanyons are members of the Church of England, though evidently very much interested in their connection with the founder of Pennsylvania. The extract of the letter is as follows:—
ENGWOOD, B. C., April 5, 1916.

Dear Sir:—

Your letter of the 30th to hand. I was somewhat astonished, as well as pleased, as I had no idea anyone knew of our connection with William Penn, the Quaker. Doubtless it was someone who had heard we had named our youngest son William Penn, and why we did so.

I am afraid I have nothing of any real interest to tell you about ourselves, except that I remember that my father, though not a Quaker, was very proud of his connection, and bore the name of William Penn himself. My grandfather was for some years a Congregational minister in the South of England, but every year he received a special invitation to attend the Memorial Service (or something like that), held by the Friends at Penn's birthplace—as they all acknowledged his direct descent from the well-known Quaker. My grandfather's name was Thomas Fortin Penn, but I believe in all the families back there has always been one named William Penn.

My own father, who was a great student, died a few years ago, and now I have a brother by the name of William Penn living in New York. As neither of my two brothers has any family, we have called our youngest boy William Penn in order to keep up the name. Our little Penn will be two years old, next June 24th. We call him "Penn," preferring it to William. It is our great hope that he may copy the noble example of his forefather.

ONE of the stock arguments advanced by the advocates of capital punishment is that lynchings follow what they choose to call the lowering of the standard, the following by Alice Stone Blackwell in the Woman's Journal was of course written in the interests of woman suffrage; they are facts that must be reckoned with.

There were 69 lynchings in the United States last year. This was an increase of 33 per cent. over the year before. Every one of these 69 lynchings took place in a State where women cannot vote.

Of the 69 persons thus murdered, only 11 were charged with rape.

Three of those who were lynched were women. One man was charged with stealing meat, one with stealing cotton, one with stealing a cow, two with stealing hogs, three with poisoning mules. A family of four—father, son and two daughters—were put to death for "clubbing an officer of the law." Others were charged with burglary, one with wife-beating, one with being accessory to burning a barn. Seventeen were charged with murder. Four at least of the persons lynched were afterwards proved innocent. Eighteen of the lynchings, or more than a quarter of the whole number, took place in the single State of Georgia, where women have not even the school vote. Yet some people still tell us that woman's suffrage will result in lawlessness!

If all of last year's lynchings had happened in suffrage States instead of in non-suffrage States, that conclusion would certainly have been drawn. As the shoe is on the other foot, the opponents of equal rights will probably refuse to see any significance in the fact.

FRANCIS NEILSON, a member of the British Parliament, on a lecturing tour in the United States, has repeatedly declared that "in ten years Great Britain spent $5,000,000,000 for that sort of insurance (armament that is security), and yet we had not settled with the company, for if this war lasts through the summer we will have paid about $12,500,000,000." He blames armament firms in large measure for stirring up international hatred in order to boom army and navy appropriations. Answering questions about what would happen if one nation disarmed, he declared his conviction that the others would follow. The growth of the spirit of internationalism is greater now among the men in the trenches than ever before in the history of Europe, he asserted, and they are hoping for the time when the barriers of Europe will be broken down and it shall become another United States.

SOME MORE FACTS ABOUT PREPAREDNESS.—General Nelson A. Miles has told the House Committee on Military Affairs that he is utterly opposed to conscription and to a continental army. He is convinced that our coast defenses are equal to any in the world, and that the present war has demonstrated the inability of battleships to overcome land fortifications. He added that an army of 140,000 men on a peace basis is sufficient, and that in case of necessity we could develop the army to more than a million men out of the material already at hand. Rear Admiral Victor Blue, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, considers the present American navy fit to meet any possible enemy. Admiral George Dewey said a year ago:

"Our ships and guns are as good as any in the world; our officers are as good as any; and our enlisted men are superior in training, education, physical development, and devotion to duty, to those of any other navy. . . . I can say with absolute confidence that the efficiency of the fleet has steadily progressed and has never been so high as it is to-day."

Within a year our Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, has pointed out that there are now in active service, fully commissioned, 225 vessels of all characters, which is 36 more than were fully commissioned when he became Secretary. There are 101 vessels of various types in reserve capable of rendering service in war. We have under construction and authorized 77 vessels, 9 of which are dreadnaughts, 23 destroyers, 38 submarines, and 7 auxiliaries, as compared with 54 vessels under construction two years ago. Secretary Daniels is careful also to say that all these vessels are fully supplied with munitions of war. The number of mines on hand and in process of manufacture has been increased during the year by 244 per cent., and torpedoes during two years 90 per cent. By the enlargement of the naval-power factory the Government will soon be able to double its former capacity. The navy is to-day recruited to the maximum strength allowed. "There exists to-day no more efficient institution than the United States Navy." Stated in dollars, the Wilson administration in its first two years authorized $70,000,000 to be spent on the chief fighting force of the navy, as against $26,000,000 authorized during the last two years of the Taft administration. "Stated in numbers, it authorized five dreadnaughts instead of two; and stated in effectiveness, the five dreadnaughts authorized under Wilson will mount 36 more 14-inch guns than the two authorized under Taft." . . . "The Bureau of Ordnance has developed a 14-inch gun that will shoot farther, shoot straighter, and hit harder than any gun now in use or known to be designed by a foreign country." Secretary Daniels says flatly that the navy of 1916 is larger and better equipped and in better condition than in any previous year.

In the light of these facts there ought to be no room for hysteria in the council chambers of the nation. Furthermore, there should be no room for the Augustus P. Gardner school of statesmen. Admiral Fletcher, contradicting the statements of Gardner, says that the scores recently recorded by our gunners at sea are higher than any made before in the open sea. People who know are authority for the statement that the scores also show an increase in rapidity of fire as well as accuracy.

Politicians and other misguided pyromaniacs insist, however, upon playing with the fire. The rising wave of fear is advancing still. Ignoring our real defenses at home, and that the vast European enemies will for many years protect this nation from attack, the artful game of party chicanery goes on. The situation in America is too complex and too near to each of us for analysis and explanation. Why we are asked to arm, beyond the dreams of militarists heretofore, against a crippled and disintegrating Europe, more than we have thought of arming when the European States were at the height of their military power, we cannot say. The crime against America, against Europe, against the world, is the apparent inability of our leaders to conceive of any way of attaining unto their ends other than by war.

The above statement of facts is to be relied on. Readers of THE FRIEND can have no sympathy with the feeling that underlies the foregoing, but it is well for all of us to know the truth and to be in a position to correct false statements that are every day passed current as facts.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—As a result of a series of meetings of the newspaper publishers of Philadelphia, called to consider the serious situation confronting them, caused by what are practically famine conditions in the news print paper market, the following agreement was unanimously reached: All daily, evening and Sunday newspapers will immediately reduce the size of their issues to the extent of a total in excess of 80 pages weekly.

The following introduces a considerable article in the Public Ledger:—Temperance pays. At least it does so far as the 300 employes of the Philadelphia Quartz Company are concerned. With them, however, the reward for total abstinence is not merely of a moral nature, but one far more tangible—a matter of dollars and cents. More than two years ago the officials of this company, the offices of which are located at 121 S. Third Street, hit upon a novel method to promote temperance among their men. If temperance can be made a paying proposition, they concluded, the men will not be slow to recognize its value. Therefore, it was decided to make a 10 per cent. increase in the wages of those employes who would agree to sign a pledge.

GENERAL.—New forces were added to the campaign against the epidemic of infantile paralysis at New York when two committees composed of prominent pathologists and bacteriologists from all over the country were selected to study the disease in all its ramifications.

Heavy floods in West Virginia on the 10th cost more than twosome lives and millions of dollars' worth of property.

After many years of investigation and debate to develop the best method of providing financial aid for the farmer at normal interest rates and on long time, Congress has passed a farm loan act. President Wilson has named members of the board which will administer its provisions, and the work of organizing the vast new system is about to begin. Secretary McAdoo, ex-officio member of the farm loan board, which will be at the head of the system, predicts that it cannot be in operation for at least six months and probably loans cannot be made before next spring.

It is estimated that adverse conditions, due to weather, plant disease and insects damaged the country's principal farm crops during last month and resulted in a loss of 105,000,000 bushels in prospective wheat production, 89,000,000 in corn and 43,000,000 bushels less of oats than predicted by the Department of Agriculture in Washington at the beginning of the month.

The experiment of Government insurance on vessels has proved notably successful. Risks have been accepted on noncontraband cargoes and ships valued at $138,392,389, on which a net profit of more than $2,000,000 has been earned and this sum will be turned back into the United States treasury.

A study of the school system inaugurated at Gary, Ind., is being carried on by the general education board for the purpose of making available all over the country an authoritative account of this much-talked-of experiment. The board's staff have already devoted five months to a first-hand study of the purposes, methods and costs of the system at Gary and the results actually achieved there. The work was undertaken at the invitation of the school board of Gary, and the results will be embodied in a comprehensive volume to be issued by the board. Abraham Flexner of the general education board is directing the study.

The disparity between the exports of the United States to South America, and the imports of the United States from there, is being studied with particular attention by New York bankers at this time, and means are being discussed for remedying that disparity.

The Lincoln Highway Association reports that $4,000,000 has already been spent, with State co-operation, on this great thoroughfare between New York and San Francisco, and that $20,000,000 more will be necessary to complete it. It comes nearly 70 years after the first transcontinental railroad, following the gold discoveries in California. Already, it is estimated, automobiles can go from coast to coast in from 25 to 30 days as compared with 60 or more before the Lincoln Highway was begun.

A great decrease in native Hawaiians is noted in the following: "When Kamehameha I. was on the throne of Hawaii there were upward of 300,000 native Hawaiians in the islands that compose the Hawaiian group; to-day there are not more than 26,000 native pure bloods," said Judge T. B. Stuart, who is on the bench in Hawaii.

Some of the biggest shifts in the personnel of the Government of the Philippines in recent years are now occurring through resignations or retirements, opening a number of executive positions to native Filipinos, in accordance with the policy of the present Administration.

OUR WALLED GARDEN.

Gardens and gardening have become more and more an interest of late years. Garden books and magazines abound; gardening clubs draw communities together in a common interest.

And there is a return to the walled gardens, of which, in our childhood, we only read in our English story-books, or "Original Poems."

On some large estates the whole location of the garden is changed, and an expensive wall built to shelter the plants and shrubbery, even when the grounds have long been laid out on another plan. Old brick or stone is used, if such can be found, to give a touch of dignified antiquity.

In 1797 was laid out with care and pains, and a wise foresight, the "walled garden" of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting—Westtown Boarding School. And though (as would be expected) some plants have not thriven there, yet, taking the years through, much fair fruit has ripened, and many a young plant, a bit backward, or crooked, has grown straight and tall therein.

May we not reverently say that the beams of "the Sun of Righteousness" have warmed and invigorated this enclosed garden, and gratefully recall the faithful men and women, who might be likened to trees planted by the rivers of water, which have been rooted near and overshadowed it.

Yet now, just as in the art of gardening, there is a return to the idea of shelter as helpful to growth, we discover some disposition to remove, or at least to lower, the "walls" that encompass our Westtown garden! Indeed, it may be that slowly a change of one stone after another is really going on, though hardly recognized; and the good old phrase "a guarded education" seems to be losing its savor.

"There is no other place like Westtown!" said an old scholar returning for the first time, after a wide experience of the world—"Unless it is some of the old English schools! I wonder if you could have the Westtown atmosphere without all the restraints?" This is a pertinent question and deserves a wider consideration.

Reading thus far, some one may say, "But there are so many people interested in Westtown!—the Faculty, the Westtown Committee, the Alumni and Old Scholars' Associations, the Mothers in Council. What further need is there?" To which we might answer, "Our garden is large, and each year there is a greater variety in the planting. It is quite possible for those actively at work in it, each busy with some particular detail, not to get the general effect, as one does coming in from outside."

The wise and active interest of parents can do much for Westtown, and in this connection, part of a letter recently found in a quaint old family "Letter Case" may be quoted.

It is dated "Brandywine Mills, Third Month 29, 1814," and is written to one "Mary C———" at "Weston." After speaking of his desire that his "dear child" might find her time at the School to be "a time of improvement in the best sense of the word," her father adds, "I love the Friends who have the Superintendence, and it is the duty of all placed there (and I hope thou will manifest it) to alleviate their many cares for the welfare of those placed in their care. They feel it very important, as those who have to give an account." Smile at the old-time language if we will, the sentiment is as good now as then, and each one of us can do his part to help "alleviate the cares" of the laborers in our garden, if we will foster in our children a spirit of regard for them and for the dignity of their work.

If Westtown is to be just like any other good school of its class, we need to notice some tendencies of our educational system, which are not altogether satisfactory to parents.

The present tendency toward military training in the public schools comes at once to mind, and the very passive attitude of the National Educational Association recently assembled in New York City. Remembering the resolution passed by this body the year before, against military training, one can but take it as a symptom of strong tendencies toward military training, which is already a law in one State.

A recent magazine gives the views of "A Russian Jew on the American High School," in which the critic points out "the gross neglect of moral training" (as compared to the efficient physical training), and then, after enumerating other "needs," he adds: "First and foremost it (the High School) needs another soul, another spirit, not one that points to money-making, as to the occupation of the ideal citizen." *

Some of our private schools have this same tendency toward the exalting of wealth and luxury, others show as favorable an attitude toward the sheltering "walls," and are as careful to maintain them, though with somewhat different reasons, as we are ourselves.

The question, however, is not "Shall Westtown be just as good a preparatory school as we can make it, with as much simplicity and restraint as the best educators feel is wholesome for young people?" But rather—"Shall Westtown be first and foremost a school of Quakerism, in the sense that there shall be presented to the student body the foundation truths of our religious Society, as a guide for daily living, by men and women who are themselves thoroughly convinced of them, and all that makes a good school added?"

If the latter question is to have an affirmative answer, what is our part—each one of us—in strengthening the walls?

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCES OF ISAAC PENINGTON.

A true and faithful relation, in brief, concerning myself, in reference to my spiritual travails, and the Lord's dealings with me. I say true and faithful, because it is of the Truth, and not given forth in my own will, but in the Lord's will and requireing of me at this time, for His service.

I have been a man of sorrow and affliction from my childhood, feeling the want of the Lord, and mourning after Him, almost ever since I could remember.

In the sense of my lost estate, I sought after the Lord; I read the Scriptures; I watched over mine own heart; I cried unto the Lord for what I felt the want of; I blessed His name in what He mercifully did for me, and bestowed on me, etc. Whatever I read in the Scriptures as the way of God to my understanding, I gave myself to the faithful practice of; being contented to meet with all the reproach, opposition, and several kinds of sufferings which it pleased the Lord to measure out to me therein. And I cannot but say that the Lord was good unto me, did visit me, did teach me, did help me, did testify His acceptance of me many times, to the refreshing and joy of my heart before Him.

But my soul was not satisfied with what I met with, nor indeed could be, there being further quickenings and pressings in my spirit, after a more full, certain and satisfactory knowledge; even after the sense, sight and enjoyment of God, as was testified in the Scriptures to have been felt and enjoyed in the former times; for I saw plainly that there was a stop of the streams, and a great falling short of the power, life and glory which they partook of. We had not so the Spirit, nor were so in the faith, nor did so walk and live in God as they did. They were come to Mount Zion, and the Heavenly Jerusalem, etc., which we had hardly so much as the literal knowledge or apprehension what they were. So that I saw the whole course of religion among us was for the most part but a talk, to what they felt, enjoyed, possessed and lived in.

This sense made me sick at heart indeed, and set me upon deep crying to God, close searching of the Scriptures, and waiting on God, that I might receive the pure sense and understanding of them, from and in the light, and by the help of His Spirit. And what the Lord did bestow on me in that state, with thankfulness I remember before Him at this very day: for He was then my God, and a pitier and a watcher over me; though He had not pleased then to direct me how to stay my mind upon Him. And then I was led (indeed I was led, I did not run of myself) into a way of separation from the worship of the world into a gathered society, for this both the Scripture and the Spirit of God in me gave testimony unto; and what I then met with, and what leadings and help we then felt, there is a remembrance and testimony in my heart to this day. But there was something wanting, and we mistook our way, for whereas we should have pressed forward into the spirit and power, we ran too much outward into the letter and form, and though the Lord in many things helped us, yet therein He was against us, and brought darkness, confusion and scattering upon us. I was sorely broken and darkened, and in this darkened state sometimes lay still for a long season, secretly mourning and crying out to the Lord night and day. Sometimes I ran about, harkening after what might appear or break forth in others; but never met with anything whereto there was the least answer in my heart, save in one people, who had a touch of truth; but I never expressed so much to any of them, nor indeed felt them at all able to reach my condition.

At last after all my distresses, wanderings and sore travails, I met with some of the writings of this people called Quakers, which I cast a slight eye upon and disdained, as falling very short of that wisdom, light, life and power which I had been longing for and searching after. I had likewise some pretty distance of time after this, opportunity of meeting with some of them; and divers of them were by the Lord moved (I know it to be so since) to come to me. As I remember, at the very first they reached to the life of God in me, which life answered their voice, and caused a great love in me to spring to them, but still in my reasonings with them and disputes alone (in my mind) concerning them, I was very far off from owning them, as so knowing the Lord, or so appearing in His life and power as my condition needed, and as my soul waited for.

Yea, the more I conversed with them, the more I seemed in my understanding and reason to get over them, and to trample them under my feet, as a poor, weak, silly, contemptible generation, who had some smatterings of truth in them, and some honest desires towards God; but very far off from the clear and full understanding of His way and will. And this was the effect almost of every discourse with them; they still reached my heart, and I felt them in the secrets of my soul, which caused the love in me always to continue, yea, sometimes to increase towards them: but daily my understanding got more and more over them, and therein I daily more and more despised them.

After a long time I was invited to hear one of them (as I had been often, they in tender love pitying me and feeling my want of that which they possessed); and there was an answer in my heart, and I went with fear and trembling, with desires to the Most High, who was over all, and knew all, that I might not receive anything for truth which was not of Him, nor withstand anything which was of Him; but might bow before the appearance of the Lord, my God, and none other. And indeed when I came, I felt the presence and power of the Most High among them, and words of truth from the spirit of truth reaching to my heart and conscience, opening my state as in the presence of the Lord. Yea, I did not only feel words and demonstrations from without, but I felt the dead quickened, the seed raised; inasmuch that my heart (in the certainty of light and clearness of true sense) said, this is He, this is He, there is no other: this is He whom I have waited for and sought after from my childhood; who was always near me, and had often begotten life in my heart; but I knew Him not distinctly, nor how to receive Him, or dwell with Him. And then in this sense (in the melting and breakings of my spirit) was I given up to the Lord, to become His, both in waiting for the further revealing of His seed in me, and to serve Him in the life and power of His seed.

Now what I met with after this, in my travails, in my waitings, in my spiritual exercises, is not to be uttered: only in general I may say this, I met with the very strength of hell. The cruel oppressor roared upon me, and made me feel the bitterness of his captivity, while he had any power; yea, the Lord was far from my help, and from the voice of my roaring. I also met with deep subtleties and devices to entangle me in that wisdom which seemeth able to make wise in the things of God, but is indeed foolishness, and a snare to the soul, bringing it back into captivity, where the enemy's guns prevail. And what I met with outwardly from my own dear father, from my kindred, from my servants, from the people and powers of the world, for no other cause but fearing my God, worshipping Him as He hath required of me, and bowing to His seed, which is His Son, who is to be worshipped by men and angels for evermore, the Lord my God knoweth, before whom my heart and ways are; who preserved me in love to them, in the midst of all I suffered from them, and doth still so preserve me; blessed be His pure and holy name.

But some may desire to know what I have at last met with? I answer, I have met with the Seed. Understand that word, and thou wilt be satisfied and inquire no farther. I have met with my God; I have met with my Saviour; and He hath not been present with me without His salvation; but I have felt the healings drop upon my soul from under His wings. I have met with the true knowledge, the knowledge which is life; and this hath had the true virtue in it, which my soul hath rejoiced in, in the presence of the Lord. I have met with the Seed's Father, and in the Seed I have felt Him, my Father. There I have read His nature, His love, His compassions, His tenderness, which have melted, overcome, and changed my heart before Him. I have met with the Seed's faith, which hath done and doth that which the faith of man can never do. I have met with the true birth, with the birth which is heir of the kingdom, and inherits the kingdom. I have met with the true spirit of prayer and supplication, wherein the Lord is prevailed with, and which draws from Him whatever the condition needs; the soul always looking up to Him in the will, and in the time and way which is acceptable with Him.

What shall I say? I have met with the true peace, the true righteousness, the true holiness, the true rest to the soul, the everlasting habitation, which the redeemed dwell in: and I know all these to be true, in Him that is true, and am capable of no doubt, dispute, or reasoning in my mind about them; it abiding there, where it hath received the full assurance and satisfaction. And also I know very well and distinctly in spirit where the doubts and disputes are, and where the certainty and full assurance is, and in the tender mercy of the Lord am preserved out of the one and in the other.

Now, the Lord knows, these things I do not utter in a boasting way; but would rather be speaking of my nothingness, my emptiness, my weakness, my manifold infirmities, which I feel more than ever. The Lord hath broken the man's part in me, and I am a worm, and no man before Him. I have no strength to do any good or service for Him: nay, I cannot watch over or preserve myself. I feel daily that I keep not alive my own soul; but am weaker before men, yea, weaker in my spirit, as in myself, than ever I have been. But I cannot but utter to the praise of my God, and I feel His arm stretched out for me; and my weakness, which I feel in myself, is not my loss, but advantage before Him. And these things I write, as having no end at all therein of my own, but felt it this morning required of me; and so in submission and subjection to my God have I given up to do it, leaving the success and service of it with Him.

SAMUEL FOTHERGILL, PART OF A SERMON PREACHED IN LONDON.

"I cannot think that a people whom the Lord has raised by His own invincible power and so signally placed His Name amongst ever designed to be only the transient glory of a couple of centuries. I am still revived by a secret hope of better times, when our Zion shall again put on her beautiful garments, and in her and with her shall arise judges as at the first and counsellors and law-givers as at the beginning. The gracious ear of our heavenly Father is still open to the supplications of His children, and I believe He will yet be jealous over His land and pity His people. The time approaches when the great dasher in pieces will more and more come up amongst us, and may all who are broken by Him wait to be healed by the arising of His love. I live in the faith, and I believe I shall die in the faith that the Lord of Hosts will yet beautify the place of His feet, that our Zion will yet become an eternal excellency, and Jerusalem the praise of the whole earth. The bowels of adorable compassion yet yearn over His children with all the tenderness of a father's love. 'How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim? How shall I make thee as Admah, and set thee as Zeboim? How shall I cut thee off from being a people before Me?' By this moving and pathetic language would the great Father of the universe induce us to return to the arms of everlasting mercy."

THE CONQUERORS.

I saw the Conquerors riding by
With trampling feet of horse and men:
Empire and empire like the tide
Flooded the world and ebbed again;

A thousand banners caught the sun,
And cities smoked along the plain,
And laden down with silk and gold
And heaped-up pillage groaned the wain.

I saw the Conquerors riding by Splashing through loathsome floods of war—
The Crescent leaning o'er its hosts,
And the barbaric semitar,—

And continents of moving spears,
And storms of arrows in the sky,
And all the instruments sought out
By cunning men that men may die!

I saw the Conquerors riding by
With cruel lips and faces wan;
Musing on kingdoms sacked and burned
There rode the Mongol Ghengis Khan;

And Alexander, like a god,
Who sought to weld the world in one;
And Cæsar with his laurel wreath;
And like a thing from Hell the Hun;

And, leading like a star the van,
Heedless of upstretched arm and groin
Inscrutable Napoleon went Dreaming of empire, and alone. . . .

Then all they perished from the earth
As fleeting shadows from a glass,
And, conquering down the centuries,
Came Christ, the Swordless, on an ass!
—HARRY KEMP, in the Springfield Republican.

PROGRESS—SURSUM CORDA.

[One of our regular readers suggests that we print the following articles from Friends' Fellowship Papers for Fifth Month. They disclose better than any words of ours could what is in the depth of the hearts of our English Friends, Elizabeth Fox Howard and William Littleboy are not strangers on our side of the Atlantic.—Eds.]

PROGRESS.

Sitting on the shore one calm evening I was watching the tide come in. It was so still that there was hardly a ripple on the sea, and the tiny waves broke almost imperceptibly. There was a heavy mass of brown oar-weed lying all along the beach, and I watched the absurd little wavelets pushing against it with apparently no effect whatever. They were too small and weak to wash right over it. A few minutes later I glanced again at the line of sea-weed and I found it had moved a foot or two up the beach. Half an hour later those seemingly ineffectual waves by their ceaseless, small steady push had carried the oar-weed up to high water mark. The pools were full, the rocks were covered. Behind those small and feeble ripples there had been the whole resistless oncoming of the ocean itself.

Those of us who have had the good fortune to be in the country these spring days have watched, too, how the little tender green things are pushing their way up through pounds weight of soil—"obne Rast, obne Rast,"—just by virtue of the strange mysterious thing in them we call life. The heavy lifeless earth cannot withstand the shoots of the crocus, the delicate shafts of the daffodil—the power that is in them is irresistible, and before we realize it the spring is here.

I believe that it is given to all of us who believe that love is the greatest force in the world to go on at this difficult time just patiently and unrestingly showing something of the sheer strength of gentleness and persistence in well doing. The opposition seems tremendous. If we look at it in the mass it may well daunt us altogether. But the steady upward push of that which has within it the Divine quality of life is infinitely stronger than the dead weight of materialism or the fierce pull-back of hatred.

Even that which seems most to oppose all we hold dear may itself give openings for showing forth truth and goodness. In our bravest dreams of a Peace propaganda throughout the length and breadth of the land, did we ever imagine such opportunities as the Tribunals have been giving us? Peace meetings in ordinary times attract few except sympathizers. Before the Tribunals hundreds of men have had the chance of testifying before those who never in their lives perhaps had had even a glimpse of what the Christian position as to war really involves.

The testimony may often have been given crudely and haltingly, and we know that more often than not it has been met with ridicule and opposition. We must remember that a totally new and little understood point of view cannot be expected to meet with popular approval. But seed-thoughts have been sown. Everywhere men are thinking and talking to-day as never before about the strange fact that thousands of young men are willing to face obloquy, loss of employment, social ostracism and worse for the sake of an ideal, that there is a patriotism of the Kingdom of Christ which is stronger even than the call to take up arms for England. Friends and those who think with them are going through a time of intense difficulty. Criticism and pitfalls beset us on all sides. It may be that just now our words had better be few, so long as our acts speak loud. But ever there must be the quiet, persistent never-ceasing push of conviction, of a love that precludes irritation and anger against those from whom we differ, of that untiring faith which can remove mountains, of a hope which nothing can daunt or make ashamed.

SURSUM CORDA.

The Society of Friends is face to face with a religious crisis of the first magnitude. If any one had ventured two years ago to predict that, in this year of our Lord, 1916, Friends would be suffering imprisonment and perhaps something worse for conscience' sake, it is safe to say that such a prediction would not have been taken seriously. We had enjoyed for so long the privileges won for us at such cost by those who went before us, we were on the whole so comfortable, and perhaps also so well satisfied with ourselves, that to believe that some of our number might be called to bear their witness at the cost of liberty if not of life itself would have seemed like the dream of madness. Yet this is the position with which we are actually faced. Events move and circumstances change so quickly that, writing early in this month, one cannot forecast with any degree of certainty what may be the conditions a month hence when these lines are read. But at the moment it appears as if we are to be involved in a conflict with the spirit of evil the same in kind as that which was waged with such splendid heroism by our forefathers in the seventeenth century.

Let us look at the possibilities which lie before us; let us take them at their worst, recognizing as we do so that even at the last moment some way may be found by the Government for averting the disgrace of a religious persecution. Let us remember, too, that there are many men outside our own membership who are very near to us in faith and sympathy, some of whom are already in prison.

It is needless to enlarge here upon the doings of the Tribunals. With some exceptions they have shown themselves so uncomprehending, so ruthless, so careless of the declared intentions of the Military Service Act as regards conscientious objectors, that we are sometimes reminded of that classic portrayal of contemporary judicial procedure in the trial of Faithful in Vanity Fair! Tardily and with hesitation the Government has endeavored to provide some palliation in the cases which have not yet been dealt with; but even these mild measures are (in some cases at least) being flouted by the Tribunals. The result of it all is that a great number of young men, including some Friends, are even now awaiting arrest, thereafter to be handed over to the military authorities as "deserters." As to this last, we will not try to penetrate the veil that hides barrack and camp life from the public eye. We know that "Prussianism" is essentially the same, whether at Zabern or in England. We know, too, that military men are boasting that they will quickly find ways and means of bringing conscientious objectors to reason when once they have them in their power.

What then shall we say to these things? Shall we sit in sackcloth and bemoan our hard lot? Shall we sigh for the old times of quiet when life was easy and to be a Friend was a guarantee of respectability? Shall we not rather try to show the spirit of those young men from Galilee who, after their first public flogging, were filled with a great joy that they had come into their own at last, that they were "counted worthy to suffer dishonor?" Let us be filled with a solemn, wondering thankfulness that God has conferred upon us the privilege of standing firmly for the Truth,

"when we share her wretched crust,

'Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just."

For there is manifold cause for rejoicing; not least that this crisis, coming upon us so unexpectedly, has yet found so many, both within and without our Society, resolute to "take their part in suffering hardship as good soldiers of Jesus Christ." After our long period of ease it would not have been surprising had it been otherwise; and seeing so wide a response to the Divine call for volunteers to tread the way of the Cross, we thank God and take courage.

But perhaps our main cause for joy and confidence has its spring in the conviction that God is setting before us a widely opened door, and that it is to be our extraordinary privilege to make full use of it. There must have been many, who, amidst the easy conditions of the past and the high estimation accorded to Friends by the world around, have been conscious of a haunting misgiving, as they remembered the woe pronounced upon those of whom all speak well. After this rather stifling air, a breath of unpopularity is as a sea-breeze on a summer's day. There are, it is true, some who shrink from it. They would have us think of our "influence;" they remind us that our reputation is a gift which we are not to imperil by taking up an extreme anti-militarist position. To this plausible plea, spoken we are sure in all good faith, we reply that our reputation is in better hands than our own, and that the voice of the Master says, "What is that to thee? follow thou Me." As soon as we begin to nurse our influence, its vitality and power depart. "He that loseth his life (or his reputation) for My sake, the same shall save it." All history testifies that Christianity has made its most notable conquests when it has been unpopular, derided, persecuted. In the fourth century when the conditions were reversed, and it became "the thing" to be a Christian, the religion of Jesus received a wound from which it has not even yet recovered. The eighteenth century was a period in the history of Quakerism when our Society was losing its spiritual power in proportion as it gained in "respectability." Now once again we have our opportunity, and we rejoice in the certainty that faithfulness in our hour of trial will bring us an abundant reward in the shape of new inspiration and added power to do the work with which we have been entrusted.

In the earliest days of the Church of Christ, two great experiences accounted above all else for the overflowing joy and spiritual exhilaration which possessed the discipleship. One of these was what is known as the "Communion of Saints;" the new and wonderful consciousness of the spiritual bond which unites all who are "in Christ Jesus," whether they are living in the seen or in the unseen. The other was the bracing, inspiring fact that they were "counted worthy to suffer" for Him they loved. Both of these experiences are with us now, and even if for the moment we are in heaviness through manifold perplexities, yet in the knowledge of these things, we too "greatly rejoice." This emergency has drawn many of us together in a union of sympathy and understanding such as we never knew in easy times. Multitudes of us who are engaged in this conflict, multitudes of happy spirits in the unseen life who are cheering us on and upholding our hands, have become one in heart and purpose in a union the blessing of which will remain with us always. And some of us too are being "counted worthy"—the greatest privilege of all. We will not dream of condoling with those who have been, or may be, called to suffer in mind, body or estate; rather we will rejoice with humble gladness that to them it has been granted not only to believe in Christ but also to suffer in His behalf. And if the worst comes to the best—, we trust that they may enter into the experience of William Dewsbury, who spent so many years in gaol for the cause of Truth, and of whom it was said that "he never played the coward, but joyfully entered prisons as palaces, and did esteem the locks and bolts as jewels."

WAR, RIGHT OR WRONG.

BY MEI TI (CHINA, ABOUT 2500 B. C.).

Translated by E. H. Hou.

In the fifth and sixth centuries B. C. there were many philosophers and schools in China. Mei Ti was one of the greatest of them. At that time even Confucius could not overshadow him. His well-known "Love All" doctrine was later severely attacked by Mencius, the great follower of Confucius. Not only his philosophy, but also his literary ability, have been greatly admired by his own people. The following is a translation of one of his short essays. By this use of the title "gentlemen under the heaven," he means the philosophers of his time.—Translator.

Here is a man going into the garden or orchard of some one else. He steals the peaches and prunes from it. All those who hear of this will condemn him, and the authorities will arrest and fine him. Why? Because he does harm to others and benefits himself thereby.

Here is another man stealing other people's dogs, chickens, and hogs. He is worse than the first man. Why? Because the more harm to others he does, the more wicked he is and the greater the crime is.

Here is a third who enters through his neighbor's fences and stables, stealing the cattle and horses. He is considered worse and more heartless than the second man. Why? Because he has done more harm to his neighbor, so his crime is still greater.

Furthermore, the man who murders the innocent neighbor and gets his victim's fur coat and sword, is worse than the third. Why? Because he has done greater harm, and so he is a more wicked man.

At this time, all the gentlemen under the heaven know that he is doing wrong, and they all condemn him.

Now, then, the greatest of these gentlemen is to attack a neighboring country. Not only does nobody see that this should be condemned, but, on the contrary, every one praises it, sanctions it, and calls it right. Does the world know the difference between right and wrong?

It is considered wrong to murder one man, and there is capital punishment for this crime. Then the crime of killing ten men is ten times as bad as that of killing one, and the punishment should be also ten times as much. The crime of murdering one hundred persons is one hundred times as bad, and the punishment should be also one hundred times as much.

At this time, in this case, every gentleman under the heaven knows how to condemn it, and calls it wrong or crime.

But the greatest crime is to invade another country, killing many men. Nobody condemns it, but praises it. Because no one knows it is wrong to go to attack another nation, they write about their glorious victory in order to let the future generations read it. If they could discover the wickedness of war, what is the pleasure of writing such a record of it?

It is just like a man who calls a little black black, and calls much black white. He cannot tell black from white. It is bitter when little is tasted. He calls it sweet when much bitterness is tasted. So he cannot tell bitter from sweet.

Little wrong is wrong; everybody condemns it. But the greatest wrong, that of attacking another country, is not only left uncondemned, but is honored and praised. It shows that the world cannot tell right from wrong. This is the way in which the so-called gentlemen under the heaven teach morality and ethics.—From Advocate of Peace.

DO FOREIGN MISSIONS PAY?

An action recently taken by the Chinese Government was the mandate of its late president, Yuan Shih Kai, requiring all men engaged in military and naval service for the country to minister an oath of allegiance and loyalty before the images of two celebrated historical military figures, Kwan-yu and Yueh-fei, who have been revered as the martial gods of China. This mandate was carried out throughout the Republic, and actual personal participation was required of every individual.

As a result of this order a number of Christians in the military and naval service sent in their resignations. Several of these were men in positions of prominence, and one of them was H. E. Li Ho, Vice-Minister of the Board of Naval Affairs. His resignation was immediately accepted, and it is reported that, as the president accepted it without question, he made a significant remark, saying that he respected Li Ho for being willing to sacrifice a high official position for a principle for which he professed to stand.

Commenting upon this action of the Government, the editor of Liu Mei Tsing Nien, organ of the Chinese Students' Christian Association in North America, says: "As the matter stands to-day all Christians are debarred from the naval and military service of the country."

And yet there are those who wonder if Oriental Christians can be the genuine thing!

Here is another story, this time of a whole school of Korean boys, who were true to the commandment to worship the Lord their God and Him only: It is the custom in all Japanese schools for the pupils to bow in reverence and adoration before the portrait of H. M., the Emperor. I am told that on the last birthday of the Emperor His Majesty's picture was placed before a roomful of Korean Christian boys, and the school directed to perform the expected ceremony. A spokesman immediately stepped forward and very quietly, very courteously, but very firmly, said to the teacher: "We are Christians, and as such we can perform no act of worship before any other than God, but if you will allow of us we should like, instead, to pray for God's protection and blessing upon His Majesty, our Emperor." The request was granted.—From The Missionary Link.

"God is within us, and if we do not love to do His will, as manifested there, it is folly to become outward servants of the outward."

THERE have been honest souls in all ages who have sought and found Christ, and all honest seekers may find Him still untrammelled by theologies which they cannot hold. All these are the works of man, often of earnest and good men, who realized more than they could explain. Let us pass by these with charity, and even reverence, and seek the new and ever-living waters at the "Fountain Head."—CHRISTOS,

AN EVENING'S REFLECTION.

C. S. COPE.

"In life's last scenes what prodigies surprise,
Tears of the brave and follies of the wise;
From Marlborough's eyes the tears of doctage flow,
And Swift expires a driv'ler and a show."

—DR. JOHNSON.

While musing on the checkered lines
Of life's eventful page,
And scanning o'er the various signs
Of dim, declining age,
Thus in mild evening's mellow calm,
My pensive mind could see
What once I was, what now I am,
And what I soon may be.

If some rude stroke should cross my way
With overwhelming blight,
Involve the evening of my day
In intellectual night;
May I have lived a holy life,
So innocent and true,
That habit's force on virtue's path,
Might bear me safely through.

But if unguarded passions reign,
Uncurbed reason's force;
May some kind hand in love restrain
Their wild, ungoverned course;
Deal gently with declining years,
The mind that time has failed;
O'erlook my follies, fears and cares,
And soothe the aged child.

But still I hope when nature's course
Shall have relaxed her powers,
That something more than habit's force
May guide life's lingering hours;
When all earth's prospects here grow dim,
And all her props shall fall,
I'd humbly ask increasing faith,
To look behind the veil.

What cause of reverent gratitude,
As evening shades draw near,
To have a mind serenely calm;
And mental vision clear.
But, oh! be pleased, most holy One,
To nurse that feeble ray;
That when its flickering light is done,
This fabric may decay.

"I WILL SING WITH THE UNDERSTANDING ALSO."

There was a time when it honestly seemed to me that Friends endeavored to do as many things as possible, from their manner of public worship to that of greeting one another in the street, in a way different from that of what we call "the world at large." The more of these differences any individual remembered to observe the more nearly did he approach, to my mind, that high ideal of "a concerned and consistent" Friend. From that pinnacle of absolute non-conformity—crowned with perpetual snow, it is true, but of what perfect purity—there were infinite gradations as one descended towards the broad valley of the world—and many half-way houses, where groups had gathered who seemed to lack the courage or the consecration to go higher.

To anyone familiar with the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of even a decade ago, it will not be hard to see how such a conception, however erroneous and untrue to the best ideals of the Society, could have existed in the mind of one still in his 'teens,

To-day it seems scarcely likely that such a conclusion should be formed. The change in the general current of our thought has been often so great as to cause honest anxiety and even grief in some quarters. It is not that we do not realize that there are ideals we must stand for, no matter what the cost. Indeed, the strain of present conditions is impressing that more firmly upon us than it had ever been impressed on most of us before. What some anxious ones have mistaken for a headlong rush to embrace all of the "vain customs of the world" has been due in many instances, I firmly believe, to the sincere endeavor [using Robert O. Menzell's phrase in the reported proceedings of London Yearly Meeting] "to grasp the significance of our founder's ideal and allow no boundary to separate us from others who are also striving to uphold the Truth of Christ." Let us hope it is this rather than a spineless degeneracy that causes us to-day to wish to be like others in all the ways we conscientiously can.

That mistakes have been and will be made in endeavoring to pursue such a course is more than likely. Some will fearfully have continued to maintain barriers in which, were they to think out their position, they would find there was for them, at least, no principle involved; others, in commendable zeal and whole-heartedness, will have rushed along, trampling with little heed sometimes on things, small in their way, perhaps, but in which there rests still a really vital principle.

An example of what seems to me to be the latter sort, lying near at hand and close to the hearts of some of us, has been much on my own mind. I refer to the singing of hymns.

Too small a matter in itself to discuss, you say, no matter what view is taken on the subject. But the roots go further down than we are disposed to think and a clearer understanding of a little matter often helps towards a clearer understanding of things greater.

A comparison of our present Book of Discipline with that even of 1903, will, I think, show anyone that as a Yearly Meeting we are convinced that our attitude in the past on the question of music was entirely too severe. My own love of music makes me glad indeed that the change has been made. But even when that other attitude was our official one, there existed in many Friends' homes the beautiful custom of gathering the family together, on First-day evenings, perhaps, to sing some of the glorious old hymns that have helped humanity for generations, and will, I trust, for generations to come. In the close fellowship of the family group there is often a unity of aspiration that the quiet, reverent singing together of such older or newer songs of the spirit, for instance, as "Abide with Me," "Lead, Kindly Light," "Rock of Ages," "Nearer, My God, To Thee," or "Now the Day is Over," can scarcely fail both to express and strengthen.

To-day, too, more and more of our young people are going off to Northfield or Silver Bay or Eagles' Mere and come home from those wonderful conferences deeply stirred by their experiences and by the visions which have been opened to them there. They feel the part that the singing played at those meetings, how it gathered them all, who had come from the four winds, into one unified group with a common longing and a common, contagious purpose. Why shouldn't they be permitted to sing hymns unrestrictedly when they get back home again?

Why not, indeed? It is certainly not because it is music, or else, why allow them to sing at all? It can't be because they are religious songs or we should have to rule out everything from the Psalms to a great part of the poetry of our own Whittier, with much besides that we should be loath to part with. No, if we are not in favor of the unrestricted singing of hymns there must be other grounds than these for our objections.

Last First-day I attended the little meeting at Quaker Ridge, Maine—a meeting that in the one hundred and six years of its existence has never had a resident minister. There were six others present, and I was told they take turns "leading," which means, so far as I could gather, opening and closing the meeting. We sang three or four simple hymns at the outset—hymns which somehow seemed peculiarly applicable to the condition of our little company and which were sung in such a spirit that I did not wonder when someone of the isolated community remarked that often the singing seemed the best part of their meetings. It appeared to draw them more closely together in their worship, somewhat as the disciples must have been drawn more closely together after the Last Supper, "when they had sung an hymn."

As a boy of twelve or thirteen I was, for a period of about a year and a half, a member of a well-trained church choir. It was an experience I value for various reasons. It gave me an insight into the beauty and dignity of the Book of Common Prayer and its prescribed ritual. It undoubtedly developed my powers of musical appreciation for which I am frankly glad. But, as I look back upon that period, the idea that those of us who were to sing an anthem or a processional hymn, or were to chant the Responses in the Litany, should in any way consider the words we were singing was never once present. It was not what we sang, but always how we were singing it. Whatever the effect upon the congregation, for us it was certainly largely lip-worship.

A majority of those who will read this article attend meetings where the congregation does not feel any need of music as an aid to worship. It is for those, it seems to me, to keep clearly before their own minds the difference between what I have been describing in these last two paragraphs and to bear a clear testimony before the world.

Most hymns are written in the form of prayer. We should probably all regard the offering of vocal prayer as one of the most serious and awful of religious exercises. How can a prayer to the Almighty be considered as anything less serious because it is set to music? How are we justified in singing less concernedly what we would hesitate to speak unless deeply moved?

Which is the more important element of a hymn, the music or the words? The prayer or the air it is set to? Yet how often will a hymn be stopped right in the middle and another substituted which "sings better," or has "a prettier harmony," or "an easier tenor!" How often I have heard a group singing hymns who were far more concerned that the "parts" should be sung right than with any words they were singing. And how often do we hear sung—or perhaps ourselves thoughtlessly sing—old songs whose melodies we love but the words of which, were we to analyze them, would be found to embody the doctrines of some outworn theology with which we could in no sense longer honestly unite.

We know that there was some singing in the ministry of the early Friends, but that the practice was gradually dropped. For the reason probably that it seemed increasingly evident to the thoughtful of those days that congregational exercises of any sort, when there were so many "states and conditions" of spirit gathered together, were exceedingly difficult to perform "in the Life." That is, something in the way a true minister waits for the anointing power of the Spirit, so a group, to sing a hymn together or to recite what we call the Lord's Prayer, should, each one, feel something of that same prompting or there results an empty form without the substance of reality.

Yet I have heard it seriously advocated that the boys and girls at Westtown School should be encouraged to sing hymns on First-days, as they stroll in groups up and down the walk, for otherwise they would want to sing songs scarcely appropriate to the day. If they were in the mood to sing this sort of song, surely they could not be in the mood for the proper singing of hymns. As well urge all to take vocal part in every meeting for worship, lest, perchance, they be likely to fall asleep or to talk with their neighbors.

If I have made my point in what I have just written, it is that what seems at first glance to be a small matter really goes far below the surface to the very foundation of our ideals of worship and the ministry. Few of us want to compromise these ideals. Most of us are sincerely anxious to uphold them. As we go about our "barrier-breaking" there, we ought to try always, if we can, to think our position clear and thorough, with all its implications. Testimony-bearers we have always striven to be—we must see to it that our witnessing is not fogged.

ALFRED LOWRY, JR.

EIGHTH MONTH 2, 1916.

A PLEA FOR PACIFISM.

WILL AMERICA YIELD TO THE ARMAMENT MADNESS?

WASHINGTON GLADDEN.

I am a pacifist, if I understand that word, which is not in my dictionary. A pacifist, I suppose, is a peacemaker. And the teacher from whom I have learned what little I know about conduct once said, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

I sometimes hear the word "pacifist" spoken very reproachfully. There is a little more hiss in that word than there is in pacifist, and some people like to use words that have a good deal of hiss in them. But if pacifist is any stronger than pacifist, then I'm that. Perhaps a pacifist is not only a peacemaker, but a man who wants to make peacemakers. If that is what it means, I'm that. And if anybody says that it is silly to be a pacifist, I shall not quarrel with him. I have often, as St. Paul said, been counted a fool for Christ's sake, and I expect to be, as long as I live. And if anybody calls me a mollycoddle, my only answer is: "Very well; then I will try to be a fair-minded, just, honorable mollycoddle; I'll do my best to make it a name which everybody will respect. The name Christian was originally a word of contempt. It was flung at people because there was a hiss in it. And the day may come when the King shall say, 'Blessed are the mollycoddles, for they shall be called the children of God!'"

I am not, however, in favor of "peace at any price"—if I understand what that means. Peace is a good thing which I greatly desire for myself and for my family, and for my city, and for my country, and for the whole world; but I don't want any good thing at any less than a fair price; I wish to pay for all the good I get all that it is worth. I want peace and I am ready to pay full market-price for it, which is justice and truth and trust and fair play and good-will and kindness and service: as a rule, you can get it for that, and I don't believe you can get it for any less—not the real thing, that you can live with and that will stay with you.

But of this I am equally sure; I don't want war at any price. That, indeed, is a costly luxury. It comes high in any market. You have to pay for it carnage, slaughter, widowhood, orphanage, broken homes, crippled lives, desolated fields, ruined cities, and heaping measures of hatred and suspicion and fear. You can never get it on any other terms.

The policy of preparedness may be advocated by honest men, but it has a way of working out its own results. Armaments mean war, and sooner or later they bring war. Of course, they are for self-defense. All the belligerents on the continent of Europe are fighting on the defensive. Ask them! Now that is the logic of preparedness. No matter what you intend by it, that is what it means; you never can make it mean anything else. The kindling of suspicions and fears always will go hand in hand with the work of building the armament.

One fact we may as well face. If we are going to have war indefinitely, it will not be the same kind of war, it will wax worse and worse continually. Experience makes that plain. This war is immeasurably worse, more fierce, more relentless, more inhuman than any war in history. And the next war, for which we are urged to get ourselves in a state of preparedness, will be as much more diabolical than this, as this is more devilish than any which have preceded it. Thousands of minds, furnished with all the resources of Kultur, will be constantly at work inventing new machinery for mangling men, new methods of inflicting torture, new appliances for erasing the beauty of the earth and ruining its fairest monuments, for making its loveliest lands uninhabitable.

You know that this principle of preparedness ruled, not very long ago, in all our private life, and especially in the highest ranks. Every gentleman went armed. You might or might not have a shirt, but you must have a sword. Now in those old days of preparedness homicide was as common as eggs for breakfast. The time came when it seemed to many men that they had some better thing to do than to keep themselves always in a state of preparedness for war. They began to say, "What mortal reason have we for hating and fighting our neighbors? It is monstrous. It is ridiculous. It is not economical." What did they do about it? Why, they outlawed it. They said, "The thing for us to get rid of is this whole business of preparedness. We will have no more of it. The man who goes about with pistols and rapiers in his belt is not a hero, he is a ruffian; he is an undesirable citizen. He keeps the air full of explosive material. Let him remove himself out of our sight. We can get along without him very well."

What happened then? Why, homicide and violence practically came to an end; at any rate, they were greatly abated. Peace returned to earth. Security began to reign. What was the cause of this change? Was it trust in the police? Not at all. It was trust in one another. It was the replacing of the ape and tiger psychology of human relation by the human psychology of good-will. Instead of seeing in every unknown man an enemy or an assassin, they began to assume that every unknown man was a neighbor and a friend. Where that trust in one another exists, you have peace and security: where it is absent, though your streets are full of policemen and there is a jail on every square, you will always be in fear and in peril.

We all know which way we want history to go, and we can help it to go that way if we are strongly going that way ourselves. But we shall not help it to go that way if we ourselves are going the other way; if we are building ships, enlisting soldiers, increasing armaments.

Of course, we are going to build these ships and enlist these armies that we are now talking about for purely defensive purposes. For defense against whom? I doubt whether any nation on the face of the earth entertains toward us any purposes of aggression. Such purposes may be excited in some nation by the increase of our armaments, for no such construction ever goes on without guiding the thought of the people toward some suspected foe, and that is a secret which cannot be kept: the suspicion and the fear will stir resentment and hostility somewhere. But every nation on the earth which might be such a foe knows to-day that we are not now and cannot be for twenty years in any danger from her. All these nations, broken, wasted, battered, and torn as they will be when they come out of this war, will know that we have no reason to be afraid of aggression from them. You know how easy it is to awaken national jealousies. Would it be strange if some of them should conclude that our defensive policy is a mask for some sinister design? If, as I strongly believe, no nation will be in condition to attack us within twenty years, then the ships which we build now will be junk before we have ever used them. It is safe to wait until the congress of the nations following this war. If it concludes to perpetuate militarism and preparedness and forces us to face the return of Hades, then we will have time, if we think it useful, to get ready for that emergency. But if, on the other hand, it concludes to free the world from the scourge of war, we shall not only have some big and needless bills to pay, but we shall be very much ashamed of ourselves.

Was not that a pathetic note that was sounded across the sea a few days ago from one of the wisest and sanest of the English statesmen, not now in office, Lord Rosebery?

"I know nothing more disheartening than the announcement recently made that the United States, the one great country in the world free from the hideous bloody burden of war, is about to embark upon the building of a huge armada, destined to be equal or second to our own. It means that the burden will continue upon the other nations and be increased in proportion to the fleet of the United States. I confess that it is a disheartening prospect that the United States, so remote from the European conflict, should voluntarily in these days take up the burden which, after the war, will be found to have broken, or almost broken, our backs."

It is not from England alone that this warning comes. Perhaps the most trenchant and influential pen in Berlin is that of Maximilian Harden. And what says Maximilian Harden to-day?

"I find that the time has come when this terrible catastrophe must make similar catastrophes impossible. . . . All great Powers must get together in order to make an end to this unparalleled crime. . . . The nations now at war will have to live together in this house which they are now destroying, and the more terrible the destruction the worse for all of us. . . . If this war is not to be the last great war, it is nothing else than criminal madness."

If Old Europe is struggling to get out of this Gehenna of militarism, what idocy it is for Young America to be getting ready to plunge into it! If the failure of the other nations to make this war the last great war will be criminal madness, what kind of madness is it for this nation to spend a billion of dollars in preparing to continue and perpetuate war?

It is within the power of this nation, at this juncture, to inflict upon the human race an unspeakable injury, and it looks as though she were bound to do it. God grant that I may not live to see it!

NEWS ITEMS.

WM. C. ALLEN writes under date Seventh Month 25, 1916: "We have completed the work I felt called to in England after two months steady and often wearing labor. To-morrow we start to visit my daughter at her Irish home and hope to sail for America Ninth Month 5th."

On the afternoon of Seventh-day, Eighth Month 12th, nearly a hundred gathered at the ninth annual Tea Meeting held in the meeting-house, near Horsham village, Pa. The cooler, fresher air that day added largely to the comfort and enjoyment of the occasion. Benjamin F. Whitson spoke to an interested company, composed largely of neighbors and friends from the surrounding country. His subject, the Rediscovery of Quakerism, was ably handled, in a way that inspired with hope for the future. The clear teachings of our Master in reference to love and peace were dwelt upon, and the thought elaborated that righteousness of communities and nations was as much a part of the Divine plan as that of individuals. After the meeting the company spent a social hour on the grassy lawn surrounding the meeting-house, where a lunch was served. The lunch, consisting of dainty sandwiches, lemonade, ice cream and cake, had been supplied by the Anne-Elizabeth Tea Room, a pleasant stopping-place on the pike near Jarretstown, where Elizabeth W. Shoemaker and a friend will welcome guests. The social hour thus spent helps to a closer fellowship and a fuller understanding of those in different outward religious membership.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.—Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting was held in regular course on the 7th and 8th. These were both record-breaking days as regards heat, but there was a good attendance at both meetings in spite of this handicap. The meeting of Ministers and Elders continued for about two hours. One Friend described it by saying, "Well, we were baptized!" In addition to a weighty consideration of the Queries the action of Western District Monthly Meeting in acknowledging William W. Cadbury as a minister was confirmed.

In the meeting on Third-day the service in the vocal ministry was largely from visiting ministers. In the business session Eli Harvey presented a minute of his Monthly Meeting liberating him for service in all the Quarterly Meetings and in their constituent meetings, with authority to appoint meetings as elders and overseers might feel satisfied would be best. There was a response of satisfaction in his attendance and of encouragement for his faithfulness.

The consideration of the Queries evoked little expression, but more than one Friend confessed to feeling their value. In re-appointing the Clerks of two years past an arrangement was made for the clerical work to be done at the expense of the meeting. The thought was in more than one mind that this might be a first step toward a secretarial office for the Quarterly Meeting. In some places such a development has put the Quarterly Meeting into the list of militant organizations in addition to being a general clearing-house for the subordinate meetings.

POCONO NOTES.—The growth of a child—after years of care and slow development—has its counterpart in community movements when they suddenly mature. And something of this sort has been witnessed in this and neighboring communities during the past month.

For years we have been interested in and earnestly desirous that our mountain neighbors should share the privileges of larger opportunities. Occasional visits to their homes and churches have been made by some of our campers during the last decade and there has been daily intercourse with those who brought supplies to the Preserve or who have helped in building our homes about the lake.

As the temperature in winter often drops far below the freezing point and the Poconos are sparsely settled these mountaineers have lived under some serious disadvantages—socially, educationally and spiritually—the local pastor only making his rounds once a fortnight, and the high school only recently built, while there was no resident physician. It was to supplement these disabilities and stimulate a wholesome interest among themselves that the Neighborhood Improvement Association was formed. Intoxicating drinks have had their degrading effects, as elsewhere, but there is a sturdy, independent character, that lends itself kindly to tactful suggestions and sympathetic co-operation in these matters.

It has been a real satisfaction to have had their good will all through these years, but even more now to co-operate in a well-organized effort to establish permanent rural centers for the public welfare.

A joint Committee from the Preserve and a nearby village gave the initiative, after the visit from Jean Kane Foulke, and then our neighbors wisely appointed their own officers from the permanent residents on the mountain and graciously continued the joint Committee by request, so we could be available for consultation in any time of need. All this was fully presented by the Principal of the high school at our Town Meeting on the 10th inst., as he is the President of the new association.

The Farm Bureau Agent, previously mentioned, also gave a most interesting and encouraging report of his efforts to relieve the farmers in this section, by helping them to solve their agricultural problems.

Seldom have we listened to a young man—one out of 1400 students in the Agricultural Department of the State College—who showed more fitness for his calling and was equally interested in the moral and spiritual welfare of every community. His office is in Stroudsburg and he is called upon from all parts of Monroe County to give advice "from the cure of a sick potato field to a sick cow."

The fact that one of our mountain neighbors has offered a house, rent free, to any one who will occupy it as a base from which to visit in behalf of the spiritual needs of the community, is an encouraging sign.

As these subjects were earnestly discussed beside a glorious log fire on the lake shore, there was a consciousness on the part of all present that we are truly "members one of another," in the widest possible sense, and much appreciation was felt and expressed concerning the attitude of each group toward the other.

The three egrets which remained about our lake for a week, a month ago, have gone elsewhere, but we do not forget their beautiful white plumage and graceful forms—so much enjoyed by the 500 odd campers of this colony—as an emblem of the spirit and purpose prevailing here.

When one reviews the last fifteen years and recalls the condition of the roads and settlements on this mountain, when our late beloved friend, George Abbott, and others launched The Pocono Manor Association, simultaneously with the Pocono Pines Assembly and, a few years later, the Pocono Lake Preserve, one is almost overwhelmed by a sense of how far these improvements have transcended the farthest vision and hopes of those days of camping in the Naomi Pines (now being lumbered for the first time in 115 years).

Joshua L. Bailly has added a thousand acres, contiguous to The Manor estate, of equal size, much of which is a beautiful park and has kindly offered to the guests of The Manor Inn and adjoining cottages to enjoy the beauty of the Swiftwater Creek. And fine golf links have their attractions. The State Road from the Summit Railroad Station across this plateau to the Wilkesbarre and Easton Turnpike—some thirteen miles—was made about ten years ago, and is one of the best highways in our Commonwealth and much used. The forest fires, once such a menace to this district, are better controlled than formerly by a system of fire lines and a staff of wardens.

Last evening, under a full moon, some 250 of our campers assembled in these woods, and their happy faces made this wilderness seem very much like a Garden of Eden.

J. E.

POCONO LAKE, Pa., Eighth Month 13, 1916.

HENRY D. LANE, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, in a personal letter of recent date, writes of the endeavor to raise funds to guarantee a new Penn College: "I am glad to say that our campaign was successful, thanks to the efforts and generosity of our many friends and sympathizers, among whom were many eastern Friends." A clipping from an Exchange is as follows:

"Again Quakerism has manifested the fact that it possesses remarkable vitality. The biggest financial enterprise ever undertaken, in proportion to the constituents, has just been brought to a complete success. Just before midnight, Eighth Month 1st, the final subscription toward the four hundred thousand fund for Penn College was received. Those who began this campaign and who were most intimately associated with it had many periods during its progress when it seemed unaccomplishable, but from the very first until the last nothing was neglected which gave the remotest promise, and from a multitude of sources the aggregate amount was finally secured.

"One could scarcely believe at certain times that an institution that had come into such a situation as had Penn College could be rehabilitated, but the outcome is a proof beyond doubt that there is a tremendous appreciation for the small college which affords Christian education, as it is also a proof of the splendid loyalty of those who have had the benefits of such education.

"Oskaloosa, which had been asked to give $150,000, overreached the mark by several thousand. The county, outside of Oskaloosa did not come up to expectations, but that was partly occasioned by the impossibility of a thorough canvass on account of the shortness of the time. Friends, both in the east and in the west, were most generous in their gifts and helpful in their service. A brief trip through the east, followed by one in the west, resulted in such gifts, without which the enterprise would have failed, so that eastern and western Friends may have the most satisfactory assurance that it was their generosity which saved the day. Local constituents of the college could not have succeeded alone."

The paper here quoted concludes:

"It would be very difficult to write a personal letter to everyone who has contributed, expressing to them the appreciation for their assistance, therefore I wish to take this opportunity to extend to everyone the deepest thanks of the management of Penn College and of those who have been most closely associated with this enterprise for their help, and this means that everyone who gave, even in the smallest way, has been fully appreciated. It has been the united contributions of all that has made this enterprise successful."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The Ledger prints the following: "J. E. Rhoads & Sons, of 12 N. Third Street, have shipped one of the largest leather driving belts ever manufactured from their plant in Wilmington, Del. It was consigned to the Diamond State Fibre Company, West Conshohocken. The belt, endless and of water-proof construction, is 146½ feet long and 4½ feet wide and three-ply in thickness. It weighs about 1800 pounds and is worth approximately $5000."

The degree of Bachelor of Forestry will be conferred upon 11 men at the eleventh graduating exercises of the Pennsylvania State Forest Academy, at Mont Alto, on the 24th.

Nearly 30,000 caterpillars were killed, and 33,000 cocoons and 30,000 egg masses were burned by children of four public school playgrounds, and two recreation centers in the campaign for the extermination of the pest. The champion "caterpillar killers" among children were presented to Mayor Smith and acquainted him with their trophy records. The boy is John C. Johnson, of the Packer School, who by official count killed 7,875 caterpillars. The girl killers are headed by Mae Pook, of the same school, who surpassed John's record by slaughtering 11,356.

A foundation for a thorough scientific investigation of the cause, means of transmission, and cure of infantile paralysis has been projected by the Philadelphia Pediatric Society. An eminent pathologist, who was associated with Dr. Simon Flexner, at the Rockefeller Institute, has vol-entered his services, provided an equipped laboratory is placed at his disposal.

GENERAL.—Eleven thousand cases of infantile paralysis were reported from 37 States to a federal conference with State health officials at Washington.

An economy campaign of nation-wide extent will be started by American farmers at the fourth national conference on marketing and farm credits called to meet in Chicago Twelfth Month 4th to 9th. The campaign will begin with practical plans for checking enormous waste in marketing farm products. This annual wastage is of $1,000,000,000 magnitude, according to a statement of the general committee. "The root of it lies in defective local organization of farmers," says Secretary Charles W. Holman, of Madison, Wis., "and the delegations will work out machinery for getting the local communities more tightly organized."

In an attempt to advance civilization through the medium of medical relief, the Philippine Government, co-operating with the International Health Board of the Rockefeller Foundation, will send a hospital ship to the Sulu Archipelago, which is inhabited by approximately 200,000 Moros and other savage tribes. The medical service will be maintained for five years. Investigation has shown the Moros to be suffering from skin diseases of severe form, malaria, hookworm and other preventable infections.

A treaty between Great Britain and the United States for protection of insect-destroying birds on both sides of the Canadian boundary was signed at the State Department by Secretary Lansing and Ambassador Spring-Rice. The treaty covers virtually all kinds of bird life. Its administration will be left to local authorities. So far as it is known this is the first treaty of the kind ever signed.

FOREIGN.—The following is from Tokio, under date of the 31st ult.: "Dr. Inazo Nitobe, a Japanese scholar well-known in the United States, where he spent several years, has just published impressions of a recent visit to the Philippine Islands, and his articles have attracted wide attention in Japan. Doctor Nitobe said he heard many Americans in the Philippines express belief that the islands would ultimately pass into the hands of the Japanese, but he believed the attitude of the natives might be quite different."

NOTICES.

As most Friends are probably aware, the Committee of Six having charge of the ground to the south of the meeting-house at Fourth and Arch Streets, has opened this plot, under the supervision of the Playgrounds Association of Philadelphia, as a Rest Centre for women and little children.

A drinking fountain has been installed, a large shelter awning erected, and a sand pile and benches appropriately placed on the grounds, and it is indeed a pleasant sight to witness the pleasure the visitors evidently feel in their use of this quiet and restful spot. There is in charge an experienced Social Worker, who teaches the children manual work, simple games, or gathers them around her for stories. So far, since Seventh Month 1st, the daily attendance has averaged about sixty, some twenty of whom have been adults, who come in for the lunch interval from their places of business in the neighborhood.

The undersigned have felt that to many Friends this use of the above ground gives great satisfaction, and furthermore that the suggestion that Friends should do all of this work, not only allowing the use of the ground, but also supplying the necessary funds to the Playgrounds Association to carry it on, would be a very welcome one to many. In the hope, therefore, that a sufficient number will consider it a privilege to spare from $2 to $10 each from their vacation funds for this purpose, we are sending out this statement to those that we feel will be interested. Contributions from anyone in any amount will be gladly received by A. G. Scattergood, 409 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

"We know of no Inner Light but that of the Lord Jesus Christ in the Soul. When we talk of the Inner Light we mean nothing more nor less than George Fox meant by the words, the Christ Within; the same that the Apostle Paul meant when he said to certain converts that he was in travail with them 'till Jesus Christ be formed in you.' We recognize no Inner Light that is not an emanation of God Himself. By whatever name we call it—whether Inner Light or Holy Spirit or Christ Within—it is the same thing."—Silvanus P. Thompson, in 1906.

"THE LIGHT WITHIN."

A Study of the Holy Spirit.

This is the title of a neatly-bound volume of some three hundred pages, from the prolific pen of Charles Lewis Slattery, published by Longmans, Green & Co. The author was sometime headmaster of the Faribault Boarding School, in Minnesota, but now "rector of Grace Church in New York City."

He demonstrated his high spiritual quality in writing the "Life of Edward Lincoln Atkinson," whose promising career was so suddenly terminated in 1002. In no small degree the mantle of that gifted soul has fallen upon his devoted friend, and one rejoices that such an extensive field of service welcomes labor of such high spiritual quality. In addition to his duties in a large and influential congregation, he already has nearly a dozen volumes of moment to the credit of his untiring industry.

The present book, as its title indicates, is of appealing interest to Friends. It belongs to the same class of books as Sabatier's "Religions of Authority and Religion of the Spirit," and Amory H. Bradford's "The Inward Light." These all give the Friend the point of view of a non-Friend on our distinguishing doctrine. Perhaps it would not be unfair to say that such contributions indicate that Quakerism is wider by far than any limitations of denominational boundaries. Some of the best Friends apparently are teaching in other folds. Dr. Slattery's treatment of "The Light Within" is entirely from the point of view of a sacramentarian. He touches the ordinances only with a most loving hand, but withal his treatment is so frank and so highly spiritual that to the convinced Friend he seems to be saying throughout, what he writes so aptly on page 157: " . . . one may find good reason for saying that the centuries following the year 1000 have been centuries when the Holy Spirit has been contending against the effort to make the temporal order too stable; against the effort to harden spiritual rites and ordinances into institutions pretending to a value and efficacy apart from the Holy Spirit." A page further on this thought is elucidated in the following passage of great beauty and force: "Why is this? What reason can be given but that our association with the Master of Life is intended to be universal and therefore spiritual. Every little wayside cottage is the blessed home at Nazareth; the shop of every honorable workman is the carpenter-shop of Joseph; every friendly fireside is the home of Mary and Martha and Lazarus at Bethany; every grave is the Holy Sepulchre. It was not Palestine only to which Christ came, it was every inch of this sad and happy world. His feet seem to have touched it all. He came to identify His sympathy and His victory not with a narrow province of the Empire in the days of the Caesars, but with the round world of all time."

The climax of this line of thought, however, is on pages 256 and 257 in the following:

"In the same way, an officer of the church—whether Pope of Christendom or pastor of a little wayside flock—may, if he be humble enough and simple enough, cast aside his own ideas and prejudices, and, praying earnestly, may receive for those over whom he is set in the Lord a message from the Holy Spirit. So the Bible, being the inspired record through human instrumentalities of God's message to peoples and to individuals of the past, is more and more the medium of the Voice of the Holy Spirit to the Church and to nations, and to individuals; provided all these make their hearts attentive and seek to know what the Holy Spirit shall now speak to them through the words of the ancient record. We must hold the Church and the Bible in the most reverent honor. (Church in this text is defined on page 235 as "the great all-inclusive Church.") They are God's gifts for our help. They are wonderful vehicles of grace. But when they are made to seem outwardly and mechanically infallible, when they are made in themselves the last resort, then they block the way to the highest. Then God will lower them, that He may surely give us what is highest of all—the Voice of the Holy Spirit to the Church and to the individuals of our own day. The italics have been inserted to put the universal note in relief.

The sub-title of the volume, "A Study of the Holy Spirit," indicates the author's special form of treatment. Had Friends always been careful to identify the "Light Within" with the Paraclete—the promised Comforter—there would not have been the confusion in regard to the Society that one sometimes finds. An Inward Light that has none of the warmth of the Holy Spirit may serve as a guide into correctness of life, but it has little, if any, of the overcoming power of faith which can make the confession, "Insofar as we are descendants of the early saints, we too pierce the discouragements and evils of our time. We know that the future of the world both visible and invisible is ever tending upward towards perfection. This is not because we can argue a case for the tendencies we can see and touch; it is not because we have any infallible testimony; it is simply because we believe in the Holy Spirit" (page 314).

In a running survey of Christian history our author applies this test to men and events in every department of life. Perhaps his conclusion cannot be better summarized than in this passage from page 256: "By refusing us all infallible standards in institutions and men, God drives us to the highest. We are bidden by the cruel facts to go directly to the spirit of the Living God, when we are in the darkness and desire the infallible light upon our path. Instead of infallibility the Holy Spirit gives us each moment, if we will have it, the guidance of His presence and of His love. He is the only way to the Truth."

Nor is such a test and such a guide without resource in the present world-extremity. Our author finds no compromise with which to justify war. On the contrary, he sounds a ringing note to Christians to clear themselves by a more perfect consecration. These are his remarkable words: "For the future, every man will know that if the world is to free itself from war, that freedom must be bought with a price. Each individual man must resolutely discipline himself; he must trim away the self-indulgence of his will, he must graft his will into the will of God. There must be more worship, private and public, more sacrifice for neighbors and for the world, a more pitiless flagellation of all selfishness and worldliness in our souls. We must, by the ideals of citizenship, build up our own nation to be a saint among the nations of the world; the national honor as sensitive as the individual's honor; the nation's brotherliness as tender as the brotherliness of St. Francis; the nation's love for men, a shadow of the Sacrifice of Christ."

Truly his book shows that the resources of our distinguishing doctrine are far from being exhausted. Will it not stimulate some of our number to make new ventures of faith with it?

OTHER QUOTATIONS FROM "THE LIGHT WITHIN."

"In our reticent modern life we do not suspect how nearly universal prayer is. The Holy Spirit, brooding over our life, yearns to give all men the desire to pray; and all men as the heights loom above them, as the depths yawn beneath them, try to pray. The prayers may be so unconventional that only God calls them prayers, but they are prayers, because those who pray feel that they make a difference in their lives. This difference is not found in a list of benefits received, corresponding to a list of demands. The difference lies in a new human will. Prayer is as the tiny wire, or the waves of ether, bringing the force of God's Will with electric swiftness, into the will of the man who prays." (Pages 293, 294.)

"Obstinacy, hardness, fixity, do not make will." (Page 289.)
 "The pleasant men and women who never do anything aggressively wrong, but who, by their weakness, flow amiably with every current of worldliness, are responsible for most of the defeats of the righteous." (Pages 286, 287.)

"The individual in his own life dares not say what he shall not or cannot do. If his life is to attain, even approximately, its divinely destined goal, it must be wrought according to the plan revealed by the Holy Spirit as the days pass." (Page 284.)

"The individual is apt to dwell on his rights. It is vastly more important that he dwell on his responsibility. He can never lose his right to hear the Inner Voice; he may easily neglect his privilege to listen." (Page 260.)

"The line between a fanatic and a hero is often difficult to draw, but it is safe to say that a hero stands for the truth as he sees it, after he has consulted both his own heart and the larger Christian conscience which surrounds him. He may find that these two consciences do not agree. Thereupon he must decide which is right, the community or the individual. Generally he will find that if his own conscience is clear and unselfish, there will be at least a larger conscience than his own agreeing with him, even if it be not the conscience of the whole people." (Page 261.)

"The holiest word of Christ, assuredly most accurately transmitted to us through the years, is not complete till we have shut our eyes, and with all our hearts and minds have listened; whereupon, we hear the old sentence which was uttered centuries ago, said anew and directly to us by the Spirit of the present Christ—the Christ who never ceases to be a yearning brother to humanity." (Page 258.)

"There is no peril which hordes of lesser peoples can bring to us if we have in our souls the quality of true, Christ-filled, and therefore great men. Whatever armies and guns can do, the soul by the majesty of its strength will conquer at last. And the Holy Spirit, having put His power to the work, will not be turned back." (Page 240.)

"Men are increasingly aware of the unseen armaments, created by human consciences, which go out to every battle for righteousness." (Page 244.)

THE MESSAGE OF QUAKERISM.

NOTE.—The authorship of this paper is not known to the Editors. It seems a timely message and we gladly print it at the suggestion of our friend Samuel Emlen.—Ems.

There comes a time in our human lives when, in some measure, we begin to feel the solemn responsibility of life; and the desire stirs within us to put away childish things, to take a place in all seriousness amid the workers in the world, to do something for the betterment of our fellow-men. Whether this condition is first experienced in early years or not until later, it marks a critical stage in the earthly pilgrimage; and upon reaching it, it is of vital importance where we look for counsel—whether the attention is directed outwardly to man for leading and direction, or inwardly to a greater than man; for there is needed now, both for our own welfare and that of those whom we would benefit, the teaching of One, who knowing the secrets of every heart, can speak with certainty to its needs. Is such instruction within the ability of man to give? Is there not, indeed, great danger lest men, through ignorance of the true condition of the seeking soul, or perhaps from a well-meant zeal to utilize a willing hand, may hurry it unconsciously into activities before its time and beyond its strength, so stunting its growth? An eagerness to work for the spread of righteousness in the earth is a good motive, but it may well be questioned if it is ever in itself a sufficient qualification for labor. "I began to see," says John Churchman, humiliated because of some over-zealousness of his youth, "there was a difference between seeing what was to be done, and being bidden to do the thing shown, besides this I had to consider there [is] a time to bud, a time to blossom, a time for fruit to set and appear, and a time for it to ripen."

The earth is not man's but the Lord's. To the fields white unto harvest, it is the Lord's prerogative to send the needed laborers. Grave is the responsibility, therefore, alike of them who, being called, hold back, and of them who, taking the need or some earthly motive for a call, go unbidden of the Lord of the harvest. He it is that ruleth in the kingdom of men; He alone is Lord; beside Him there is no Saviour. To man there would seem to be the choice of but one of two positions as regards Him. Either he must resign all to the disposition of his Lord, that whatsoever he does may be in harmony with the Divine will, and himself a willing instrument in the Divine hand, or, failing that, he becomes, by following the leadings of his own imagination (however high his motive), an undisciplined and self-willed workman, wasting his own energies and by his waywardness impeding the labor of others.

"We are nothing, Christ is all," has ever been a watchword with the devoted followers of the Lamb of God. But this sense of nothingness is not a thing to be assumed at will, it is attained only by a daily death—by a patient submission to that thorough purging of the heart, that burning up of the chaff with unquenchable fire, which marks the essential baptism of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. "Who may abide the day of His coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth? For He is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap, and He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver." In those who wait for and give themselves up to this heavenly work, mortality becomes "swallowed up of life," and Christ the Lord becomes all in all. Not in name merely, but in truth, He is their life, their righteousness. Abiding in Him, as branches in the Vine, they wait to know His will declared in them, and what they do is done in that power fresh from the spring of His Divine life. Their works, then, are not their own, but His wrought through them. Such may say with Paul, "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me."

Certain of the people coming unto our Saviour, inquired of Him, "What shall we do, that we might work the works of God?" Jesus answered and said unto them, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." Now a true belief in Him implies such a trust in Him, such a confidence in His authority, that our wills are given up to Him, our lives are surrendered into His keeping, our supreme care is to do His bidding. "Every such believer," says William Penn, "becomes an Enoch translated, that is, changed from the fashion of this world, the earthly image, the corrupt nature, and is renewed in the likeness of the Son of God." Such a faith (and nothing short of it is a saving faith) is the gift of God, its elements are by the revelation of the Father. "Who said ye that I (the Son of Man) am?" And Simon Peter answered and said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." And Jesus answered and said unto him, "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." "No man can come unto me," again He declares, "except the Father which hath sent me, draw him." "Though I read the Scriptures that spake of Christ and of God," says George Fox, "I knew Him not but by revelation, as He who hath the key did open, and as the Father of life drew me to His Son by His Spirit."

There is abroad to-day in more than one branch of this scattered Society, a spirit of inquiry as to the manner in which the spiritual life of its members may best be stirred up, developed and directed. In its fundamental aspect, is there not, after all, but one way? Who is He that hath said, "I am the resurrection and the life," "I am the bread of life," "I am the way, the truth and the life," "He that believeth on me hath everlasting life," "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." To know Him—there is the essential thing, it is something infinitely more than to know of Him—than to be thinking of Him to-day and to be off in the world to-morrow. There is need for each of us of that same process of humiliation, that same fiery trial, that Job was obliged to submit to before he realized his condition and in contrition of spirit could say, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes." Not by works first, but by submission, not by activity first, but by passivity, not by the encouragement of the first nature, but by its death, that being dead we may be made alive in Christ—is not this the Gospel order? Is the work such as may be accomplished in a day or that one man may do for another?

Here, it seems to the writer, lay the strength of primitive Quakerism, and here lies the possibility of the continuance of Quakerism to-day—namely, a practical faith in the headship of Christ over His Church, so great that no earthly consideration, no love of ease or false peace, no ridicule of men, can shake it. He, the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, the author of our faith and its finisher, must be the constant spring of our activities, or we fall away into the world. How like a trumpet call is the first Quaker's declaration of his mission: "When the Lord God and His Son Jesus Christ sent me forth into the world to preach His everlasting Gospel and Kingdom, I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to that inward light, spirit and grace, by which all might know their salvation and way to God, even that Divine Spirit which would lead them into all truth, and which I infallibly knew would never deceive any, but with and by this Divine power and spirit of God and the light of Jesus, I was to bring people off from all their own ways to Christ, the new and living way, from their churches which men had made and gathered, to the Church in God, the general assembly written in heaven which Christ is the head of, and off from the world's teachers made by men, to learn of Christ, who is the way, the truth and the life, of whom the Father said, 'This is my beloved Son, hear ye Him'; and off from all the world's worship, to know the Spirit of Truth in the inward parts and to be led thereby, that in it they might worship the Father of spirits . . . ; which spirit they that worshipped not in, knew not what they worshipped. I was to bring people off from all the world's religions, which are vain; that they might know the pure religion, might visit the fatherless, the widows and the strangers, and keep themselves from the spots of the world; then there would not be so many beggars, the sight of whom often grieved my heart, as it denoted so much hard-heartedness amongst those that professed the name of Christ. I was to bring them off from all the world's fellowships, prayings and singings, which stood in forms without power, that their fellowship might be in the Holy Ghost, the eternal Spirit of God; that they might pray in the Holy Ghost; sing in the Spirit, and with the grace that comes by Jesus; making melody in their hearts to the Lord, who hath sent His beloved Son to be their Saviour, caused His heavenly sun to shine upon all the world, and through them all; and His heavenly rain to fall upon the just and the unjust (as His outward rain doth fall and His outward sun doth shine on all), which is God's unspeakable love to all."*

Have conditions so changed that the message of Quakerism should be another thing to-day than that which it was in that early time? Surely not. The trials of the human soul are not essentially different from one age to another; and the heart is still the seat of that holy warfare which is accomplished with weapons that are not carnal. The Truth, in its very nature, is ever the same, however men's appreciation of it may ebb and flow; and the Gospel of Christ is an everlasting Gospel—forever remaining to be "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

THE THINKER.

Back of the beating hammer
By which the steel is wrought,
Back of the workshop's clamor
The seeker may find the Thought,
The thought that is ever Master
Of iron and steam and steel,
That rises above disaster
And tramples it under beel.
The drudge may fret and tinker
Or labor with lusty blows,
But back of him stands the Thinker,
The clear-eyed man who knows;
For into each plow or sabel,
Each piece and part and whole,
Must go the brains of labor,
Which gives the work a soul.
Back of the motor's humming,
Back of the bells that sing,
Back of the hammer's drumming,
Back of the cranes that swing,
There is the Eye which scans them,
Watching through stress and strain,
There is the Mind which plans them—
Back of the brawn, the Brain.
Might of the roaring boiler,
Force of the engine's thrust,
Strength of the sweating toiler,
Greatly in these we trust,
But back of them stands the schemer,
The Thinker who drives things through,
Back of the job—the Dreamer
Who's making the dream come true.

GOING HOME.

Out of the chill and the shadow
 Into the thrill and the shine;
 Out of the dearth and the famine
 Into the fulness divine.
 Up from the strife and the battle
 (Oft with the shameful defeat),
 Up to the palm and the laurel,
 Oh, but the rest will be sweet!

Leaving the cloud and the tempest,
 Reaching the balm and the cheer,
 Finding the end of our sorrow,
 Finding the end of our fear.
 Seeing the face of the Master
 Yearned for in "distance and dream,"
 Oh, for the rapture and gladness!
 Oh, for that vision supreme!

Meeting the dear ones departed,
 Knowing them, clasping their hands,
 All the beloved and true-hearted,
 There in the fairest of lands!
 Sin evermore left behind us,
 Pain nevermore to distress;
 Changing the moan for the music,
 Living the Saviour to bless.

Why should we fear at the dying
 That is but springing to life,
 Why should we shrink from the struggle,
 Pale at the swift-closing strife,
 Since it is only beyond us,
 Scarcely a step and a breath,
 All that dear home of the living,
 Guarded by what we call death!

There we shall learn the sweet meanings
 Hidden to-day from our eyes,
 There we shall waken like children
 Joyous at gift and surprise.
 Come, then, dear Lord, in the gloaming,
 Or when the dawning is gray!
 Take us to dwell in thy presence—
 Only thyself lead the way,

Out of the chill and the shadow
 Into the thrill and the shine;
 Out of the dearth and the famine
 Into the fulness divine.
 Out of the sigh and the silence
 Into the deep-swelling song;
 Out of the exile and bondage
 Into the home-gathered throng.

JOHN BRIGHT.

Bright was once walking with one of his sons past the Guards' Monument in Waterloo Place. The boy asked the meaning of the single word inscribed on the base "Crimea." The father's answer was as emphatic as the inscription, "A Crime." Those two words epitomize Bright's whole mind and heart at the most trying and most heroic period of his long life. For nearly forty years Europe has enjoyed the sunshine of unbroken peace, but, by the end of 1853, Russia and Turkey were at war. England had no concern in the quarrel, but presently espoused the cause of Turkey. The fatal step was announced on Third Month 29, 1854, and on the 31st Bright addressed to the House of Commons the first of his "Great Crimean speeches." Great those speeches certainly were, and are—great in all qualities which make oratory one of the highest arts. They are only four in number, but they made a deeper and more enduring effect on those who heard them and read them than anything which their author had ever uttered. There are people still alive who can describe the awful hush which fell upon the House when he appealed to the ancient and vainglorious Palmerston to stay the effusion of human blood. "I do not suppose that your troops are to be beaten in actual conflict with the foe, or that they will be driven into the sea; but I am certain that many homes in England, in which there now exists a fond hope—many such homes will be rendered desolate when the next mail shall arrive. The Angel of Death has been abroad throughout the land; you may almost hear the beating of his wings." Never again did a single phrase of Bright's strike so directly home to the hearts of those who heard it. Men who could not quote another sentence from his speech remember the "Angel of Death." Cobden, who heard the speech delivered, said to him as he sat down amid the sympathetic thunder which rewards an oratorical triumph, "You went very near that time. If you had said 'flapping' instead of 'beating of his wings,' the House would have laughed." Quite so; but Bright had a genius for language, which bore him safely even on the dizziest heights.—GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL, in North American Review.

JOHN BRIGHT AND WAR.

MARGARET E. HIRST.

[The Friends' Quarterly Examiner for First Month contains a long paper on John Bright. Those who have access to the journal will read the paper in full. We wish in a few consecutive numbers of THE FRIEND to give such extracts as will make the narrative continuous if not complete.—EDS.]

After the year 1756, when the Quaker deputies retired from the Assembly of Pennsylvania, for almost a century the Society of Friends had little representation in the political world. It is true that the agitation against the slave-trade, both in England and America, originated with them, but their interest in it was primarily philanthropic, and the actual political leadership of the movement was in other hands. William Penn and John Bright—the list of Quaker statesmen is short but noteworthy. Of the two it is the modern Friend for whom the higher place must be claimed, on the ground of a complete and consistent life. He was not, like Penn, the ruler of a great territory or the adviser of a king, but his empire was in the hearts of the working people and his highest reward was their unbounded trust in him. Palmerston could say, during the Crimean War fever, that he did not "reckon Cobden, Bright and Co. for anything," and in 1859 the Queen refused a suggestion that Bright should be given a Privy Councillorship, on the ground that "it would be impossible to allege any service Mr. Bright has rendered." This fourteen years after the repeal of the Corn Laws! Yet in the Home Rule crisis of 1886-7 his influence, more even than his arguments, told heavily against the Government. "Every word," wrote Lord Morley, "seemed to weigh a pound."^{*}

Of late years, when the great peace advocate is no longer here to answer for himself, some critics have tried to prove that his opposition to war would have given way before the circumstances of some particular war (waged since his death), and that he would have supported and approved the arbitration of force in such a case. In this argument they rely on the admitted fact that Bright carefully and explicitly met the advocates of each war on their own ground, and showed that even on their principles it was to be condemned. However honestly he believed that his opposition was confined to the circumstances of each case, there is scarcely a speech in which his personal abhorrence to war is not manifest, and more than once he alludes specifically to the principles of Friends. For example, in his great speech in the House of Commons on the declaration of war against Russia in 1854, he declines to discuss the war, "on the abstract principle of peace at any price, as it is termed, which is held by a small minority of persons in this country, founded on religious opinions which are not generally received." Many years later, at Manchester, in 1876, he definitely attributed his opposition to the Crimean War to his Quaker upbringing.

"I do not know why I differed from other people so much, but sometimes I have thought it happened from the education I had received in the religious sect with which I am connected. We have no creed which monarchs and statesmen and high priests have written out for us. Our creed, so far as we comprehend it, comes pure and direct from the New Testament. We have no thirty-seventh Article to declare that it is lawful for Christian men, at the command of the civil magistrate, to wear weapons and to serve in wars—which means, of course, and was intended to mean, that it is lawful for Christian men to engage in any part of the world, in any cause, at the command of a monarch, or of a Prime Minister, or of a Parliament, or of a commander-in-chief, in the slaughter of his fellow-men, whom he might never have seen before, and from whom he had no reason to feel the smallest touch of anger or resentment."

In the great speech for peace at Edinburgh, in 1853, Bright defined war in no uncertain terms:

"What is war? I believe that half the people that talk about war have not the slightest idea of what it is. In a short sentence it may be summed up to be the combination and concentration of all the horrors, crimes, and sufferings of which human nature is capable."

To one who had written to him, asking him if he condemned all war:

"I have no time to write fully upon the question. It is one on which men should make up their minds as to their own personal duty. So far men have defended war as if it were a natural condition of things which must always continue. It might be true that war could not always be avoided, and that in some cases, it might be justifiable, and yet, granting this, it might be shown that nineteen out of every twenty wars which have been waged ought to have been avoided, and were criminal in the highest degree. I believe that all our wars since the time and accession of William III, might have been avoided on principles which do not require the absolute condemnation of war in every possible case that may be suggested or imagined. We need not discuss the question as you put it. We shall change the policy, and the aspect of our country and of the world, if we leave the demon of war to the cases in which there seems to Christian and rational men no escape from the miseries he inflicts upon mankind. I would advise you not to trouble yourself with the abstract question. The practical question is the one which presses, and when we have settled that there will remain very little of the mischief to contend about or to get rid of. If you wish to know the best argument against war, I would recommend you to read Jonathan Dymond's 'Essays on the Principles of Morality' or his 'Essays on War.'"

The recommendation of Dymond's uncompromisingly Quaker essay shows plainly where Bright's own opinion rested, in spite of the careful phrasing of the letter. A few months before, at Manchester, he had described the essentially un-Christian character of war in language which may have inspired the foregoing statement; he said:

"We may differ upon many points of articles in Churches, but we are all agreed on this: that if there be anything definite and distinct in the teachings of the New Testament it is that which would lead to amity among people and to love and justice and mercy and peace on the whole of God's earth upon which His sun shines. If, then, we are agreed upon this, let us, if it be possible to throw off the hypocrite in this matter—let us get rid of our Christianity, or get rid of our tendency and willingness to go to war. War is a game which, if their subjects were wise, kings would not be able to play at; and be they kings or queens, be they statesmen of this or that color or party, never let any man go headlong into any policy that points direct for war until he has thoroughly examined the question by his own best intellect, brought it to bear on his own Christian conscience, and decided it for himself as if he were asked to pull the trigger or to use the sword."

Such was the careful and considered language of John Bright, both in the maturity of his political life and in later years. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that his opponents were right in their belief that his opposition to war was primarily based on moral and religious convictions, though they were wholly wrong in seizing upon this fact as an excuse for neglecting the weighty political arguments which he marshalled against each war or project of war in its turn.

"JUST HIMSELF."

The trite saying, that "people are alike the world over," is very true in many ways. Those of us who are Christians long that this may be said some day about the world's belief in Jesus as its Saviour.

Because of this deep desire, I much enjoyed finding this belief very strong among those gathered at the two conferences which I attended this summer.

It was indeed a great pleasure to find during the days of attendance at the Yearly Meeting of New England Friends, held at Vassalboro, Maine, and also at the Christian Workers' Conference at Princeton, N. J., that the joyous and dominant note was always just Christ—or as a Friend expressed it at Princeton, "Just Himself." With representatives from many denominations, and from all over the United States, one began to think, and almost to hope that "people are alike the world over."

The redigging of the wells of salvation for ourselves, and not mistaking an account of it for the real experience, was a very striking note. "Get back to the supreme reality of the Universe—the living Christ. Do not take any substitute, nothing else will take the place of the living experience of the living Christ."

We were warned against stopping at the point where we can call Christ our Saviour. We must go further and claim the promises and facts which belong to us. Otherwise we are in danger of remaining "babes in Christ," and forfeiting the heritage which is ours, to "come unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." (Eph. iv: 13.)

Much was said about the absolute necessity of a full surrender to Christ; and that this surrender includes our past, our present, our future, and also the best things in our lives! We were urged to just allow Him, by our faith, and trust, and belief in Him as our Saviour, to dwell in us. Then we will be able to know what it is to have the "moment by moment victory" day by day. And this is the only victory that makes it possible for us to live to His glory.

The service which follows such a surrender to, and such an appropriation of, "just Himself" is service which will have His seal upon it. Then we shall be able to claim as our very own these wonderful facts, ". . . in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us." (Rom. viii: 37.)

" . . . thanks be unto God who always leadeth us in triumph in Christ." (2 Cor. ii: 14, R. V.)

Shall we not reconsecrate our all to Him, and become real conquerors who are led in triumph, always by "just Himself?" So may we hasten the time when all shall have a better chance to know Him.

God does not expose all to the very same thing, and let not us cramp all men to one form; but He leads us through ways that we know not, dark and various, until by His mercy, having become guileless before Him, we dwell with Him and are satisfied by the sight of Him.—F. W. NEWMAN.

LITTLE VICTIMS OF THE WAR.

Do ye hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears.
The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
The young birds are chirping in the nest,
The young fawns are playing with the shadows,
The young flowers are blowing toward the west—
But the young, young children, O my brothers,
They are weeping bitterly!
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

Do you question the young children in the sorrow
Why their tears are falling so?
The old man may weep for his to-morrow
Which is lost in Long-Ago;
The old tree is leafless in the forest,
The old year is ending in the frost,
The old wound, if stricken, is the sorest,
The old hope is hardest to be lost;
But the young, young children, O my brothers,
Do you ask them why they stand
Weeping sore before the bosoms of their mothers,
In the old Fatherland?

A MUSSULMAN ON WAR AND CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION.

BY HABBIBOLLAH, AIN OL MOLK.
[An Advanced Mussulman.]

No fierce and hungry lion, no sharp-clawed and angry tiger, no furious wolf, is more bloodthirsty than the civilized man of to-day.

This same civilized man, who has attended universities and studied sciences, spends his time, energy, and wisdom in preparing hellish instruments and in inventing infernal machines, deadly guns and cannons, warships and aeroplanes. Why? In order to destroy the business of commercial cities, to change palaces into graves, and to close up all the avenues of escape of his kind, shooting them down from every side with volleys of bullets.

This is the calling of civilized man of this century. What wild animal is there who can smear a thousand of his kind with blood? This bravery, this nobility, is especially reserved for the civilized man of this enlightened era. As soon as he puts the crown of power upon his head and ascends the throne of might and strength, with a cruel heart, as hard as stone, he snatches the first-born from the weak and helpless mother, from the old, deceitful father; he leaves the sister in the last extremity of grief, the widow alone with her sorrow, the little children fatherless.

For their own covetousness, selfishness and passion they send millions of youths, like flocks of sheep, to the place of slaughter, to shield themselves from the bullets of the enemy; just for killing and being killed—murder.

Who is the enemy? And why this animosity? The enemy is another herd sent to the place of slaughter by another civilized man, and the animus is to seize the land of others; and the only difference between these two civilized men is that one is the offender and the other the defender, but both sides are cruel and deadly destroyers.

The teachings of spiritual and heavenly-minded men of all the nations of the world prohibit the shedding of human blood and condemn the murderer to death; but this civilized man, on the one hand, signs the order for the universal slaughter of his own kind and tries in all possible ways to put an end to the human race, while, on the other hand, he kneels in temples and mentions the name of God in great humility, and asks His help in exterminating his fellow-men and begs Him for victory and triumph.

It is thus that affairs are conducted in the name of the king, regent, governor; and when they are done in the name of the subject, the actions and dispositions are still more surprising and maddening. Millions of educated young men go to the place of execution like senseless sheep. They do not even ask the question: "What are we going for? Why should we be killed? Why should we kill our brethren?" They appear as if they had no will, their only stimulus being the words of those civilized chiefs; and for the sake of one such word they relinquish property, wife and children, to sacrifice their lives for the greed of possessing the land of others.

They hasten to the arena where the only mattress and pillow is the ground and the only cover is the canopy of heaven, where their nourishment is often limited to a little bread and water, and there is no other hope in their despairing hearts except the anticipation of death. They go to roll thousands of their own kind in dust and blood, and they attain in death an excess of ecstasy, as if they had revived some one.

Behold the success of the wisdom of this century! Is this the boasted civilization of Europe, upon which our eyes, the eyes of all of Asia, have been gazing with longing? Is this the ultimate result of the science and wisdom of Europe? The emperors and rulers of the Christian world named the former Sultan, Abdul Hamid, "The King of Blood," and proclaimed themselves as the pure mirror of Christ. These are the civilized Christians of the world, who look upon the Mussulman as a murderer and barbarian, and who call themselves the supporters of Christ's teachings and the spreaders of Christian morals!

Let these civilized men act as they please, even murder one another; but while doing so, it is not reverent that they should call upon the Name of the Almighty, the Powerful. He who detests the odor of blood is far distant from the cruel and selfish.

The true civilization and the real humanity, which is the source of the well-being, comfort, and peace of the human kind, depends upon following the teachings and the holy commands of the Almighty God, and everything outside of this means destruction and extinction, as you are now witnessing.

AN INDIAN'S REBUKE.*

Some expressions of Thomas Duk, of Brothertown, taken down by a Friend who visited that tribe of Indians in the year 1811.

"He said he did not often open his mind to any on this subject, but he felt the way open. Some years ago it was laid upon me to encourage others to do good. I thought I was a poor, ignorant Indian, I could not encourage others, so I shoved it away, but it was brought back and laid upon me again, then I shoved it away again several times. It was then opened to my mind that the truth was a very precious thing, very precious indeed. Oh, how very precious did it look to me, words cannot say half. I then said, like Peter, 'Depart from me, O Lord, for I am sinful;' but it was brought back and laid upon me again.

"So one morning, as I was going to the Presbyteriam meeting, I saw a flock of sheep before me, the foremost were fat and large; and I heard them say to one another (but not with these ears): 'Godspeed help you on the way.' But the hindmost looked poor and small, their heads hung down, they seemed most ready to give up. I wondered what it meant. Then something come and talk with me here (putting his hand upon his breast) and tell me these my sheep; this day you shall see them lift up their heads in hope, and feed on the bread of life.

*EDITOR OF THE FRIEND:—The foregoing is taken from an old manuscript of a relative now long deceased, and I thought that it might be of interest and perhaps a help to some, portraying as it does, the vital necessity of a close watch for the true spiritual inspiration.

WILLIAM MARTIN.

ATLANTIC CITY.

"Then it said to me, Them that are before are the priests and deacons, they are full and fat, and can encourage one another, but they forget the poor of the flock. So when I got to the meeting, the priest preached, prayed and sung, and said the very words I heard the fat sheep talk. After he had done, I thought I must tell them what I saw on the way, so I did and I thought I saw the vision fulfilled, that the poor of the flock did lift up their heads in hope, and fed on the Bread of Life. The priest say to the people that what I say was true, though I be poor, ignorant Indian. Then I went home so comfortable, oh, how comfortable I feel. Then sometimes I feel to come, I want to go see them. I 'fraid, I don't want folks to think I encourage others. I think so about poor family, so I think I'll take grist on my back and go to mill and so stop in, it being just in the road, I 'spose he let me sleep in his bed, but I rather lay by poor man's fire, so in the morning when I was going away, I ask the woman for a bowl, she was unwilling. I told her she must, so I left her part of my meal; I felt the wants of the poor children, and I dare not carry all my meal away. Then I go home quiet. So I kept along, when I feel my mind in sympathy with any I try go see them, and I begin to think I do pretty well. So one day I began to think I should go to meeting in two or three days, and what I shall say when I come there. So I thought it over and got something fixed in my mind. I thought it would do pretty well, so I hung it up, and by and by I took it down and looked at it again, and think it do pretty well, and so I did a good many times before meeting-day come. I went to meeting, and after the priest was done, I stood up and said it off as well as I could and thought I said it pretty well. I went home, but, oh, how I was troubled. I did not know what was the matter. So I lived along, being much troubled and I thought sure enough, I am mistaken. I have never known what good is. Oh, how I was distressed to know how to find good. Then it was said to me, suppose some of your neighbors have a piece of meat given to him, a very good piece when he gave it to him, he take it up, feel of it, hang it up. By and by, he takes it down, handles it, looks at it, and hangs it up again. So do a great many times, and keep it till it is too old, then he take it and cook it and set it before you to eat; would you eat it? No, said I, I would not eat it. Then it say to me, so was your preaching t'other day. The folks wont have it, Good Spirit, neither."

HOW TO SPELL POTATO.—"Gheaphtheightteough." Can you pronounce it? According to common English modes of spelling, the conglomeration pictured above spells potato. It is derived as follows:

- P like gh in hiccough.
- O like eau in beau.
- T like phth in phthisis.
- A like eigh in weigh.
- T like tte in gazette.
- O like ough in though.

This was one of the interesting points brought out in the questionnaire by Professor Dewitt Croissant at the spelling conference held at Chautauqua.

[NOTE.—The outlines of this story are recorded in Pike's Historical Anecdotes. If any reader of the F. Q. E. can supply further details of the visit of the Indians to Easton Meeting-house in 1775, or of Zebulon Hoxie and his visitor Robert Nisbet, I shall be glad to know where they are to be found.—L. VIOLET HODGKIN.]

FIERCE FEATHERS.—(A Story for Children)—The sunlight lay in patches on the steep roof of the meeting-house of Easton Township, in the County of Saratoga, in the State of New York. It was a bright summer morning in the year 1775. The children of Easton Township liked their wooden house, although it was made only of rough hewn logs, nailed hastily together in order to provide some sort of shelter for the worshipping Friends. They would not, if they could, have exchanged it for one of the more stately meeting-houses at home in England, on the other side of the Atlantic. There, the windows were generally high up in the walls. English children could see nothing through the panes but a peep of sky, or the topmost branches of a tall tree. When they grew tired of looking in the branches of the tree for an invisible nest, there was nothing more to be hoped for, out of those windows. The children's eyes came back inside the room again, as they watched the slow shadows creep along the white-washed walls, or tried to count the flies upon the ceiling. But out here in America there was no need for that. The new meeting-house of Easton had nearly as many possibilities as the new world outside. To begin with, its logs did not fit quite close together. If a boy or girl happened to be sitting in the corner seat, he or she could often see, through a chink, right out into the woods. For the untamed wilderness still stretched away on all sides round the newly-cleared settlement of Easton.

Moreover, there were no windows in the log house as yet, though open spaces had been left for them. Another larger, open space at one end of the building would be closed by a door when the next cold weather came. At present the summer air met no hindrance as it blew in softly, laden with the fragrant scents of the flowers and pine trees, stirring the children's hair as it lightly passed. Every now and then a drowsy bee would come blundering in by mistake, and after buzzing about for some time among the assembled Friends, he would make his perilous way out again through one of the chinks between the logs. The children, as they sat in meeting, always hoped that a butterfly might also find its way in, some fine day—before the winter came, and before the window spaces of the new meeting-house had to be filled with glass, and a door fastened at the end of the room to keep out the cold. Especially on a mid-week meeting like to-day, they often found it difficult to "think meeting thoughts" in the silence, or even to attend to what was being said, so busy were they, watching for the entrance of that long desired butterfly.

For children thought about very much the same kind of things, and had very much the same kind of difficulties in meeting, then as now; even though the place was far away, and it is more than a hundred years since that sunny morning in Easton Township, when the sunlight lay in patches on the roof.

It was not only the children who found silent worship difficult that still summer morning. There were traces of anxiety on the faces of many Friends and even on the placid countenances of the Elders in their raised seats in the gallery. There, at the head of the meeting, sat Friend Zebulon Hoxie, the grandfather of most of the children who were present. Below him sat his two sons. Opposite them, their wives and families, and a sprinkling of other Friends. The children had never seen before one of the stranger Friends who sat in the gallery that day, by their grandfather's side. They had heard that his name was Robert Nisbet, and that he had just arrived, after having walked for two days, thirty miles through the wilderness country to sit with Friends at New Easton at their mid-week meeting. The children had no idea why he had come, so they fixed their eyes intently on the stranger and stirred gently in their seats with relief, when at last he rose to speak. They had liked his kind, open face as soon as they saw it. They liked even better the sound of the rich, clear voice that made it easy for even children to listen. But they liked the words of his text best of all: "The Beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by Him. He shall cover them all the day long."

Robert Nisbet lingered over the first words of his message as if they were dear to him. His voice was full and mellow, and the words seemed as if they were part of the rich tide of summer life that flowed around. He paused a moment, and then went on, "And now, how shall the Beloved of the Lord be thus in safety covered? Even as saith the Psalmist, 'He shall cover thee with his feathers and under his wings shalt thou trust.'" Then, changing his tones a little and speaking more lightly, though gravely still, he continued: "You have done well, dear Friends, to stay on valiantly in your homes, when all your neighbors have fled; and therefore are these messages sent to you by me. These promises of covering and of shelter are truly meant for you. Make them your own and you shall not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day."

Here the boys and girls on the low benches under the gallery looked at one another. Now they knew what had brought the stranger! He had come because he had heard of the danger that threatened the little clearing of settlers in the woods. For it was just before the outbreak of the Revolutionary War of 1775. The part of the county in which Easton Township was situated was so much distressed by visits from scouting parties from both British and American armies that the American Government, unable to protect the inhabitants, had issued a proclamation directing them all to leave the country. That was the reason the scattered houses in the township were deserted, save only the few tenanted by the handful of Friends.

"You did well, Friends," the speaker continued, "well to ask to be permitted to exercise your own judgment, without blame to the authorities, well to say to them in all courtesy and charity, 'You are clear of us in that you have warned us'—and to stay on in your dwellings and to carry out your accustomed work. The report of this your courage and faith hath reached us in our abiding place at East Hoosach, and the Lord hath charged me to come on foot through the wilderness country these thirty miles, to meet with you to-day, and to bear to you these two messages from Him, 'The Beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by Him,' and 'He shall cover thee with his feathers all the day long.'"

The visitor sat down again in his seat. The furrowed line of anxiety in old Zebulon Hoxie's high forehead smoothed itself away; the eyes of one or two of the younger women Friends filled with tears. As the speaker's voice ceased, little Susannah Hoxie's head, which had been drooping lower and lower, finally found a resting place, and was encircled by her mother's arm. The young mother drew off her small daughter's shady hat, and put it on the seat beside her, while she very gently stroked back the golden curls from the child's high forehead. In doing this she caught a rebuking glance from her elder daughter, Dinah.

"Naughty, naughty Susie, to go to sleep in meeting," Dinah was thinking, "it is very hot, and I am sleepy too, but I don't go to sleep. I do wish a butterfly would come in at the window just for once—or a bird, a little bird with blue, and red, and pink, and yellow feathers. I liked what that stranger Friend said about being 'covered with feathers all the day long.' I wish I was all covered with feathers like a little bird. I wish there were feathers in meeting, or anywhere close outside." She turned in her corner seat and looked through the slit in the wall—why there were feathers close outside the wall of the house, red, and yellow, and blue, and pink! What could they be? Very gently Dinah moved her head, so that her eye came closer to the slit. But, when she looked again, the feathers had mysteriously disappeared—nothing was to be seen now but a slight trembling of the tree branches in the wilderness woods at a little distance.

In the meanwhile her brother, Benjamin Hoxie, on the other low seat opposite the window, was also thinking of the stranger's sermon. "He said it was a valiant thing to do, to stop on here when all the neighbors have left. I didn't know Friends could do valiant things. I thought only soldiers were valiant. But if a scouting party really did come—if those English scouts suddenly appeared, then even a Quaker boy might have a chance to show that he is not necessarily a coward because he does not fight." Benjamin's eyes strayed also out of the open window. It was very hot and still in the meeting-house. Yet the bushes certainly were trembling. How strange that there should be a breeze there and not here! "How shalt not be afraid for the arrow that flieth by day," he thought to himself. "Well, there are no arrows in this part of the country any longer, now that they say all the Indians have left. I wonder, if I saw an English gun pointing at me out of those bushes, should I be afraid?"

(To be concluded.)

CORRESPONDENCE.

We were lately much interested in an article in The Chicago Live Stock World—a market paper—it was evidently a sermon by Edwin T. Snell on "Prayer and the Practice of Silence," parts of which were so much in accordance with Friends' views that it seemed refreshing to know that the need of an inward seeking was being advocated among others. Will copy one paragraph from the article, viz.: "Couldn't we arrange our affairs so that there should be more of these quiet spaces, more of these times when we are simply listening? No steamship of any consequence now sails the sea that does not have its listening chamber where day and night one sits to pick up any messages that may come out of the vast solitudes of the sea. And they do come. Shall we, too, not have listening chambers, so that God can reach us? But nothing is clearer to me than that all this must be planned for, no less carefully than it is planned for on these ships that sail the sea. It is not an accident that one is in fellowship with the enveloping world and another is not, in case of ships. Neither is it in the case of souls. As Jesus here in our text (Matt. vi: 5-7) implies, we must plan these retreats for the soul, and we must patiently practice them. No mastery is so difficult as the soul mastery which achieves the power of shutting off the outward things in order to listen to the still, small voice."—From E. T. SNELL.

What urgent need there is, in this day, amid "the noises and voices" and thunders, too, we might say, to turn to that path "which no fowl knoweth," in faith that there is a way for mankind to be led safely along trusting in the leadership (not of ourselves) of One "who was never foiled in battle," and no need for man to lift a hand against his fellow-man.

In sincerity thy friend,

IRENE SMITH.

Dear Friends:—

I enclose my subscription for THE FRIEND for the new volume. . . . I find myself definitely counting on something worth while in it each week as I open the new copy. The reports of London Yearly Meeting have indicated such a depth and a grasp on the part of English Friends that I am sorry the "extracts" have come to an end. The General Epistle makes it clear that they are coming out from the stress and press of the war with the realities of Christianity simpler and clearer than perhaps ever before. And yet,—even the Friends over there (much less here) are not able to shape up what people like to call the Quaker message for the world at war. Possibly we are not yet ripe for it and I hope we shall be willing to let the fruit ripen in His good time, rather than fret ourselves to hand out to the world something that is still partly green and that can be of use to nobody. I like, too, Horace G. Alexander's thought (on page 28) that political action, memorials, etc., etc., are not, in the main, the things which require our attention, "but something much deeper; we could begin to follow in the path of absolute sacrifice of self."

TOKYO, Japan, Seventh Month 14, 1916.

Dear Friend:—

I am enclosing a sheet containing something about the poet Tagore which might be worth publishing in THE FRIEND, at least the part that Tagore said about Friends. I am also enclosing a couple of mimeographed sheets of selections from various magazines, papers, etc. They will notice there is one selection from THE FRIEND, and there were others from THE FRIEND on the subject of "Preparedness" which I have not put in because it would overweight the letter. We have just sent 200 sets of these sheets (four in all) out to missionaries in Japan. We have long had the feeling that something of a deeper nature should be done in the way of peace work among foreigners here, and have found a fine response. It is our intention to get out a little folder made up of selections from anything we can lay our hands on, to be sent out once every three months, for the purpose of strengthening those who already see as we do on this matter and of showing others the light as we see it.

I suppose it is all right for us to take clippings from THE FRIEND and these other papers; but in addition to this we are writing to a number of Friends all over the world asking them to help us in this work by sending clippings from papers, other than Friends and peace magazines, which would be suitable to put in such a little folder. If thee happens to see something like this I wish thee would send it on.

We certainly do appreciate THE FRIEND our here and all look forward to its coming with pleasure.

Thine very sincerely,

HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

THE PEACE AND SOCIAL SERVICE COMMITTEE; JAPAN FRIENDS' MISSION. RABINDRANATH TAGORE AND FRIENDS.—The Indian poet, Tagore, gave two lectures to the Japanese people, both of which members of the Friends' Mission heard. They were so impressed with his messages emphasizing faith in the spiritual as contrasted with the material, that they felt it right to send him a letter expressing their feeling of kinship to the spirit the poet had shown in these lectures. Tagore's reply to this letter will be of interest to Friends everywhere.

In order to better understand the correspondence it might be well to quote selections from the Friends' letter, as follows:

"Dear Friend:—

As indicated below, this letter of greeting is written in the name of the Peace and Social Service Committee of the Friends' Mission in Japan, which works in co-operation with members of the Religious Society of Friends resident in and near Philadelphia."

(Paragraph showing how Friends have always emphasized the power of spiritual forces and lived accordingly. George Fox, Penn, Woolman and Elizabeth Fry mentioned as examples.)

"And it is this same spirit of world-wide brotherhood that is even now strengthening many English Friends to endure imprisonment and punishment rather than join in the European war; and turning others to works of love for those made destitute by the terrible calamity. Also in America, Friends are earnestly working to check the campaign on behalf of militarism and to further the cause of peace and faith in the spiritual.

"These facts are mentioned only to show why we, as Friends, were so deeply impressed on hearing the two lectures. We venture to express the hope that while in America they may be given in many great centers. America seems to stand at the parting of the ways, being urged on by many propagandists in the pathway of military preparedness and destruction; while the more spiritual elements are zealously working for the coming of the Kingdom of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.

GILBERT BOWLES, Chairman."

TOKYO, Seventh Month 4, 1916.

To which Tagore answered a few days later:

YOKOHAMA, July 7th.

"Dear Friend:—

"I thank you for your letter of friendship and for the appreciation you express of the message I have attempted to give in my two lectures. It is helpful to me to know that there are so many who feel as I do on the subject of war and the dangers of the present materialistic tendencies of the age.

"There has always seemed to me to be a kinship between the spirit of the Society of Friends and the spirit of the East, and I am glad to find that there are Friends in this country who are standing for the ideals which have always been precious to the members of your Society.

"Thanking you again, I remain yours faithfully,

RABINDRANATH TAGORE."

NEWS ITEMS.

FRIENDS IN PENNSYLVANIA.—The Playgrounds Association of Philadelphia, says "Peggy Shippen," in the Public Ledger, has just obtained permission from the Society of Friends to open a new rest centre on a plot of ground in the rear of the old Friends' Meeting-house at Fourth and Arch Streets.

The shade trees and the long grass are delightful to look at, and statistics are being gathered with regard to the congestion of the population in the district. It is this, I am told, that brought about the interest which the Society of Friends has taken in the subject, and the ground it is understood has been assigned to be used not as a playground but as a rest centre.

It seems that a great many interments have been made on this ground. Therefore the Society of Friends cannot allow it to be used as a playground, as this must entail cutting up the surface of the soil, which naturally is entirely out of the question.

Certainly the example of the Society of Friends should be an inspiration to others. Already, in the first six days after the opening of the Fourth and Arch Streets plot of ground, nearly 350 visitors have been admitted. The ground is open from 9 A. M. to 6.30 P. M. and the superintendent, who is a trained and experienced kindergarten, is really to teach children how to play, how to utilize their time to advantage to themselves, as well as how to read.

All this is in addition to the real purpose of the undertaking, which is to give a good makeshift to the people whose homes in the old and congested parts of the city do not supply them with as much fresh air as we all are agreed to-day is necessary for the well-being of man. By utilizing the existing resources of the city in this particular, instead of allowing them to remain idle, those in charge are working on good economic principles.

Under proper supervision such putting to use of these old open spaces around the churches can do no harm. Creating new recreation parks and rest centres wherever needed will take time, as it will require funds and considerable business adjustments. But meantime, if church-yards could be left open and turned into breathing spaces for the people, much benefit and immense comfort must be derived from a perfectly simple measure which can be carried out at once with very small expenditure.

HENRY FERRIS editorially writes in a recent issue of the Intelligencer: OPENING MEETING-HOUSE GROUNDS.—The action of Orthodox Friends of Philadelphia in permitting the use of the meeting-house grounds at Fourth and Arch as a "rest centre" brings up again the question of permitting similar use of the grounds of Race Street and our other meeting-houses.

In nearly all forms of work for others, in helping the colored schools, the Belgians, the Armenians, the "war victims," almost the first thing needed is money; and if we cannot give money, we can often help very little. But when it is a question simply of allowing others to use grounds or buildings that are partly or wholly unused, the matter of expense hardly enters into consideration. We have simply to decide whether we will let our meeting-houses and grounds be used.

It is true that some windows may be broken and some bare spots worn in the grass-plots, where the children play; but a few dollars will repair such damages—and suppose that even a few tired mothers were rested, or that a few weak babies were helped through their "second summer" by our willingness to sacrifice our grass and the paint on our shutters, would it not pay?

There are few things that seem to me more incongruous than closed meeting-houses and school-houses, with high walls or fences to keep people out and protect the grass and the window-panes. Let these be cared for, of course, as well as may be; but for what does a religious society exist, with all its buildings and property, if not to do all that it can to help men, women and children?

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—All schools, public, private and parochial, in Philadelphia, as well as in all the rest of the State of Pennsylvania, will remain closed, as a measure against the spread of infantile paralysis, until Ninth Month 18th, under an order issued in Harrisburg by Dr. Samuel G. Dixon, State Commissioner of Health.

No girl with an ultrafashionable wardrobe will be admitted to Swarthmore College when the institution reopens in the autumn. This edict has gone out from Josephine Meeter, dean of women, and Emma Bancroft, chairman of the committee on household arrangements, to the parents of all registered students and to all seniors who intend to return for post-graduate work. It is backed by many of the most prominent women on the college committees and among the alumnae.

New York has become a summer resort in a sense unforeseen by those who emphasized the hot-weather appeal of Broadway and the roof-gardens. For the last six weeks the city has been entertaining close to ten thousand visitors—enough to people fifty good-sized hotels—who came here primarily to work and not to play. They have mostly been registered at Columbia University Summer School.

GENERAL.—Receivership for the Boston and Maine Railroad was asked for in a bill in equity filed in the United States District Court at Boston last week.

The rapid growth of the playground movement is shown by the announcement of plans for the International Recreation Congress, to be held at Grand Rapids, Mich., Tenth Month 2nd to 6th. Among the 20,000 Americans to whom personal invitations to attend have been sent are 7507 professional play leaders employed on 3294 playgrounds in 432 American cities. "Preparedness for peace through play" is announced as the theme of the Congress.

The Seventeenth Annual Session of the National Negro Business League, which was founded by Booker T. Washington, and of which he was the head until his death, was in session at Kansas City last week. The proceedings have already demonstrated that the impetus given by the famous leader was a lasting one. As a concrete bit of evidence it is pointed out that the membership of banks in the League has grown from two in 1900 to 51 at present.

Following up the Conferences on Real Preparedness held in Washington and New York, the promoters of anti-militarism have organized a Committee on Real Preparedness, with a membership of 115, representing twenty-nine States and sixty cities. Amos Pinchot is president of the committee. A series of conferences will be held in Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Kansas City, Des Moines, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Boston, Concord, N. H., Providence, Philadelphia and Baltimore.

Dr. John R. Mott's assurance that the 5,000,000 prisoners of war in the prison camps of Europe are well treated is a welcome word from a competent reporter. He says that all of the countries have welcomed the work of the army Young Men's Christian Association, except Turkey, which as yet the Association has not been permitted to enter.

The vote of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in England to appoint a committee to consider a plan for a federation of the free churches is an event of importance, for it means that the leading Methodist body is not opposed in principle to co-operation with the Baptists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians. The plan does not call for a merger of the free churches, but for closer unity in spirit and, particularly, for co-operation to prevent overlapping.

A letter from Ambassador Jusserand received by Oscar S. Straus in New York said the French Government would permit an $18,000 shipment of drugs and medical supplies to reach Jewish hospitals in Jaffa and Jerusalem. The supplies, purchased by Jewish relief committees, were shipped on the United States collier Sterling and held up at Jaffa.

THE ANNUAL Peace Conference at Pocono Manor, Pa., will be held this year under the auspices of the Yearly Meeting's Committee, on Ninth Month 8th to 10th, inclusive.

The passage by Congress of the much-discussed and disputed Army and Navy Bills with their vast appropriations, has created a new situation which the country has never before faced. What attitude the Peace Societies and the Religious Society of Friends will take in view of these changed conditions is a question of grave importance.

Among the speakers who are expected to take part are Gains G. Atkins, of Providence, R. I.; T. Raeburn White, of Philadelphia; George A. Walton, of George School, Pa.; Lucia A. Mead, of Boston, Mass., and Frank Lukens, of Burlington, N. J.

The presence of many who are not Friends, both in the audience and on the program, promises to be a significant feature of the Conference. Friends from Buck Hill Falls and Pocono Lake Preserve are also expected to be in attendance.

OWING to the recent postal regulations in England, the Friends' periodicals have been delayed, and I should appreciate it if they would have some notice put in THE FRIEND so that the subscribers to the English papers may know the cause of the delay. The notice in regard to Postal Censorship is as follows:

"Newspapers, magazines, books and other printed publications, stamp collections, sheets or cards of stamps, stamp samples, etc., can only be forwarded to neutral European or American countries and Portugal if despatched from the office of a publisher, news agent, bookseller or dealer who has received from the War Office the official permission necessary for this purpose."

The publishers are trying to make arrangements whereby they may be allowed to send the copies. If, however, The Friend (London), The Quarterly Examiner, The Journal of Friends' Historical Society and Friends' Fellowship Papers are delayed, their subscribers will no doubt consider this new regulation as sufficient explanation.

Thanking thee if thee can inform these subscribers through the means of your pages,

TREASURES OF DARKNESS.

"I will give thee the treasures of darkness" was the promise made to Cyrus as he drew near to Babylon to execute the Divine judgment upon it. Doubtless, the primary reference is to Babylon's treasures, kept under lock and key in dark vaults or buried in the earth for safe-keeping.

Darkness has its treasures as well as the light. "Truly the light is sweet, and it is a pleasant thing for the eye to behold the sun"; but when darkness overspreads the earth after the setting of the sun, the stars appear to cheer the traveler on his lonely way. The light reveals much but conceals much also. It takes the darkness to bring out the stars.

There are treasures of darkness in earth and sea as well as in the sky. There is bottled up sunlight in dark coal-mines, hidden away for countless ages, waiting for the pick and shovel of the miner to bring it forth for our use. There are silver veins and gold dust and precious gems buried in the darkness mixed with dross and clay.

And what is true of the material world is true of the moral and the spiritual; there are rich treasures of darkness there also.

There is, for instance, the darkness of moral failure. Simon Peter had to enter it, and there discovered the treasure of the dependableness of the heart of Christ, when he had learned by bitter defeat to distrust his own heart, with its treacherous quicksands of high emotion so soon followed by the inevitable reaction of a fall.

There is also the darkness of adversity and but few have escaped it. There may be the loss of property, the fruit of a lifetime's toil destroyed in a day. This present calamitous war has brought this darkness into the lives of hundreds of thousands in the war zone. But how often has the darkness of adversity yielded the treasures of spiritual wealth! The darkness of sorrow may be the very shadow of the Almighty. How many have obtained clearer vision therein, finding more help and comfort in communion with God and making a new discovery of their before neglected Bible.

Sooner or later all must enter the mysterious darkness of death. It seems all loss and calamity to the natural mind. But to the Christian, the man who can say: "For me to live is Christ," death wears a different face. He can add: "And to die is gain." The darkness of death contains the treasures of release from the limitations and bondage of perishing clay, to know the blessed expandings of a regenerated spirit in its own holy and happy fatherland.

The Cross of our blessed-Saviour is the Key to the problem of darkness as to every other in the moral and spiritual realm. For that Cross was deepest gloom and shame, loneliness and pain, nakedness and thirst, wormwood and gall, to the Lord of Life and Glory. But what treasures have come out and are still coming out of that darkness! To those who believe is granted an unveiling of the Cross, even as with the two on the way to Emmaus, when the Risen Lord opened the ancient Scripture and showed them that what they had called defeat was really victory, that the darkness of Calvary was full of glory.

It is possible to pass through the darkness and feel the darkness only. The wise man is he who is careful to remember that there is the treasure in every dark experience of life. That the darkness and the light are both alike to God, that "He dwelleth in the thick darkness," as Solomon confessed, as much as "covering Himself with light as with a garment," as David sung: "That the night has its teachings as well as the day;" and that "Ye are not come unto darkness" as God's last word, but that as it was in the beginning so now, "and it was evening," deepening into midnight, "and it was morning," brightening into perfect day.

And when at last that morning, of which every morning of our lives is a type, a prophecy and a pledge, that "morning without clouds" dawns upon our wondering eyes, it will be all the brighter for the treasures we found in the darkness that sometimes fell upon our pilgrim path.

MAX I. REICH.

OUR GETHSEMANE.

There comes to each of us, through Grace, an experience designed to bring us into closer and more real relationship with our loving Lord, into a more feeling fellowship in His life and Spirit so that we may realize what it is to "live in Christ" and "walk in Him;" an experience to bring us into fellowship with what He in his capacity as Our Redeemer did for us. We will then know better than ever before the deep meaning of that agony of tears through the long dark night when He poured out His soul in suffering and service in the very shadow of the cross, in meek and glorious submission to the Father's will.

As we thus come into vital fellowship, and look abroad over this fair world, we shall know something of the cost of those bitter tears He wept over Jerusalem and of the last pleading prayer—"Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

Having thus learned, in our human measure, how to serve by suffering, we will look around us and most feelingly pour out the prayer, "How long, oh Lord, how long." And in our night of suffering we will look up to the Helper of the helpless and find fellowship and peace. And though our human hearts may shrink from the bitter cup, and we may be almost ready to say,

"Oh! for the blessed leave to creep under the cool and quiet sod,

Into the sleep so long and deep, which falls on the weary eyes from God," yet life and love, hope and joy reach out their beckoning invitation to glorious fields "white to harvest," and our spirits rise and we come into glorious fellowship with our crucified Lord and are ready to say with Him: "Nevertheless not as I will but as thou wilt." Notwithstanding our human infirmities we shall then feel the healing touch of the seamless robe, and again take with joy our part in that warfare as victors, knowing no defeat and resting only when the prize at the end of the race is attained.

Having learned something of the real fellowship of suffering, and with the great apostle known what it is in our human measure to be "crucified with Christ," we shall be the better prepared to finish our work with joy—the ministry which we have received of the "Lord Jesus to testify to the Gospel of the Grace of God."

SPECIAL LONDON MINUTES.

The following have been extracted from the Minutes of the late London Yearly Meeting and have been commended to the special consideration of Friends.

38. In reviewing the present situation with special reference to the position created by the Military Service Acts, we have recognized how very varied are the forms which our advocacy of Peace and our witness for liberty of conscience may take.

While some feel it right to undertake some form of service deemed by the Tribunals to be of "national importance," others are led to refuse alternative service of any kind, maintaining that in their accustomed work, and in the spread of Peace principles, they are making their best offering to the nation. Appreciating this diversity of interpretation, we record our thankfulness for all who follow the Truth as they are able to apprehend it.

We have listened to accounts of the treatment of some conscientious objectors. While we believe that these men are ready to suffer gladly for the Truth and count it an honor to do so, we desire to express to them and their families our warm sympathy, and we ask Friends to do what they can to extend to them their support and spiritual encouragement.

We trust that their stand will be made widely known, and that it will go far to preserve that liberty of conscience, the present menace to which is so dark a stain upon our country.

43. We have realized as perhaps never before, that the duty before us now is to humble ourselves in the presence of God and to wait that He may reveal Himself. May we not believe that, as we thus wait, He whose foolishness is wiser and whose weakness is stronger than men, may make us partakers of His wisdom and strength. It is the time for man to be silent and for God to speak.

There is need to be patient, to possess our souls, to wait for the Divine Call. But this waiting is not to be aimless, hopeless waiting, but is to be vigilant and prayerful, in the belief that, in God's good time, guidance will come, and the next step will be made clear. And, as we thus wait, when the call is heard and the light is seen, even though they point to the path of pain and reproach, we shall be able to answer gladly, and fearlessly to go forward.

89. Our attention has been drawn to the urgent need for seeing that the principles we enunciate in regard to war between nations are allowed to govern all our relationships in daily life. We need an applied Christianity which shall be supreme, and by which we shall order our lives instead of ordering them by the standard of custom or the dictates of personal convenience.

90. We urge Friends not to feel that our work is done. We must continue the quest. We must pray, think, study, wait, suffer. Day by day we must seek to re-consecrate ourselves to God, that so the life of Jesus Christ may be manifested, and His great reconciling work carried further and yet further among men.

This is our truest service.

It may be that some further duty may be laid upon one individual or another. If such a call be given, we hope that Friends will be quick to respond to it, and we recommend such Friends to appeal for the sympathy of their Monthly Meetings, using the avenue to service which is open to them in the system of liberation by Monthly Meetings.

139. In view of the Military Service Act, No. 3, which has just been passed, we re-affirm our entire opposition to Compulsory Military Service and our desire for the repeal of the Acts.

143. In bringing this Yearly Meeting to a close, we have again to acknowledge the good hand of our God upon us.

Last year, and in the adjourned Yearly Meeting in First Month, we examined in the light of recent events our ancient testimonies, especially that in regard to Peace, and were able to re-affirm them unhesitatingly.

This year we have tried to discover and be faithful to the implications of these testimonies.

It has at times seemed as though we were groping in the dark, as though there were no clear path for us to follow. But, as we watched and waited, guidance has come and we have been able to move forward. There is much more light to break forth for us. Let us be faithful to that which is given and tarry and pray, believing that it will grow ever brighter and brighter. As we thus place ourselves in God's hands waiting to receive, and ready to flash out His light, He may condescend to use us as His heralds, and give to us some word for the healing of the nations. Should He thus honor us—let us ever remember that the excellency of the power is of God, for of Him and through Him and to Him are all things, to Whom be the glory for ever. Amen.

THE DAY'S WORK.

Fierce was the heat in field and street,
And I turned my longing eyes
To a mountain fair and felt that there
Was an earthly paradise.

The work begun I left undone,
And went to the cooling rest,
In unearned ease 'mid scenes that please,
I sat me down to rest.

But as my gaze pierced the mellow haze,
That over the valley lay,
And I saw a throng, with spirits strong,
Doing the work of the day.

Unto me came a sense of shame,
As the breezes came and went,
Though they cooled my brow I was hapless now,
For my soul was not content.

It is wrong, said I, to idly lie
At ease in this cool retreat,
While brave hearts strive in the human hive
To win the bread and the meat.

My rest shall end, I will descend,
No more to falter and shirk,
But bravely to share the labor and care
Of those who do life's work.

Yes, I must toil with those who toil
In the glare of the scorching sun,
If I would rest with the brave and blest,
When the long day's work is done.

THE NAVAL BILL HOLDS AN OLIVE BRANCH.

[I enclose a clipping from The Evening Post (N. Y.) of Eighth Month 22nd, which seems to me to publish the most important bit of news which has come to us for a long time—the incorporation in the Navy Appropriation Bill of a committal of our Government to the policy of reduction of armaments and an invitation to the nations for a conference on the subject at the conclusion of the great war. I give this expression of my feeling, without in any degree abating my conviction, that for Friends—and all other consistent professors of the cause for which Christ came to the earth—the use of an army or navy even as prescribed in the articles of the League to Enforce Peace is inadmissible.—JOHN B. GARRETT.]

This year's naval appropriation—the largest in the history of the United States—not only may be the last of such size ever to be expended for armament, but it is entirely possible that much of the money authorized for naval construction may never be spent.

Close examination of the changes made while the naval bill was in conference reveals that the bill as adopted and now ready for President Wilson's signature makes specific provision enabling the President to suspend construction if an international agreement limiting armaments can be effected at the end of the present war.

Nor is the proviso merely the expression of hope; the President is specifically directed to call a conference of nations interested in disarmament. The fight made in the House by Representative Hensley and the small group of men who oppose big armaments ordinarily has been won. These men were willing to agree to large expenditures this year, but wanted the United States to begin as soon as possible a movement toward international disarmament limiting expenditures for naval construction. President Wilson and Secretary Daniels stood with the House conferees in urging the retention of the disarmament provisions, which are to become law in a few days. When a bill gets into conference, as a rule, there are no many changes made that not until the text is finally printed, several days after conference reports are adopted, is it known exactly what has been eliminated or retained.

THE DISARMAMENT PROVISIONS.

The text of the provisions has just become available. They reveal the plan of the Administration to work for international disarmament, and also that big economies might even be effected in the appropriation of 1916 itself. The new paragraphs read as follows:

"Upon the conclusion of the war in Europe, or as soon as it may be done, the President of the United States is authorized to invite all the great governments of the world to send representatives to a conference which shall be charged with the duty of suggesting an organization, a court of arbitration or other body, to which disputed questions between nations shall be referred for adjudication and peaceful settlement and to consider the question of disarmament and submit their recommendations to their respective Governments for approval. The President is hereby authorized to appoint nine citizens of the United States who in his judgment shall be qualified for such duty to be representatives of the United States in such a conference. . . . The President is authorized to fix the compensation of the commissioners. . . . A sum of $200,000 is appropriated to carry into effect this provision.

"If at any time before the appropriations authorized by this act shall have been contracted for there shall have been established, with the co-operation of the United States of America, an international tribunal or tribunals, competent to secure peaceful determination of all international disputes, and which shall render unnecessary the maintenance of competitive armaments, then and in that case such naval expenditures as may be inconsistent with the engagements made in the establishment of such tribunal or tribunals may be suspended when so ordered by the President of the United States."

BINDING UPON THE PRESIDENT.

The above provisions, which will be law in a few days, when President Wilson signs the Naval Appropriation bill of 1916, bind the Chief Executive to a definite step in foreign policy. The viewpoint of the President, according to those who are in his councils, is that as long as there is competitive building, the United States cannot afford to lag behind, cannot fail to take into account that her long coast-lines need naval protection. And having authorized a large naval programme, it is the President's idea that the United States will have a much stronger voice in a conference on international disarmament than would have been the case had the United States entered the discussion with only a small navy to give up.

The Administration is working around to the idea of a League to Enforce Peace, as intimated in one of the speeches of the President last spring. The United States would be willing to put its bulk of force in the arch that would support the peace of the world. Such an arrangement, however, must take into consideration the limitation immediately of naval armaments since this is the most costly item of all. And the Washington Government is preparing to move decisively toward that end as soon as the European war is over. One high official in the confidence of President Wilson is even hopeful that some of the money appropriated this year need never be spent, that an international agreement, if not actually effected, will be so certain of adoption after the preliminary steps of the naval conference are taken that Congress might conceivably limit its appropriations merely to the maintenance of the naval establishment already created.

But even if there is no international agreement on disarmament immediately in sight, there are few people in Congress, Republicans as well as Democrats, who do not now admit that the clamor for preparedness will not be so vocal as soon as the Presidential campaign is over, or when the European war is at an end. The revulsion of feeling against war will be so great, the economic distress of the belligerents so vitally felt, that the danger of war between the United States and any other nation will seem to the average American to have become very remote, indeed. Under such circumstances Congress will be disposed to be guided by the spirit of the conferences on international disarmament, though a definite agreement may not actually be brought about for two or three, or even five, years. International agreements consume much time, especially when they have to be referred to congresses and parliaments for adoption, but if the consensus of opinion at an international conference favors a reduction in armaments it will be difficult for the party in power, whichever one it is, to vote large expenditures of money for naval construction in the light of changing circumstances.

DAVID LAWRENCE.

THE RELIGION OF JESUS.

[The following is a portion of a personal letter written to the editor of the Intelligence and which appeared in a recent issue of that paper.—Eds.]

The highest and most complete revelation of deity and human brotherhood was, as we all know, made by Jesus of Nazareth, and it was the consciousness He had of that supreme relationship which enabled Him to say, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me," that alone can satisfy the deepest longings of the human soul.

The tender companionship of that Divine personality, which is so fittingly called "The Comforter," brings something into our lives which nothing else supplies. The historical record of the outward life of Jesus Christ has proved of incomparable value to mankind, but the knowledge of that record and of the teachings of the Saviour of men has not prevented a large number of His professing followers from sadly neglecting and misinterpreting those teachings.

One of the most important and at the same time difficult experiences in our lives is learning how to harmonize and realize the oneness of the outward and the inward—the intellectual and the spiritual. To the soul which has come wholly into the Divine presence, or seen "the King in His beauty," or felt that eternal embrace of pure love, which encompasses our personality as the air encompasses our bodies, there will be little difficulty in perceiving that the life of our souls is inseparable from the Source of Life. It is to those who have only had a glimpse, as it were, of this fact that I would offer my own experience—which has grown from a dogmatic conception to a heartfelt perception of the Spirit—and this includes sympathetically every faculty of the mind.

We may have excellent ideas and ideals, and they will always accompany true character and "that wisdom which is from above," but the inner impress of heavenly love often draws us to serve our fellow-men in ways that neither they nor we anticipate. Indeed, our heavenly pilgrimage is much like a voyage of discovery—when every day brings a new outlook and fresh opportunities—and we have the most expectant attitude with an inspiring hope of "a better day."

All are not equally capable of receiving and responding to the inmost appeals of the eternal realities—any more than all eyes or ears are equally appreciative of the beauties of life—but as we all have a common "flesh and blood" inheritance, so we all have a common spiritual privilege, based on our kinship to the Infinite. We are all sustained by the same atmosphere day by day, and if we only substitute the Divine tenderness for that firmament we may feel, as well as see, that we are all living by the same eternal goodness.

The conviction of the inwardness of the deepest breath of life is very different from a mental grasp, because the Spirit grasps us, as the sunlight enters our eyes or the air our lungs, and gives us a thrill of joy or health—and both wins and constrains us by its sheer compelling loveliness—whereas our mental grasp is something which we can release or increase at pleasure. "The drawing cords of His love" has a real mystical meaning and fits into the best experience of every sincere soul.

As we grow older, a thousand preferences—and it may be prejudices also—are swept aside by the coming into our hearts of a better spirit than we have sometimes entertained. We feel the forgiving, healing, compassionate nature of Jesus Christ, and see how all that He taught is in perfect harmony with those eternal and universal bonds of brotherhood and fellowship which forbid injuring our fellow-man.

Friends have always put the emphasis on this attitude of heart, which embraces the whole human family. The psychology of the mind is not antagonistic to this normal development of the soul, imbibing the very heart of infinite love, any more than the playfulness of youth prevents the service of maturer years.

What we need most, and what, sooner or later, comes to us, if we are open-minded and open-hearted, is the inexpressible tenderness of a strong and wise companion—one who wishes to share all of life's joys and sorrows with us. This sense of Divine personality with the most human of companionships is to me the necessary focusing of all the spiritual forces in our soul—somehow as our intelligence is the crown of our physical bodies and our free will the evidence of moral responsibility.

We can scarcely imagine love apart from one who loves, so when our spiritual eyes are open we see clearly "Him who first loved us," and the moment we realize our whole soul to be in harmony with the supreme intelligence, oh! then it is that we understand how Jesus said, "I am the way, the truth and the life," because He revealed the highest and the most complete expression of infinite, universal love and because He has come to us as a Divine friend, counselor and comforter. For we see our sin and the need of one who understands all about our difficulties and our wilfulness, and who can and does say, "Thy sins are forgiven thee, go and sin no more"—because of His infinite compassion.

There is nothing arbitrary or dogmatic in this expression of the Fatherhood of God; for those who possess most of the Spirit of Jesus Christ feel how the same Divine tenderness which He manifested in word and act so inimitably has moved human souls from time immemorial, in all nations, to give place to the best constraint of their minds and hearts.

What every one of us needs is to strive earnestly to live in and by virtue of that which not only takes away the occasion of strife, but which keeps the soul out of the reach of words and definitions and mental attacks—so far as they can affect our faith. And here is where we have the message which the world so sadly needs to-day and for which Jesus Christ suffered even unto death that all men might plainly see that service and sacrifice which avails most, and never violates the purest and most heavenly aspirations of every heart.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

JOHN BRIGHT AND WAR.

MARGARET E. HIRST.

When Kossuth visited England, Bright, while joining warmly in the popular welcome, made clear his distrust of any movement for intervention abroad. He wrote to Cobden, at the time, "I am expected to be at the meeting in the Free Trade Hall [Manchester], and to speak. I am in a desperate puzzle what to do, but certainly if I speak I shall go against any notion of fighting for Hungary or any other country. . . . I am very apprehensive that this Hungarian sympathy will breed a spirit which we have hoped was subsiding, and will tend to fill the peoples' heart with pride and self-conceit, and with a notion that it is our mission to become knight errants in the cause of freedom to other nations, whilst we are forgetting how much we have to do at home."

At Edinburgh, in the autumn of 1853, a Peace Congress was held, at which Admiral Sir Charles Napier vigorously expressed the views of the war party. Bright's reply has become a classic, which may be found in any collection of his speeches and read with profit to-day. In it he alluded to the objection that the time was inopportune to speak of peace.

"The right time to oppose the errors and prejudices of the people never comes in the eyes of those writers in the public press who pander to those prejudices. They say: 'We must not do so and so, we shall embarrass the Government.' . . . We wish to protest against the maintenance of great armaments in time of peace. We wish to protest against the spirit which is not only willing for war, but eager for war; and we wish to protest, with all the emphasis of which we are capable, against the mischievous policy pursued so long by this country of interfering with the internal affairs of other countries, and thereby leading to disputes, and often to disastrous wars."

The peroration of the speech was not merely a masterpiece of eloquence, but an appeal to the moral sense of his countrymen.

" . . . You profess to be a Christian nation. You make it your boast even—though boasting is somewhat out of place in such questions—you make it your boast that you are a Protestant people, and that you draw your rule of doctrine and practice, as from a well pure and undefiled, from the living oracles of God and from the direct revelation of the Omnipotent.

" . . . Is this a reality? or is your Christianity a romance? is your profession a dream? No, I am sure that your Christianity is not a romance, and I am equally sure that your profession is not a dream. It is because I believe this that I appeal to you with confidence, and that I have hope and faith in the future. I believe that we shall see, and at no very distant time, sound economic principles spreading much more widely amongst the people; a sense of justice growing up in a soil which hitherto has been deemed unfruitful; and which will be better than all—the Churches of the United Kingdom—the Churches of Britain awaking, as it were, from their slumbers, and girding up their loins to more glorious work, when they shall not only accept and believe in the prophecy, but labor earnestly for its fulfilment, that there shall come a time—a blessed time—a time that shall last forever—when 'nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

The hope at the moment was doomed to disappointment, for the Churches gave no help to the small but weighty minority which opposed the Crimean War. Bright and Cobden were left almost alone, branded as traitors and refused a hearing in the country, though never in the House of Commons. The eloquence of Bright's speeches and letters upon the war was even then frankly admitted, and few are now prepared to controvert his arguments, but eloquence and reason could not save him from execration and defeat. As Gladstone finely said of him, at that crisis he laid his popularity as a sacrifice upon the altar of his duty.

As Dr. Johnson's old friend confided to him that he had tried in his time to be a philosopher, but "cheerfulness was always breaking in," so we may say of Bright's speeches that he tried to be a politician, but Christianity was always breaking in. In the very speech in which he claimed to discuss the war on admitted principles of English policy are two passages which reveal the distance which separated him from many of his countrymen. He had sympathy, he said, for the oppressed everywhere, "but it is not on a question of sympathy that I dare involve this country, or any country in a war which must cost an incalculable amount of treasure and of blood. It is not my duty to make this country the knight-errant of the human race." And, as was his wont, he translated the cost of war into terms of individual and national happiness, a calculation which, half-a-century later, would have drawn upon him the name of "Little Englander."

"I believe if this country, seventy years ago, had adopted the principle of non-intervention in every case where her interests were not directly and obviously assailed, that she would have been saved from much of the pauperism and brutal crimes by which our Government and people have alike been disgraced. This country might have been a garden, every dwelling might have been of marble, and every person who treads its soil might have been sufficiently educated. We should, indeed, have had less of military glory. We might have had neither Trafalgar nor Waterloo; but we should have set the high example of a Christian nation, free in its institutions, courteous and just in its policy towards all foreign states, and resting its policy on the unchangeable foundation of Christian morality."

It was the sense of the desolation and destruction of war, far more than any pain arising from isolation or misunderstanding, that finally broke down Bright's strength and endurance and withdrew him in 1856 from public life. He had in especial measure the emotion Wordsworth described as

"due abhorrence of his guilt.

For whose dire ends tears flow and blood is spilt."

In 1857, a movement was set on foot among Birmingham Radicals to secure Bright for their vacant seat. The one question in doubt was his attitude to the Indian Mutiny, news of which was just then filling England with horror and panic. An urgent telegram to Scotland received a satisfactory reply, which he expanded in his election address. In the latter he said:—

"The success of the insurrection would involve anarchy in India unless some great man, emerging from the chaos, should build up a new empire based on and defended by military power. I am not prepared to defend the steps by which England has obtained dominion in the East, but, looking to the interests of India and of England, I cannot oppose such measures as may be deemed necessary to suppress the existing disorder. To restore order to India is mercy to India, but heavy will be the guilt of our countrymen should we neglect hereafter any measures which would contribute to the welfare of its hundred millions of population. I hope the acts of the Government will be free from that vindictive and sanguinary spirit which is shown in many of the letters which appear in the newspapers, and that when the present crisis is over, all that exists of statesmanship in England will combine to work what good is possible out of so much evil."

To this position he steadily adhered. His Quaker training freed him from the color prejudice so deeply rooted amongst Englishmen, and he condemned in unsparing terms the blind passion of revenge which found vent in barbaric acts in India and wild words at home. Some Friends felt that even this pronouncement was in some degree a surrender to the war spirit, and it was to meet their objection that Bright wrote to Joseph Sturge (in the letter already quoted):—

"Does our friend Southall think our Government should rest quiet and allow every Englishman in India to be murdered? I don't think so. They must act on their principles, seeing they admit no others. I have never advocated the extreme non-resistance principle in public or in private. I don't know whether I would logically maintain it." "Extreme non-resistance" must not, of course, be identified with the peace testimony of the Society of Friends, which is not a mere Tolstoyan withdrawal from evil, but may include a very definite effort to overcome evil with good. But whether Bright exposed himself to criticism from pacifist or from militarist, Birmingham welcomed him gladly and returned him unopposed, even though for some months more he could take no active part in politics. It was not until the autumn of 1858 that he was able to deliver the first of his great addresses to his constituents, which were to be the pride and delight of the city for many years to come.

In the course of this great address he said: "I believe there is no permanent greatness to a nation except it be based upon morality. I do not care for military greatness or military renown. I care for the condition of the people among whom I live. There is no man in England who is less likely to speak irreverently of the Crown and Monarchy of England than I am; but crowns, coronets, mitres, military display, the pomp of war, wide colonies and a huge Empire are, in my view, all trifles light as air and not worth considering unless with them you can have a fair share of comfort, contentment and happiness among the great body of the people. Palaces, baronial castles, great halls, stately mansions, do not make a nation. The nation in every country dwells in the cottage, and unless the light of your Constitution can shine there, unless the beauty of your legislation and the excellence of your statesmanship are impressed there on the feeling and condition of the people, rely upon it you have yet to learn the duties of Government.

"I have not, as you have observed, pleaded that this country should remain without adequate and scientific means of defense. I acknowledge it to be the duty of your statesmen acting upon the known opinions and principles of ninety-nine out of every hundred persons in the country, at all times, with all possible moderation, but with all possible efficiency, to take steps which shall preserve order within and on the confines of your kingdom. But I shall repudiate and denounce the expenditure of every shilling, the engagement of every man, the employment of every ship, which has no object but intermeddling in the affairs of other countries, and endeavoring to extend the boundaries of an Empire which is already large enough to satisfy the greatest ambition, and I fear is much too large for the highest statesmanship to which any man has yet attained."

(To be concluded.)

A GOOD RESOLUTION.—I hereby resolve that I will live honestly and walk uprightly before God and man. I will keep my lips sweet with words of kindness, my heart pure with noble ideals, my hands clean with honorable actions. I will keep my body sacred and my soul free. I will strive to be rich in love, strong in gentleness, untiring in patience, abundant in hope. I will serve God by helping some of His children. I will try always to be better than my word and more liberal than my promise. Every day I will make the most of my time and the best of myself, and so be ready for the opportunities which God daily sends to those who are waiting for them.—R. J. BURDETTE.

THE VOICE.

As I went down the hill I heard
 The laughter of the countryside;
 For, rain being past, the whole land stirred
 With new emotion, like a bride.
 I scarce had left the grassy lane
 When something made me catch my breath:
 A woman called and called again,
 Elizabeth! Elizabeth!

It was my mother's name. A part
 Of wounded memory sprang to tears.
 And the few violets of my heart
 Shook in the wind of happier years.
 Quicker than magic came the face
 That once was sun and moon for me;
 The garden shawl, the cap of lace,
 The collie's head against her knee.

Mother, who findest out a way
 To pass the sentinels and stand
 Behind my chair at close of day,
 To touch me—almost—with thy hand.
 Deep in my breast how sure, how clear.
 The lamp of love burns on till death!—
 How trembles if I chance to hear
 Elizabeth! Elizabeth!

A DAY'S EXPERIENCE IN JAPAN.

Our friend Margaret W. Haines has sent us the following letter, thinking that the freedom used by the writer, who had not thought of its publication, would add to its interest.—EDS.

30 KOUN CHO, Mita, Shiba, Tokyo, 6-14-1916.

Dear Friend.—

This last week I had a most interesting experience when I went up to Shimodate to see some tent meetings. First, there was an hour's ride from here to the railroad station where I took the train. That street car ride is very familiar to me now, for we pass through the Ginza shopping district and by Mitsukoshi's big department store. Later we pass along the broad street leading to Ueno Park, and can see for a long distance the broad flight of steps flanked on either side by lovely trees. At last we pass the park with its shrines set away back among the trees and arrive at Ueno Station. I managed to get my "san to" (third class) ticket safely, walked through the long station with its various class waiting-rooms opening off the central part, and got into the right train without mishap. The car was fairly full, but I managed to find a seat beside a little girl who was sitting with her feet curled up under her on the seat and opposite a young student.

The scenery as we passed through the country was most interesting, for it is wheat harvest and rice planting time. The fields of golden wheat, on ground elevated several feet, stood right next to the paddies, where the newly transplanted rice stood in water. Then there were the beds of seed rice, vividly green in places where it has been too dry to transplant it yet. I love to see the men and women with their great broad hats, standing in the water planting the rice, for they look as if they had walked right out of an old Japanese print. The wheat is cut by hand and then tied to trees bottom side up in order to dry out the sheaf. Between the wheat rows another crop had already been planted and stood flourishing in all its freshness in places where the wheat had been cut, and only the short stubble remained. The ground is certainly not allowed to lie idle in this country.

After a ride of two hours and a half and one change of cars, I reached Shimodate about half past eleven. Watanabe San, Elizabeth Binford's helper, was at the station to meet me, much to my joy. I hadn't sent word what train I was coming on, so I was expecting to take a kuruma (jinrickisha) to the house of our worker in Shimodate. Watanabe San and I walked along with our umbrellas up in the broiling sun, and soon reached our destination. Ouchi San, our worker, lives in a new inexpensive, but fairly roomy, Japanese house, with two rooms upstairs and three and a tiny kitchen downstairs. When there is no furniture in the rooms they look larger than the same rooms would in an American house. Elizabeth Binford was out shopping for materials for her Japanese ladies' foreign cooking class that afternoon. Before long she came in and invited me to go out hunting with her. There are very few shops where fruit or vegetables are sold in this country town of ten thousand or so. It is very different from Tokyo, where there are shops with beautiful fruits of many different kinds in almost every square, and just as many green grocery shops, too, with many familiar and many strange but appetizing looking vegetables. Elizabeth Binford and I managed to find one shop where some withered looking peas were offered for a rather large sum, and some most delicious cucumbers. The latter are most common and much used here; I wonder if they are native. There are also no fish shops in Shimodate such as one finds on every side in Tokyo; in fact, it is a most famine-stricken place as far as variety of food is concerned. Yet there were plenty of dry goods and china shops, and in one place we saw them making fans all by hand for the large sum of three sen (a cent and a half). Indeed, Shimodate is such a prosperous commercial town that it has a very materialistic spirit, and it is a very hard town in which to arouse much interest in religious matters. The Baptists and Episcopalians who also do work there agree with the Friends in saying that.

After we had had a fairly late dinner on the little Japanese table around which we sat on the floor, Elizabeth Binford took a nap to try to make up for a sleepless night among too attentive admirers of a hopping, crawling, biting nature. But I had the good fortune to go around with Gurney Binford on his motorcycle to advertise the evening meeting. He had a great notice mounted on three sides of a frame above the bicycle and side-car. Of course the machine makes a good deal of noise, particularly when it is going slowly. Therefore, as we traveled along the people all came rushing to the fronts of their houses to see what was going on. Then they stood there in various stages of undress watching us go by. The undress, as we would call it, is just their regular summer attire in the country; people do not try to make themselves quite so comfortable in Tokyo. Little boy babies run around in delightfully cool style without the burden of any clothes at all or maybe a short cotton shirt. Wouldn't it be a saving of washing if American mothers could dress their children that way? As the cycle went along all the children in town, it almost seemed, came out and ran along with us. Since we were going very slowly, it gave them a grand feeling to think that they could keep up with a motorcycle. Gurney Binford would go all the way along one street through the shops and then out into the country. I saw one farmer hurrying in from the field to see what all the noise was about. As Japanese farms contain only a few acres, a farm of twelve acres being considered a very large one indeed, it is not very hard for a farmer to soon reach the edge of his premises. Then we would take a cross road and travel through the town on a street parallel to the one we were on before. As soon as we would get back into the town we would find our children waiting for us. Some of the boys and girls who followed us so faithfully I discovered afterwards were some of the First-day school children.

In one place Gurney Binford stopped to let me get out and see a house where they had been raising silk worms. Practically the whole house had been given over to the industry. The family were busy taking the cocoons off the straw which had filled the trays where the silk worms had been living and had made a fine place for them to spin. The great majority of the houses seemed to have been used in the same way. Silk-raising is certainly a great home industry. The next day I went with Elizabeth Binford to a silk-market or rather just stopped at one which was open along the street. We saw them shoveling the cocoons in huge piles, and also taking them out of the oven where they had been baked to destroy the insect inside and prevent its cutting the threads by eating out.

To return to our advertising trip. After we had traveled over all the streets, taken a spin around the school-yard, and run around the pretty little park on top of the hill, we came back to the Ouchi home.

The cooking-class was already beginning. There were not as many women as there had been the day before, for the four or more school teachers had sent word that they could not come on account of a teachers' meeting. However, the wife of the head man or official of the district was there, and some other very nice-looking ladies. They sat on the floor and watched Elizabeth Binford demonstrate. This day she was teaching them to make a salad of salmon jelly, peas and potatoes. She has a cook-book of her own make, which gives recipes in both English and Japanese. The ladies have both the books and the demonstration. While the peas were cooking there was a chance for a Bible lesson. Elizabeth Binford asked me to give this and have Watanabe San translate. We had a lesson on Lydia. Afterwards E. B. explained more fully how Lydia was the first Christian in Europe. So often people think that Christianity originated in the countries from which it comes to Japan.

After the cooking class was over, E. B. and I took the extra dishes of the salad to the people who had sent word they could not be there. The lessons were being given several days in succession, and they were paying for the course, just for the materials, of course. We visited the homes of two school teachers, great big farmhouses, at least they are large according to Japanese standards, and very old, too. We also stopped at two merchants' homes.

After supper we started off to the tent. It was crowded with children when we got there at eight o'clock. First the children sang hymns and then Watanabe San talked to them for about forty minutes about the story of David. The three hundred children listened very attentively, and all around the edge of the tent rows of grown-ups were listening too. At nine o'clock the children were told that they could go if they wanted to, and the older people were invited to come in and take the seats. But the children, many of them, seemed loath to leave and the grown-ups seemed equally loath to come in where they would be seen, so not very many changes were made. Suzuki San, our worker from Isioka, then talked to the people. Some of the little people stayed all through the meeting, and people were standing three rows deep outside. There must have been at least four hundred people there. One adult who came and sat down was the Viscount (I have forgotten his name), who used to be the feudal lord of all this region, but who was given this title when the feudal system was abolished. He gave in his name as an inquirer at the end of the meeting, and so did several other people.

It was nearly eleven o'clock when we finally left the tent. Before long we were all ready for bed on the floor. With mosquito nets over us and a plentiful amount of flea scare powder in our beds, Watanabe San and I managed to pass a fairly comfortable night.

The next morning the regular First-day school of about forty children came to Ouchi San's house, and afterwards the Viscount arrived with his pretty little daughter. He was dressed very finely in foreign clothes with gray trousers and a black coat, and looked very uncomfortably hot. After meeting, in which Suzuki San, as Elizabeth Binford said, preached the straight Gospel, so that the Viscount will at least hear it once in his life, we chatted for a little while and then the Viscount departed. Afterwards he sent word inviting us to come to his house to afternoon tea. Gurney Binford had gone back to Mito for his Bible class and to attend meetings at Minato and Mihama, I think. But Elizabeth Binford, Watanabe San and I went to his home. We found it a pleasant Japanese home, but most unpretentious. We met the lady of the house, who had a sweet face indeed. She had her little baby, just seven weeks old, in her arms. Very soon we received an invitation to dinner. I had to refuse, because I had to go back to Tokyo, but Elizabeth Binford and Watanabe San could stay. Then it came out that they were very anxious to make ice cream, and didn't know how, but wanted E. B. to teach them. We then adjourned to the kitchen, and while she directed and the maid servants assisted, the ice cream got started. Although it wasn't the way we would have planned to spend a First-day, yet we thought it was very much worth while to get acquainted with this family. Since, I have learned that the Viscount came to the next two tent meetings and his wife came to the cooking class, and he promised to send his children to First-day school in the future.

On my trip home I had the company of a boy who is working in Yokohama and who has joined a church there. I couldn't talk to him very well, as he understood very little English, but we managed to talk a little and he insisted on coming all the way to the house here and carrying my bag.

CATHARINE B. JONES.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

FIERCE FEATHERS.

But it was the gentle mother, with her arm still round her baby daughter, who kept the stranger's words longest in her heart. "Shall dwell in safety by Him,—the Beloved of the Lord," she repeated to herself over and over again, "yet my husband hath feared for me, and we have both been very fearful for the children! Truly, we have known the terror by night these last weeks in these unsettled times, even though our duty was plainly to stay here. Why were we so fearful? We of little faith. 'The Beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by Him. He shall cover him with His feathers all the day long.'"

And then, in her turn, she looked up, as her little daughter had done, and saw the same three tall feathers creeping above the sill of the open meeting-house window frame. For just one moment her heart, that usually beat so calmly under her grey Quaker robe, seemed to stand absolutely still. She went white to the lips. Then 'shall dwell in safety by Him,' the words flashed back to her mind. She looked across to where her husband sat—an urgent look. He met her eyes, read them, and followed the direction in which she gazed. Then he, too, saw the feathers—three, five, seven, nine, sticking up in a row. Another instant, and a dark-skinned face, an evil face, appeared beneath them, looking over the sill. The moment most to be dreaded in the lives of all American settlers—more terrible than any visit from civilized soldiers—had come suddenly upon the little company of Friends alone here in the wilderness. An Indian chief was looking in at their meeting-house window, showing his teeth in a cruel grin. In his hand he held a sheaf of arrows, arrows only too ready to fly, and kill, by day.

All the assembled Friends were aware of his presence by this time, and were watching the window now. But not one of them moved. The young mother glanced towards her other little daughter, and saw to her great relief that Dinah too, had fallen asleep, her head against the wooden wall. Dinah and Susie were the two youngest children in meeting that morning. The others were mostly older even than Benjamin, who was twelve. They were, therefore, far too well-trained in Quaker stillness to move, for any Indians, until the Friends at the head of the meeting should have shaken hands, and given the signal to disperse. Nevertheless, the hearts of even the elder girls were beating very fast. Benjamin's lips were tightly shut, and with eyes that were unusually bright, he followed every movement of the Indian chief, who, as it seemed, in one bound and without making the slightest noise, had moved round to the open doorway.

There he stood, the naked brown figure, in full war-paint and feathers, looking with piercing eyes at each man Friend in turn, as if one of them must have the weapons that he sought. But the Friends were entirely unarmed. There was not a gun, or a rifle, or a sword, to be found in any of their dwelling-houses, so there could not be any in their peaceful meeting.

A minute later, a dozen other redskins, equally terrible, stood beside the chief, and the bushes in the distance were quite still. The bushes trembled no longer. It was Benjamin who found it hard not to tremble now, as he saw thirteen sharp arrows taken from their quivers by thirteen skinny brown hands, and their notches held taut to thirteen bow-strings, all ready to shoot. Yet still the Friends sat on, without stirring, in complete silence.

Only Benjamin, turning his head to look at his grandfather, saw Zebulon Hoxie, the patriarch of the meeting, gazing full at the chief, who had first approached. The Indian's flashing eyes, under the matted black eyebrows, gazed back fiercely beneath his narrow red forehead into the Quaker's calm blue eyes beneath the high white brow and snowy hair. No word was spoken, but in silence two powers were measured against one another—the power of hate, and the power of love. For steady friendliness to his strange visitors was written in every line of Zebulon Hoxie's face!

The children never knew how long that steadfast gaze lasted. But at length, to Benjamin's utter astonishment, for some unknown reason, the Indian's eyes fell. His head, that he had carried high and haughtily, sank towards his breast. He glanced round the meeting-house three times with a scrutiny that nothing could escape. Then, signing to his followers, the thirteen arrows were noiselessly replaced in thirteen quivers, the thirteen bows were laid down and rested against the wall; many footsteps, lighter than falling snow, crossed the floor; the Indian chief, unarmed, sat himself down in the nearest seat, with his followers in all their war-paint, but also unarmed, close round him.

The meeting did not stop. The meeting continued—one of the strangest Friends' meetings, surely, that ever was held! The meeting not only continued, it increased in solemnity and in power!

Never while they lived did any of those present that day ever forget that meeting, or the brooding Presence, that, closer, clearer than the sunlight, filled that bright room.

"Cover thee with His feathers, all the day long."

The Friends sat in their accustomed stillness. But the Indians sat more still than any of them. They seemed strangely at home in the silence, these wild men of the woods. Motionless they sat, as a group of trees on a windless day, or as a tranquil pool unstirred by the smallest breeze; silent, as if they were themselves a part of Nature's own silence rather than of the family of her unquiet, human children.

The slow minutes slipped past. The peace brooded, and grew, and deepened. "Am I dreaming?" the little girls' mother thought to herself more than once, and then, raising her eyes, she saw the Indians still in the same place, and knew it was no dream. She saw, too, that Benjamin's eyes were riveted to some objects hanging from the strangers' waists, that none of the other Friends appeared to see.

At last, when the accustomed hour of worship was ended, the two Friends at the head of the meeting shook hands solemnly. Then, and not till then, did old Zebulon Hoxie advance to the Indian chief, and with signs he invited him and his followers to come to his house close at hand. With signs they accepted. The strange procession crossed the sunlit grass. Susie and Dinah, wide awake now, but kept silent in obedience to their mother's whispers, were watching the feathers with wide, untroubled eyes that knew no fear. Only Benjamin shivered as if he were cold.

When the company had arrived at the house, Zebulon put bread and cheese on the table, and invited his unwonted guests to help themselves. They did so, thanking him with signs, as they knew no English. Robert Nisbet, however, the visiting Friend, who could speak and understand French, had a conversation with two of the chiefs in that language, and this was what the Indians said: "We surrounded your house, meaning to destroy every living person within it. But when we saw you sitting with your door open, and without weapons of defense, we had no wish any longer to hurt you. Now, we would fight for you, and defend you ourselves from all who wish you ill." So saying, the chief took a white feather from one of his arrows, and stuck it firmly over the centre of the roof in a peculiar way. "With that white feather above your house," he said to Robert Nisbet, "your settlement is safe. We Indians are your friends henceforward, and you are ours."

A moment later and the strange guests had all disappeared as noiselessly as they had come. But, when the bushes had ceased to tremble, Benjamin stole to his mother's side. "Mother, did you see, did you see?" he whispered. "They were not friendly Indians. They were the very most savage kind. Did you," he shuddered, "did you, and father, and grandfather and the others not notice what those things were, hanging from their waists? They were scalps—scalps of men and women that those Indians had killed," and again he shuddered.

His mother stooped and kissed him. "Yea, my son," she answered, "I did see. In truth we all saw, too well, save only the tender maids, thy sisters, who know naught of evil or terror. But thou, my son, when thou dost remember those human scalps, pray for the slayers and for the slain. But for thyself and for us, have no fear. Remember, rather, the blessing of that other Benjamin, for whom I named thee, 'The Beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by Him. He shall cover him all the day long.'"

NEWS ITEMS.

PEACE AUTOMOBILES.—We have wanted to give at first hand some account of the "Peace Automobile Tours" through Chester and adjoining counties, but it is to be presumed that the speakers are too busy with their work to spare us the time just at present.

An item in a local paper under date Eighth Month 10th states:

Automobiles filled with speakers on the peace issue, sent out by the Society of Friends, arrived at the Unicorn Inn, Kennett Square, Pa., yesterday afternoon, and a most attentive crowd listened for an hour and a half in the evening to the addresses. The autos bore the American flag set upon a background of white silk, emblematic of the peace cause.

William F. Wickersham, Kennett Square, introduced the speakers, who followed each other with consecutive well-fitted argument. The party held a meeting in the afternoon at Yorklyn, where one hundred men listened to them. They came here from New Garden and Avondale, where good meetings were likewise held, and, after a noon meeting today at the Road Machinery Company's works, will go to Hamorton, Mendenhall, Fairville and Centerville.

In presenting the first speaker, W. Wickersham said they did not claim to have settled the question of peace and war, but that they had some valuable suggestions.

A large body of men stood close to the automobile during the entire meeting, and the porch of the Unicorn Inn was packed with women.

The Friends are much encouraged with the meetings so far, and find the people anxious to understand the issue. At Lincoln University later in the week there was quite a lively discussion and a number of wide-awake questions were put to the speakers.

One who was of the party says: "Everywhere we met with astonishing interest and attention. One of the characteristics of the trip was the fact that we never saw the literature, which we distributed by thousands, thrown on the street without being read. In fact, in Wilmington, where one man had crumpled his and thrown it down, a little child picked it up, straightened it out and carried it away."

The following note over the signature of Mary T. Wildman and dated at Philadelphia, the eleventh of last month, was sent us by a subscriber.—Eps.

The visit of the Friends from England soliciting aid for the sufferers of the European war brings to my mind the liberality shown toward us at the close of the Civil War by English Friends, when millions of destitute slaves were liberated and had to be cared for.

In the bound copy of The Freedman's Record, which my father, Archibald Pugh, presented, are very interesting accounts of this work. "A public meeting to inaugurate the National Freedman's Union was held on Fourth Month 24, 1866, at the Westminster Palace Hotel, London, England," at which time John Bright made an address in which occurs this passage: "This meeting regards the aid afforded hitherto (estimated at more than 80,000 pounds sterling) as a proper and graceful expression of our sympathy and would earnestly recommend that it be largely augmented." At the time the English pound was worth more than six dollars to us.

Two young men, recently graduated from Westtown, have written us of their attendance at the Lake Geneva (Wisconsin) Students' Conference. They write:

"It was the largest in its history, and the largest student conference held in America this year.

"There were present 903 delegates from the colleges of the Middle West. Because of some of its actions, we are trying to give this Conference publicity in the papers. As your Eastern colleges have the same problems, I thought that thee might publish these enclosed resolutions in THE FRIEND.

"Albert Roberts, International 'Y' Secretary in County work, told me of his many friends among Philadelphia Friends. The seventeen Friends and the seven Mennonites present met each First-day for a denominational meeting.

"The Conference grounds are most beautiful, with substantial buildings, on the lake shore. Provision is made for all forms of athletics up on the hill by the Yerkes Observatory of the University of Chicago.

"The finest and most lasting things about this Conference are the spirit of fellowship that exists between fellows of all denominations and all nationalities, and the vision of a larger service that comes to the men as they study under the guidance of some of the world's strongest Christians.

The following is a verbatim copy of the resolutions referred to:—

WHEREAS, Gambling, profanity, dishonesty, immodest dancing and other social excesses, the use of tobacco and liquor have become a menace to the student life of our universities and colleges, and are undermining character and are destroying the capacity for Christian leadership;

Be it resolved, That we, the delegates to this Conference, place ourselves on record as being unqualifiedly opposed to these destructive practices, and do hereby pledge ourselves, with the help of God, to the eradication of these evils from the student life of the colleges and universities of the Middle West.

Resolved, That this Conference appoint through its Chairman a Committee of fifteen (15), composed as follows: Nine students, two faculty members, two university pastors, and two association secretaries, to prepare a statement in which the evils of student life shall be enumerated and examples of successful remedial measures be pointed out.

Resolved, That a copy of this statement be sent to every college president, college dean, Y. M. C. A. president, Y. M. C. A. secretary, university pastor and to other influential persons interested in improving the character and efficiency of college men, and that this statement be used as a means of initiating a general movement against all pernicious and undermining practices of college men.

Resolved, That this action be made known to the student conferences, both State and Sectional, and to the various preparatory and high school conferences.

The following is taken from a longer report of New England Yearly Meeting, held some weeks ago, at Vassalboro, Maine:

Our forty-first reports showed a loss in the church membership of about a half. There have been a number more requests and admissions than dismissals and transfers, but an even greater excess of deaths over births. The Bible Schools showed a gain in membership in all departments of 139, and we believe with our present methods of graded work this gain can be conserved.

The educational interests of the Yearly Meeting received a large share of time and thought. Moses Brown School is facing the problem of how to provide adequately for the girls, that they may receive as large a benefit from the original endowment as do the boys. The proposal of the committee to build a new and entirely separate girls' school on the same grounds, was referred back to them for one year. At Oak Grove Seminary, as at Penn College, Iowa, there is a crisis involving the very continuance of the school at all. It is meeting a very definite need and serving in a splendid way the surrounding community and the weaker among the nearby Friends' meetings, yet its insufficient endowment and meager equipment make it absolutely necessary that all those interested should come at once to its financial aid, if it is to go on after the coming year.

The Committee on Peace reported active work by means of lectures, literature and aid in such societies as The Fellowship of Reconciliation and the Society to Abolish War. The time given to this report was but a small portion of that which the subject received, for the deep central thought of many of the addresses and sermons throughout the week was that of our duty to uphold the highest possible ideals of love and service to all. A telegram was sent to President Wilson urging the immediate application of these ideals in our present Mexican situation.

The week was marked by the presence and active interest of a large number, not only of young men and women, but of boys and girls in their early 'teens.

All the meetings on First-day were characterized by a forward-looking spirit, by consecration and the desire to be of service. To discover and to know God for ourselves and to have help and comfort to give to the work in its great need, is the heartfelt wish of New England Yearly Meeting.

At the last session of Haverford Monthly Meeting, the following letter was approved.

Haverford, Pa., Eighth Month 24, 1916.

To the Monthly Meeting of Friends in Japan.

Dear Friends:—Our beloved Friend, Edith F. Sharpless, left us on Eighth Month 11th and expects to sail on Eighth Month 26th on her way to resume her work in Japan.

She has been with us more than a year—a time filled with activity in the cause so near to her heart and of blessed reunion and fellowship with her family and friends.

We send her back to you with hearts sorrowful at parting, but rejoicing in the belief that a service wider and deeper than ever before awaits her, and that her loving and true spirit will be used by our Heavenly Father in the advancement of His pure and peaceable Kingdom in the earth.

With a message of greeting and encouragement to you in the love of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, we are your friends.

EDITORS OF THE FRIEND:—

The hot weather of last month and of this month has brought to mind the hot weather of 1868, when we had three weeks of very hot weather in the Seventh Month and one in the Eighth Month, the thermometer ranging from 95° to 98° day after day. Seventh Month 15, 1868, was the hottest day I ever remember or have any record of, the thermometer reaching 103° in the shade. There were 100 cases of sunstroke that day in New York City and 40 deaths; 30 cases in Philadelphia and 19 deaths.

There was great suffering among the horses, many of them died. I think I never saw so many dead or dying ones on the streets. The street cars were drawn by horses and the companies had men with buckets of water and sponges stationed at various points along the lines to water and sponge their heads and mouths. Notwithstanding this relief, many of them died. On the 20th of Seventh Month we had a delightful shower in the evening, which broke the hot spell and caused rejoicing to man and beast. The Report of the Board of Health for the last week of the hot spell was 555 deaths; 55 from sunstroke in Philadelphia; New York, 1100 deaths; 132 from sunstroke.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The new lunar tables, on which Professor E. B. Brown and assistants have been working for several years, were exhibited for the first time at the session of the American Astronomical Society at Swarthmore College last week. The tables, it was said by the astronomer present, will be invaluable in their work.

Produce dealers on South Street, west of Broad, several of whom were arrested and fined for failure to safeguard properly fruit from dirt, insects and filth, have started a movement to induce all produce and vegetable dealers to keep all their articles inside of their stores. In each instance where State health and pure food inspectors found violations it was on produce and vegetables displayed outside of stores on the pavements.

GENERAL.—The President appeared before Congress on the 29th ult. and appealed for immediate legislation to prevent the railway strike. On the 2d Congress accomplished this purpose.

All Latin-America at last is to have two-cent letter postage from the United States, effective early this month, says Leslie's Magazine. To the American who has resided south of the Rio Grande and who is familiar with the bad repute "short-posted" letters have given our merchants, this news is joyful.

The thirty-fourth annual session of the Northfield General Conference for Christian workers, which has just closed, was the scene of an unusually large number of brilliant addresses and inspiring conferences on many lines of religious work.

The American-Mexican commission to seek a solution of border difficulties will meet probably this week at Portsmouth, N. H., where the Russo-Japanese peace treaty was signed in 1905.

The "prohibition special," carrying J. Frank Hanly, the Presidential candidate and Dr. Ira Landrith, candidate for Vice-president, on their two-months' tour of the country, will stop at approximately 600 towns, it was announced at Chicago at the National Prohibition Headquarters.

Schools for flying have been increasing steadily in the last few years. Aside from the work which is being done at several of the larger universities in organizing aviation corps, many special training schools are now in a position to furnish expert instruction in the art of flying. Several such schools are located on Long Island near New York City, and there are many scattered in other States throughout the country.

A profit of more than $1,000,000 a week was made by the Ford Motor Company during the year just ended, according to a financial statement made public in Detroit. The year's business totaled $206,867,347; the year's profit was $59,994,118. Total men employed in all plants is 49,870. Of these, 36,626 are receiving $5 a day or more, said the statement. More than 27,000 of these men are employed in Detroit. Henry Ford announced that most of the profit will be used in expanding the company's business.

Since the first experimental rural postal delivery service was established under Postmaster-General William L. Wilson, of West Virginia, in 1896, simultaneously on three routes, from Charleston, Uvilla and Hallowtown, West Virginia, the service has grown to require 42,718 carriers, covering 1,073,099 miles and costing $49,825,000 in 1915.

In the last eight years one railroad company alone—the Pennsylvania—has spent $750,000 installing in its passenger cars what is considered the last word in car-ventilating devices.

Columbia University will have four foreign exchange professors during the coming year, a greater number than at any time since the beginning of the war. Among these will be the first Spanish professor that has ever filled an exchange chair at the University. He is Professor Frederico de Onis, of the University of Oviedo, in northern Spain, who will lecture on the "History of Spanish Literature and the Significance of Cervantes's Works," and will conduct classes during the entire scholastic year of 1916-17.

It is said: "We will consume, in this country, this year, about 2,000,000,000 gallons of gasoline; which is the equivalent of a stream six feet wide and one foot deep flowing at the rate of one mile an hour. Five years ago gasoline retailed at 35 cents in England and from 40 to 75 cents on the Continent, and there are those who even predict 40-cent gasoline here some day. Recent improvements in refining have considerably increased the percentage of gasoline extracted, and inventors are confident of perfecting carburetors which will use kerosene; but for the present we are confronted with a decrease in the gasoline content of the older oil wells, and an insufficient capacity in the refining plants.

The earth's population reaches a grand total of 1,700,000,000 persons. Three noteworthy benefactions for combating disease have recently been made by the Rockefeller Foundation. One is a gift of $50,000 to New York City to be spent in aiding the Health Department to fight the epidemic of infantile paralysis. Another is an endowment of $10,000 to establish at Sing Sing prison the country's first clinic of crime. Specialists will study the minds of prisoners in a search for the cause of their crimes. Penologists see in such a study, conducted by the best scientists, a great force for the reconstruction of the lives of prisoners, says Charlton Bates Strayer in Leslie's. The third contribution to the public welfare is the establishment near Princeton, N. J., of the Department of Animal Pathology of the Rockefeller Institute. Its work will be the study, by means of animal experimentation, of fundamental biological and medical problems upon which the health of the human race depends.

Recently the weather bureaus in all the States have begun lending a hand in preventing forest fires. Reports of the direction of winds, whether strong or light, are daily sent to the forest service in the various districts for distribution. The probability of rain or continued dryness also forms the subject of weather bureau bulletins to the service. Besides the use of the telephone and telegraph the forest rangers also use the heliograph, with which they are able to send flashes of sunlight many miles to bring aid. These are where telephone and telegraph lines are not yet available.

FOREIGN.—London, Eighth Month 24th.—The Danish Landsting, or upper house, has rejected by 39 votes to 7 the proposal to sell the Danish West Indies to the United States, says a Reuter dispatch from Copenhagen.

Congregationalist churches will celebrate the 300th anniversary of the founding of Congregationalism in America with special attention at the time of the big Pilgrim centenary. They have set up these objects to occupy the attention of Congregationalism during the years 1916-20: 1, Intelligent study and setting forth of the political and religious convictions that brought the Pilgrims to America; 2, half a million new members for Congregationalist churches; 3, large numbers of recruits for the ministry and other callings; 4, $2 annually for missions; 5, a great permanent fund as a memorial for the Pilgrims.

EDITOR:

Dear Friend:—Would thee be willing to publish the enclosed letter in THE FRIEND? Some of us got names from Dr. Stokes and have found corresponding with prisoners well worth while, and I thought some of the readers of THE FRIEND might like to do it, if they knew about it.

Thine sincerely,

ANNA COPE EVANS.

In the midst of the many calls for sympathy and money that come to us from Europe we must not forget those in our midst who are suffering for something that money cannot buy. I am appealing for friendless prisoners to whom a word of sympathy and friendship means more than we know. One of them writes: "If people could only know how a letter from the outside world would cheer us and make our burdens lighter, surely some one will write me." Not long ago 2100 were waiting for correspondents, some of them men without a friend in the world. Who will be "a friend in need" and write to one of these? Names may be obtained from Dr. H. N. Stokes, The O. E. Library League, 1207 Q Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

MY LOSS—MY GAIN.

Written by a young Friend, imprisoned for conscience' sake.

Which is the keener—joy or pain
While waiting in my silent cell?
How can I measure up and tell
How much my loss—how great my gain?

I miss the toil for daily bread,
That other work, more noble still
For Him, Who bids us do His will
And see His sheep and lambs are fed.

Sweet children's voices dear and bright,
Their joyful laughter gay and free,
Which always bring (at least to me)
Out of earth's sadness, peace and light.

These things I miss, these form my cross,
For missing them must cause some pain,
But there is corresponding gain
To ease the burden of that loss.

I gain a new experience
Of men and things; I take my share
Of this world's sorrow—gladly bear
Hardship and pain in His defense.

One thing alone outweighs all loss,
Outweighs as well all other gain;
Fresh knowledge of a Saviour slain,
A clearer meaning of His Cross.

For e'en within the prison wall
The Christ is ever with His own,
The wooden bed He calls His Throne
And makes my cell His Banquet Hall.

—From The Friend [London].

GIVING TO HIM THAT ASKETH.

I listened this morning to the reading of the beautiful last chapter of first Chronicles. It is the chapter wherein King David, "full of days, riches and honor," gives over the treasures he had accumulated for the erection of the first temple at Jerusalem; wherein also he calls upon the princes, the captains, the rulers of his possessions, and all his mighty men to make their contributions for the same purpose; and wherein lastly the king offers up his happy prayer, his almost jubilant thanksgiving that the wish of his heart is so near its accomplishment.

The whole scene looks very real even after the lapse of three thousand years. Our own hearts waken to the appeal of noble words and deeds whereby David stirred the Jews to enthusiasm and consecration. What a lesson of the imperishable nature of truth!

The striking thought that runs through this passage is the joy of giving. David offered "with gladness of heart." He had made his preparations, he said, "with all his might" for the great work which he was not to do. Moreover, because he had "set his affections to the house of his God," he had also given of his own especial treasures. And "the people rejoiced for that they offered willingly, because with a perfect heart they offered willingly to the Lord."

Turning abruptly to the present, let us question how often this is our feeling when we are called upon to give. I know that many make the willing response and some the same glad offering that David did. But some of us have a feeling of impatience at the constant appearance of the beggar in one form or another. Here is the Salvation Army collector! He comes on so many errands! But how unselfishly and gladly is he giving himself to the "least of these, my brethren"! And yet it is too often with the thought only of getting rid of him that we hunt for the small change in our purses! "When will these calls cease!" we say. "Scarcely a day comes but a begging letter comes too." It were well for us to stop right here and read from David's prayer: "All things come of Thee, and of Thine own have we given Thee."

This chapter in Chronicles seems to be a reminder more particularly of the calls for money that come to us from our own Society—our meeting-taxes, or other requests to help calls to which Friends are committed. Having "set our affections to the house of our God," why not extract from these offerings all the satisfaction which is our due? Why not give "with gladness of heart," even of that which doth cost us something? And why not allow the weary collector some pleasure because of the cheerful giver?

A minister of a prominent denomination in our town told one of our members that he would regard it as an injury to his church for any one to endow it. It was better for his people to raise year by year all the money they needed for running expenses. Giving until they felt the sacrifice increased their loyalty and devotion. Thus a great blessing comes to the giver and to the church.

"I give for my own good," was the explanation granted to one who wondered why his companion rewarded the street beggar with alms. "It may not be the best course theoretically, or for the beggar, but the repeated refusal to give hardens my heart and I can't afford that."

Let us consider, however, whether there is anything to be said on the other side, that of giving too lavishly. We have known those who gave so much that they themselves were impoverished, and had to be supported, or to beg to repay themselves. I knew an earnest woman, intent on helping others and using her all to do it, disclaiming the thought or intent of laying up for herself treasure on earth. "But," was objected, "what will become of thee in thy old days?" "Oh," she said, "some good Christian will turn in and help me out." The question might have been asked, "But what if all good Christians should follow thy course?" No doubt this course of faith has been justified in many instances, but is it not mostly desirable that each person shall, if possible, aim to bear his own burdens, including those of self-support? Our alms-giving, like other outlays, must be "within the bounds of our circumstances." We must strive to find out which calls for financial help are the calls of our Heavenly Provider, and then with rejoicing to say, "All things come of Thee, and of Thine own will we give Thee." We may distrust our motives, however, if we find while we have little to give to others, that there is no lack in ministering to our own pleasures or comfort. We may question, too, whether the present needs of others should not have a greater claim upon us than the future gratification of relatives who already have as much as is good for them.

This paper is brought to a finish with the knowledge that there are other gifts required of us than gold and silver, but that is another matter. A. S.

LETTERS OF SAMUEL MORRIS.

[When the late Samuel Morris was under thirty years of age, he was asked to be the guardian of four children, and for several years he filled this position in addition to the care of his own family and his farm. His solicitude is shown in letters to one of them as follows.—Eds.]

OLNEY, Twelfth Month 20, 1857.

My dear Mary.—

As I have taken to writing a little for myself once more, I will make one of my first letters for a long while to thee. We were glad to learn through thine of thy safe arrival at school again and being comfortably fixed there—and then through my father—and sister, who have returned from Westtown within a few days—to hear that they found thee doing well, while my sister thought "Mary was improving in several respects." I did not ask her in what way, but take it for granted that she referred to manners or habits, which as I have told thee, always leave an impression favorable or otherwise upon those into whose company we are thrown. Thus thou wilt see, that it is little things—as most people would call them—acts trifling in themselves, or language which in itself may be of little account, that go to make for us our characters in life and which generally follow us for good or bad to the end of it. I want thee, therefore, to think often of the time and opportunities which are now afforded thee for improvement and strive in earnest to make the best use of them. Thou wilt probably never find it easier to root out bad habits or to restrain and correct bad propensities than just now. And as to what is good and right, I believe there are few of us but know enough to make us much better than we are—if we would only follow our best feelings. Thy sincere friend,

SAMUEL MORRIS.

OLNEY, Seventh Month 11, 1858.

A stirring time which we have had in our little family within the last few weeks, the business of a heavy harvesting added to my divers other cares of which thou mayest remember I had several already, have been the hindrances to my answering thy clever and acceptable letter of a month ago. But as we are just finishing our harvest and we begin to get into a little more of the quiet at home, I feel a little more at leisure to write than I have done for a long while past. And first I must tell thee how glad I am to find the spirit of contentment which seems to prevail in thy mind and shows itself in thy letters. It is this disposition to make the best of things which is one grand secret of living comfortably and affects not a little our own comfort, but carries with it a happy influence wherever our lots may be cast. I observe thy daily regulations for self-government which I think look as if very well laid out. But I take it, the hardest matter is to keep them up steadily, and this from a little experience in my own case needs some determination on one's own part—since the law-making and law-breaking and keeping are all in our own hands. But I hope thou canst report by this time that in a general way thy rules have been kept to closely. But one little sentence in thy letter pleased me almost as much as any thing in it, viz.: "I am trying to improve." This is all that the best of us can do at last, and if we hold on patiently and perseveringly to such a resolution, with a humble dependence on best help, I have a full belief that our endeavors will be blessed with success. Let us, however, never forget that this is not the work of a day or a year but a whole lifetime, and that we have the highest authority for the promise that "he that endureth unto the end" shall receive the reward for well-doing.

Thy letter to sister Beulah reached Germantown last week, but father and herself had gone some days before to Saratoga, with the hope that the waters of the mineral springs at that place would be of use to them both. So thy letter was at once mailed to sister there and she returned it again with her next to Germantown that I might see it, too. By thy letter I was very glad to find thee seeming still to do well and be happy. The sea gulls which it speaks of a man having given to thee, I know are very pretty creatures, but should think they could scarcely be tamed or kept, since we must not forget they are birds of prey and live by fishing. Thy canary can be managed much easier. The jar for thy aquarium I have been to see after several times, but hope it will have been procured by to-morrow, when I shall have to be in town and should like to send it with several little matters thou art wanting.

PHILADELPHIA, Seventh Month 24, 1859.

I duly received thine of 18th inst., which was not a little gratifying to me, because I could not help hoping that the good conclusions and resolves which were therein expressed are the results of a sincere conviction that there is need of a more earnest labor, closer watching and deeper searching of heart than has heretofore been the case with thee. And it would rejoice me more than I can express, should this be indeed the turning-point of thy life, and I have been made in some measure instrumental in arousing thee to that work which all must do, if they would hope for the rewards of faithfulness here and hereafter. And that the good work, which I trust has been begun in thy heart may be suffered to go on, until all that the Divine controversy is with shall have been cast out is my sincere desire. Then indeed thou wouldst come to know something of that peace which passeth all understanding and is so infinitely superior to all that the fullest gratification of our corrupt wills can possibly afford. But oh, my child, forget not that this blessed change is not the work of a day, nor yet to be attained while living at ease. No! no! it involves a life-long struggle, for the life of the true Christian, we are told, is one of constant warfare with the enemies of his soul, and with these he must wrestle day by day to the very end. But oh! we know how that crowns all—while even here, as he struggles on his way, he above all others knows where true comfort lies. He alone can meet the trials of this life with holy resignation and feel that all things work together for his good. One of the first results of real religion is to convince us that in our natural state we are naked and poor and blind and miserable in an inward sense, and this of necessity begets a deep humility of spirit and a craving for help from some higher source than our own weak and erring powers, and then the simple, child-like state is begotten in us, in which we are willing to be or to suffer anything which our Heavenly Father may see best to bring upon us; knowing that He will feed us with food convenient for us, and will not suffer us to be tempted by any of our besetments further than we are able to bear them. And when He sees we are little enough in our own eyes—teachable enough, and poor enough in spirit—He will, I believe, raise us up and qualify us according to our ability for service in His Church and in the world—some in one way and some in another. But let our attainments be what they may, we shall only be able to acknowledge with the Apostle Paul—"through the Grace of God I am what I am." I am glad thou seems to feel the importance, if not the necessity, for cultivating a quiet and retired frame of mind, for I feel sure that it would add much to thy inward strength. This is, however, a gift to be sought at our Heavenly Father's hands, and is one of those unmistakable marks which distinguishes those who above all things are endeavoring to serve Him.

I have for a long time known and valued some sweet verses, which can have been written only by one who knew something in himself of true quiet—they are upon a passage in Job—"When He giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?" I admire them so much that I will copy them and should be glad for thee to commit them to memory.

I am pleased to observe thy plans for study and hope that interest in geometry in particular will be kept up—and if thou should not get over so much ground, I would have thee thoroughly master whatever study thou art taking in hand. The too-common habit of getting but a smattering of a little of everything I have no faith in—indeed, I think it often worse than nothing.

I remain as ever, thy sincere friend,

SAMUEL MORRIS.

WHEN HE GIVETH QUIETNESS, WHO THEN CAN MAKE TROUBLE?

—Job, chap. xxxiv: 29.

Quiet from God—it cometh not to still

The vast and high aspirations of the soul—

The wild emotions, which the spirit fill,

And speed its purpose onward to the goal.

It dims not youth's bright eye—

Bends not joy's lofty brow—

No guiltless ecstasy

Need in its presence how.

Action may be its sphere!

Mountain paths—boundless fields—

O'er billows its career—

This is the power it yields.

To sojourn with the world and yet apart,

To dwell with God—yet still with man to feel;

To bear about forever in the heart

The gladness, which His presence doth reveal.

Not to deem evil gone

From every earthly scene,

But see the storm come on,

And feel His shield between.

It giveth not a strength to human kind,

To lay all suffering powerless at His feet,

But keep within the temple of the mind

A golden altar and a mercy-seat—

A spiritual ark!

Bearing the peace of God

And o'er the desert sod!

How beautiful within our souls to keep

This treasure, the all-merciful hath given—

To feel both when we wake and when we sleep

Its incense 'round us, like a breeze from heav'n!

Quiet at hearth and home,

Where the heart's joys begin;

Quiet, where'er we roam,

Quiet around—within.

JOHN BRIGHT AND WAR.

MARGARET E. HIRST.

In the summer of 1861 the smoldering trouble between North and South in the United States burst into flame, and for four years the great Republic was torn by civil war. Bright, in his private business life, suffered severely from the cotton famine induced by the Northern blockade, but his sympathies never wavered. To him the cause of the North was the cause of freedom against slavery, and of constitutional order against rebellion. He steadfastly opposed the attempts made in England to recognize the Confederate Government as an independent state, and his great speeches did much to instruct public opinion on the merits of the struggle. Even at the opening of the war he defended the Federal Government, with a significant proviso. He said:

"No man is more in favor of peace than I am, no man has denounced war more than I have, probably, in this country, few men in their public life have suffered more obloquy—I had almost said more indignity—in consequence of it. But I cannot for the life of me see upon any of those principles upon which States are governed now—I say nothing of the literal words of the New Testament—I cannot see how the state of affairs in America with regard to the United States Government could have been different from what it is at this moment."

In a strain similar to the foregoing he wrote to Whittier, "It seems as if a peaceable termination of the great evil of slavery was impossible—the blindness, the pride and the passion of men have made it impossible. War was, and is, the only way out of the desperate difficulty of your country, and fearful as the path is, it cannot be escaped. I only hope there may be virtue enough in the North, notwithstanding the terrible working of the poison of slavery, to throw off the coil and to permit of a renovated and restored nation."

It is an amazing fact that this letter has been described recently as one "in support of the American Civil War." A recruiting meeting would not gain much impetus from such gloomy submission to a terrible evil. That Bright supported the ideals represented by the North against those of the South is indisputable, and, when Lincoln had once made Emancipation a plain issue, he felt that no peace could be admitted which involved any recognition of slavery. Perhaps his most emphatic expression of this is found in a letter to Villiers (1863):—

"I want no end of the war, and no compromise, and no reunion till the negro is made free beyond all chance of failure."

This language is strong enough, but it must be remembered that it was used by a neutral to a neutral. His other letters of the time show that he feared the North was winning too easily and had not yet paid her share of the "penalty" for maintaining slavery. A week before he had written, also to Villiers:—"It needs as many plagues as Pharaoh suffered to force the corrupt portion of the Northern people to let the negro go."

When the war ended, he wrote in his journal, "The friends of freedom everywhere should thank God and take courage."

In 1868 he received the freedom of Edinburgh, and at his visit delivered two fine speeches, one of which, to a deputation of working-men, condensed into a few pungent paragraphs his teaching and his aspirations.

"I do not know whether it is a dream, or a vision, or the foresight of a future reality that sometimes passes across my mind—I like to dwell upon it—but I frequently think the time may come when the maritime nations of Europe—this renowned country of which we are citizens, France, Prussia, Russia, resuscitated Spain, Italy, and the United States of America—may see that those vast fleets are of no use, that they are grand inventions by which the blood is withdrawn from the veins of the people to feed their ulcers, and that they may come to this wise conclusion—they will combine at their joint expense, and under some joint management, to supply the sea with a sufficient sailing and armed police, which may be necessary to keep the peace on all parts of the watery surface of the globe, and that those great instruments of war and oppression shall no longer be upheld. This, of course, by many will be thought to be a dream or a vision, not the foresight of what they call a statesman. Still, I have faith that it will not be forever that we shall read of what Wilberforce called the noxious race of heroes and conquerors, that what Christianity points to will one day be achieved, and that the nations throughout the world will live in peace with one another." So in the dark days of the American War, he had cherished the hope of a great North American Confederation with "freedom everywhere, equality everywhere, law everywhere, and peace everywhere."

Later he wrote: "It is a painful and terrible thing to think how easy it is to stir up a nation to war. Take up any decent history of this country from the time of William III. until now—for two centuries, or nearly so—and you will find that wars are always supported by a class of arguments which, after the war is over, people find were arguments they should not have listened to. It is just so now, for, unfortunately, there still remains the disposition to be excited on these questions. Some poet, I forget which it is, has said:—

"Religion, freedom, vengeance, what you will,
A word's enough to raise mankind to kill;
Some cunning phrase by faction caught and spread,
That guilt may reign, and wolves and worms be fed."

In the winter of 1880:—"You hear of the hanging of scores of men, you hear of villages burnt, of women and children turned out into the snow and the cold of this inclement season, and all done at the command of a Government and a people professing to be wiser, more intelligent, more humane, and more Christian than those upon whom those attacks are made.

Take down, at any rate, your Ten Commandments from inside your churches, and say no longer that you read, or believe in, or regard, the Sermon on the Mount. Abandon your Christian pretensions, or else abandon your savage and heathen practices."

(To be concluded.)

A CAMPAIGN FOR PEACE.

"THE AUTOMOBILE PEACE TOUR."

Many who read the article by John B. Garrett, in a recent number of THE FRIEND, will be interested to know more in detail of the actual working out of the Peace Campaign to which he referred.

The Emergency Peace Committee of Race Street Friends, although formed after the organization of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting's Peace Committee, at once joined enthusiastically in the plans already mapped out. Wherever both branches of Friends have been found in the rural communities, which the Meetings Committees have reached, there has been a joyous, whole-souled working together in telling the world again the Message of the Prince of Peace.

A member of the Meeting's committee said: "It seemed to me that Friends have swallowed the super-respectability lump in their throats and have in this small degree reassumed the methods of the fathers, though with few of the attendant difficulties of the fathers. Motor traveling is distinctly easier than walking, the tail of a car much better for a rostrum than a barrel head (cf. Wm. Penn in Gracechurch Street, London), and the dangers, real to them, of the authorities and assailants, are negligible with us."

But most of our readers will not know what real bravery it took for this same earnest Friend to start speaking in one of the meetings in a square, without any auditors except two of his companions, and continue his message until some fifty had gathered to hear him.

In all, thirty-nine meetings have been held in New Jersey, Chester Co., Penna., Delaware and in Maryland. About fifty-five hundred people were reached and more than twenty thousand pieces of literature distributed.

Of large significance is the fact that not many of those who listened would have ever heard our message had it been given in our meeting-houses as has been our custom. For perhaps the first time to any large extent have the Friends of our Yearly Meetings in Philadelphia gone out to meet the workman in the factory, the crowd on the street, the "cracker-barrel club" in the country store, and idler in the village square. And these were not only attentive, but in practically every case responsive to the message and the speakers heard people say, "they were good speeches," "they are doing a good work," "we hope they keep it up."

Edward Hollingshead and others planned the meetings for New Jersey, but because of E. H.'s illness, only four of those scheduled were held.

Robert Balderston undertook an almost impossible task when he mapped out the rest of the tour.

The work could not have been so successful had it not been for the efficient office Secretary of the Peace Committee, Jessie F. Davis, who held together the threads of the campaign and kept everything moving quietly, according to schedule, rearranging meetings at the last moment and supplying speakers where some failed to come.

In all the centers reached, local committees had done efficient work and the Peace Party was met, introduced and entertained by Friends in practically all the places.

Two automobiles were loaned by Edward G. Rhoads and Rachel Knight. There were simple Peace banners and the cars carried much literature to supplement the spoken word.

Among those who spoke were W. Lewis Abbott, Mark Balderston, J. Augustus Cadwallader, Rachel Knight and Francis R. Taylor. These were helped in all the important centers by our friend, Frank Stephens, who is a devoted Peace Advocate, a charming speaker, having to an unusual degree the ability of reaching the heart of the common people.

The Committees really started their Peace venture by helping one of their committee members, Maria Moon Albertson and her husband, in their splendid Independence Day Peace Meeting. To William Richie and Barclay Moon we are indebted for their impressions of the gathering.

On Independence Day, Henry H. and Maria M. Albertson opened their home at "Green Hill Farm," near Burlington, New Jersey, for the second semi-annual Burlington County Picnic. This year a "Peace Day" program was arranged by a Committee of Peace Workers, representing several denominations of the county and an unusually interesting and convincing program was given. By noon, probably between seven and eight hundred people were assembled in the "Peace Basket Auditorium under the trees." A pageant was enacted, showing the call of war on the common people to take up arms and fight their brothers. "Peace" and "Justice" appeared, and "War" was ejected. Peace then called forth her following of doctors, nurses, firemen and others, who save rather than destroy life. The States of the Union, represented by small girls in appropriate costume, exemplified the spirit of co-operation and mutual trust, which has bound our States together in justice and freedom. The future was then portrayed by the various nations of the world, called into a Federation of the States. Some of our National airs were sung by the children as they marched. With all the characters in appropriate costume, the pageant was very effective and entertaining. Lunch was then served on the grounds by a caterer, to those who had not provided themselves with basket lunches, and a very pleasant social hour and a-half was enjoyed. The afternoon meeting was presided over by Assemblyman Emmor Roberts, of Moorestown.

Professor Baker of the Moorestown Public School first addressed the meeting on the general subject of "Military Training in the Public Schools." Dr. Lukens, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Burlington, then gave a most inspiring and convincing address on the "Immorality of all War" and the special dangers from militarism in this country. Sidney L. Gulick, of New York City, spoke of conditions in the Orient and the need for our Government to study carefully the existing conditions, in order to develop a better spirit of understanding and co-operation with the Eastern countries, especially with reference to the immigration problem.

Before the meeting "Anti-Preparedness" leaflets were handed about, and it is believed that many seeds were sown which would bear fruit in an increased devotion on the part of Burlington County citizens to the cause of international brotherhood.

The two most important results of this meeting were: The splendid lesson it taught the children who took part in the pageant of the possibility of a world-wide Friendship of Nations, also the bringing together of people of widely differing interests to hear the vital Peace message.

Edward G. Rhoads writes of the next meetings in the campaign:

"The open-air campaign of the joint Peace Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meetings was begun on the twenty-second of Seventh Month; meetings being scheduled on that day for Salem, N. J., at 4.30 P. M., and Woodstown at 8 P. M. Heavy rain and tire trouble delayed but did not prevent the afternoon meeting. It was after five o'clock when the automobile bearing those members of the party who went from Philadelphia arrived at the old meeting-house in Salem. There we were joined by Anna Griscom and W. Lewis Abbott and proceeded to the chosen position in front of the Court House on the old King's Highway.

There were many passers-by and the strong, clear voice of the first speaker and the display of "Keep Cool" fliers soon drew the attention of a knot of people, who formed the nucleus of an interested and growing audience, listening attentively, and, in the main, sympathetically, to strong messages from Francis R. Taylor and W. Lewis Abbott. A large number of tracts and fliers were handed around and usually were kindly received. Supper was provided for the speaker's party in the annex of the grounds of the old meeting-house, through the hospitality of Race Street Friends, some of whom were holding a week-end "Peace tramp," with Salem as headquarters.

After supper we left old Salem—the site of the oldest Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting—and made a pleasant run to Woodstown, where we arrived about 8 P. M., to find the town alive with people who had come from the adjacent country-side. The curbs for blocks were closely lined with automobiles.

Some notice of our coming had been given, the town authorities had been consulted and a policeman indicated a position for our car alongside a fountain, where three ways met at the business centre of the town.

A large crowd soon collected and listened most attentively and with evident approval to an appeal for a better than military preparedness. A great deal of literature was accepted and carried away by those in the crowd, among whom were many solid citizens. Expressions of quiet approval were heard, a few questions were asked, and, when the speakers finished, many lingered as if they wished to hear more, until the car moved away from its station for the return trip to Philadelphia.

Those of the party who had no part in the speaking felt strongly that here was a method of work the value of which is beyond question."

On the twenty-sixth of Seventh Month a meeting was held in Merchantville.

The following day, Frank Stevens and W. Lewis Abbott held three successful meetings in Florence, N. J.—one at the Wood Foundry gate at 5.15, the interest among the workmen being well maintained; another at eight on the Main Street well attended, with two-thirds of the audience men; the third at 9.30 at the Catholic Carnival, through the courtesy of the local priest. Five hundred people were reached, and, as a Friend present said, it was a pleasure to hear an excellent speaker address three consecutive audiences, hold their attention and not repeat himself!

The Chester County Campaign began on Seventh Month 29th, with an evening meeting at Paoli. There followed meetings at Marshalltown, Embreeville, Doe Run, Ercildoun, Parkesburg, Christiansa, Oxford, Rising Sun, Coloma, Lincoln University, Christiansville, West Grove, Chatham, Unionville, London Grove, Landenberg, Yorklyn, Hockessin, Toughkenamon, New Garden, Kennett Square, Red Lion, Hamorton, Fairville, Centerville, Wilmington, Lenape Park, Newport and Newcastle. In some of these there were two meetings held. At Oxford and New Garden five hundred people were present at each meeting.

From W. Lewis Abbott the Committee has had the interesting details of the meetings held in the places mentioned above.

At Ercildoun they gathered in the meeting-house grounds. Although there were less than a hundred present, in that quiet country place, as night fell, there came a fresh vision of the great need of the world at large for the Quaker message of Peace. A number of colored people attended the meeting and at the close they sang their old-time melodies. It was as if at the beginning of the trip a spirit had arisen to link our mission with the historic stand of the Society for justice and freedom and to give us a vision of the thing for which we were working—the brotherhood of the races of the world.

At Calvert, Maryland, on the third, in the yard of the Old Brick Meeting-house, built in 1701, was held one of the best meetings of the tour. Feeling the spell of the location, Frank Stevens delivered a particularly splendid talk. It was a stirring call to battle not only against war, but against all the forces of injustice, privilege and oppression which cause misery and sorrow in the world. War, poverty, crime, all call for men with vision, with courage, with devotion, to work, to gain for all humanity lives of fuller worth and opportunity.

In Yorklyn a factory meeting was held and in Kennett a large meeting in the Square. At Red Lion, Hamorton and Fairville meetings were held before groups of men in front of the tavern and country store.

On Sixth-day, the 11th, our plan called us into the heart of the enemy's country—Wilmington. In the land of the duPonts we were to talk of the evils of war. With doubts and misgivings, we set out. The first meeting was in the center of the business district of the city at the noon hour. For fifty minutes three hundred people, mostly men, stood and listened to us. They applauded each speaker with genuine heartiness. A unique incident, the only one of its kind on the trip, occurred here. A man in the crowd came forward at the close and contributed a dollar "to help your cause."

Although the number reached during these meetings might have been larger, it must be remembered that in each community a group was touched that may act as a center from which thought and comment on the subject will radiate. It is better to come in contact with a few people in many centers than to reach a large number in one place. The interest displayed and the signs of favor did not necessarily mean converts, but it did mean people reached, interest held and thought awakened.

The whole trip was a great personal inspiration to those who took part in the campaign. Everywhere from the open Friendly door came kindness and encouragement, larger acquaintance with each other and a deepened interest in the message for which all were working.

AMANDA SMITH.

Some months ago THE FRIEND printed an inquiry from Maria H. Cadbury, of Birmingham, in regard to the closing days of Amanda Smith. Now we have a compact volume of less than one hundred pages with the title "The Life of Amanda Smith, the African Sybil, the Christian Saint," by M. H. Cadbury, with an introduction by J. Rendel Harris. It is published at one shilling, by Cornish Brothers, Ltd., of Birmingham, England. In the main the volume is made up of judicious extracts from an autobiography published in 1893. A generation ago Amanda Smith was a well-known figure in demonstrating the capacity of her race for highest things. A revival of interest in her and in her efforts for race uplift is needed even amongst us. We are mostly ready now to regard the Negro problem in the light of a receipted bill duly pigeon-holed. As a matter of fact, in some particulars the call for help is more urgent than it ever was. Great volumes of suffering—actually of slavery, although not with that name, are enacted in legislative, educational, even in religious lines, from month to month and from year to year, and we are unmoved. We are very glad M. H. Cadbury has lent the power of fine discrimination shown in this volume as a contribution to correct our apathy and impatience with our colored wards. Rendel Harris's introduction is unique and we copy it in full as the best means of interesting Friends in this little volume:—

"It is nearly forty years since I first met Amanda Smith, and I can still recall her erect figure, her striking features, her wonderful voice and her illuminated spirit. I arranged public meetings for her in Cambridge, and it must have been the first time that any such appearance of a colored woman as an evangelist ever occurred in that old-fashioned university town. Her preaching was in the power of the Spirit, if ever we had spiritual preaching in our midst. It was one more of the proofs such as the Lord loves to give, that He chooses things which are not to bring to naught things that are, and to keep us from glorying in His presence. To me, at all events, she was a great teacher. And how full of common-sense as well as spiritual intuition. It was a joy to be with her and to talk with her.

"One day some of us took her to see King's College Chapel, the most beautiful of all the Cambridge buildings. She was profoundly impressed as well as interested. She looked at the wonderful stained-glass windows, and the exquisite stone carvings, 'Why don't they all be good?' said she. 'They' were the undergraduates. Then she looked closely at some of the curious carved dragons that supported the coats-of-arms of kings and nobles of past days. They puzzled her at first. Then she said to herself, quoting from the eighth chapter of Romans, 'Height nor depth nor any other creature.' 'This,' said she, 'must be the "other creature."' Then she went up the steps of what is called the Altar, and sang the doxology, with her matchless voice and intonation. And the official who was showing the party round did not interfere with her.

"At a later date she went to West Africa to visit the people of her own race, from whom she herself was sprung, and to do some mission work among them. Wherever she went among white people or colored, the Lord greatly blessed her works, and she was a lovely monument to Divine Grace—in ebony."

DO BOYS PLAY TOO MUCH?

In a recent issue of the N. Y. Independent, a prominent school-master of almost forty years' experience, says, in the course of a very able paper, after naming these three essentials to educational success: (1) personality of the teacher, (2) individual initiative of the pupil, (3) concentration and imagination—"Consider the following 'seven deadly sins' in relation to these three generally acknowledged educational essentials."

(1) Cheap periodicals and magazines (written down to a taste that balks at the slightest mental exertion).

(2) Cheap theatrical shows (adapted to the tired business man's standard—no mental effort).

(3) Cheap (canned) music, which might be excellent and often is; but too often degenerates into the "empty singer of an idle day"—mere amusement and accompaniment to dancing.

(4) The apotheosis of amusement (the dancing craze, the exaggeration of athletics, the domination of play—Johnny must be out of doors all the afternoon, till he is too tired and sleepy to study in the evening).

(5) Premature assumption of the manners of club life (dependence upon the comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of life—too many servants, no responsibilities; press the button, and somebody else does the rest).

(6) The automobile (the devil's own as a seductive time consumer).

(7) The moving-picture show (and the better the picture the cheaper the show, and vice versa).

WHITTIER TO MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

It is like dropping out of the present into familiar intercourse with the authors of a half century ago to read the following letter written by the poet Whittier to M. R. Mitford:

"MY DEAR FRIEND, MARY RUSSELL MITFORD:—

"Permit me to wish thee a happy New Year! I am quite sure that thousands who have been made happier by thy writings will join with me. I wish thou wouldst come over to America, just to see what a host of friends thou hast made for thyself on this side the water."

He goes on to speak of the "inspiring scenery and pure mountain air" of New Hampshire, where he has been staying, and of his own literary work, says that he is writing newspaper articles for the National Era and "sometimes a jingle of song," and adds: "I also enclose two short poems, commemorative of my sojourn in the hill country. As a specimen of the quieter mood of a rough reformer and controversialist, they may not be wholly without interest.

"Our excellent friend, James Fields, announces two books of thine as forthcoming. Shall we have a new series of the 'Literary Reminiscences'?"

"A little volume of poems, under the title of 'Passion Flowers,' by Julia Howe, wife of Dr. Howe of Boston, is attracting much attention. I hope thou wilt see it. Ticknor and Fields publish it. It seems to me to have great merit.

"My friend Dr. Holmes is lecturing this winter on the English poets—very witty and genial.

"We have recently had a delightful visit from Ralph Waldo Emerson. I wish thou wouldst meet him. He is a man not only admired, but loved.

"I need not tell thee that I should be exceedingly glad to hear from thee. Thy two notes are among my choice treasures.

"Believe me, most cordially thy friend,

"JOHN G. WHITTIER."

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.

Although held from the first to the sixth of Sixth Month, the report of Dublin Yearly Meeting has just reached us (Ninth Month 1st). The report is in The Friend [London] of Sixth Month 16th. By some vagary of the censorship this and several other numbers of this paper have been withheld. How this copy came through after such detention we are not informed. Some indication of the wholly arbitrary way a war censorship works is indicated by a report made to the Meeting for Sufferings on the ninth of Sixth Month by Isaac Sharp that he had sent identical messages for London Yearly Meeting to two Yearly Meetings in the States. Both messages contained the text 2 Thess. iii: 16 (Now the Lord of Peace Himself give you peace at all times in all ways). The reference was allowed in one case and expurgated in the other.

Dublin Yearly Meeting was held under very peculiar and trying circumstances. The clerk's explanation will make this clear:

The Clerk said that we met this year in a very unusual way, not only as regards the condition of our city and country, but also by reason of the fact that for the first time in our history we were holding our meeting by permission of the Government. On applying to the railway companies for the usual concessions, it transpired that leave would have to be obtained before the Yearly Meeting could be held at all. That leave was granted by the Chief Commissioner of Police, after consulting the military authorities, on the ground that it would be a purely religious gathering. This was the tacit understanding under which the Meeting met and Friends should remember that when certain subjects that bordered on politics came under discussion.

An earnest discussion followed as to what course should be taken under the novel circumstances, and it was agreed, with practical unanimity, to leave to the Clerk the decision as to what subjects, under the circumstances, must be avoided.

The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight had been held the day before the above announcement. The following brief extract contains some interesting items:

After the opening period of devotion, in course of which prayer was offered for the help and guidance of the King and his Ministers and all in authority in the present serious crisis, reports from the three Quarterly Meetings were read, presenting no new features. There are in the Yearly Meeting, 36 Recorded Ministers, 86 Elders, and 136 Overseers, besides seven women Friend visitors in Dublin. Ulster reported 96 Friends as taking vocal part in meetings for worship. Leinster reported consideration of the question of recording ministers, as a result of which Elders had been encouraged to send in suitable names. Nothing, however, had been done.

Attention was called by some Friends and by others later, to the absence of uniformity of action in the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings in this matter. Ulster has 24 Recorded Ministers, and Leinster with almost as large a membership has only 7, the large Monthly Meeting of Dublin having only 4. The matter was considered as deserving of attention by the Yearly Meeting, and arrangements were made for its introduction there.

The subject of Peace was considered Fifth-day evening. The limitations that hampered this consideration will be clear from this extract:

Reports from the three Quarterly Meetings on the subject of Peace were read as usual. The reports showed that beyond the holding of some meetings in Ulster and Leinster and the distribution in the latter of some copies of Dymond's Essay on War, not much had been done directly in this cause. Many individual Friends, however, were working with others outside in promoting goodwill and harmony both between nations and individuals.

The Clerk, on leaving the meeting open, asked for the forbearance of Friends in the difficult task which had been imposed on him. The Meeting had entrusted him with the decision as to what was and what was not admissible to be discussed in the special circumstances under which we were meeting. Three definite questions had been put to him: (1) Can we discuss the position which young Friends would hold should conscription be applied to Ireland? To that he must answer, No. (2) Can we discuss the way in which Friends in England are affected by the Military Service Act and the position of some of the members there in relation to it? Again he must answer, No. (3) Can we discuss the preparation that Friends should make for the work of reconstruction after the war? He was sorry to rule that even there the answer must be No. In ruling thus he felt bound to put the interpretation on those questions which the authorities who gave the permission would put upon them. In these circumstances some might say there was no good in discussing Peace at all; but he believed that there was still room for profitable and purely religious discussion.

These limitations apparently did not apply to expression against the well-known position of the Society so lately confirmed by London Yearly Meeting and more than one plea for force as "the ultimate compelling power" was heard.

The subject of temperance had sympathetic consideration as shown by the following:

The reports on Temperance were then presented. The subject had received special attention both north and south. Very few members in the Yearly Meeting appear either to use or sell intoxicating drink. Much of the work done related to the supply of drink to soldiers and sailors or their wives and dependants, which subject the Yearly Meeting's Committee had considered. They met in consequence of an appeal made by a Friend in Ulster through the Quarterly Meetings that Friends had a duty in the matter. It was proposed that a special appeal should be made to holders of brewery shares and to others directly interested in the trade. That had not been considered the best course, and instead it was decided to send a deputation to wait on the Under Secretary, and propose certain alterations in the regulations, such as the inclusion of Ireland as a "scheduled area," no wounded men to be supplied with intoxicants, soldiers to be in barracks at an earlier hour, and the payment of allowances to women in some cases to be through a trustee. The deputation had been courteously received, and shortly afterwards, whether as a consequence of Friends' action or not, some changes in the directions indicated had been made.

A minute was finally adopted approving of the "action taken by the Yearly Meeting's Committee, and recording the Meeting's opinion that total prohibition is the most effective legislative remedy for the evils of intemperance." Friends were also advised to be active in combating the evils of intemperance; and that as the Church of Christ has a service in earnest private and collective prayer to see that each takes his share in this portion of the campaign.

This concluded one of the most interesting and best sustained discussions on Temperance of recent years.

On Sixth-day afternoon a letter was read from W. C. Allen, of Philadelphia, conveying a message of sympathy and love to Friends in Ireland in the present severely testing situation and expressing regret that owing to the exceptional Government regulations, he and his wife were unable to attend the meeting.

A letter from women Friends in Philadelphia to women Friends in Ireland was read. Both the letters and their messages were much appreciated, and great regret was expressed that W. C. and Elizabeth Allen had been prevented from attending.

The same afternoon the Statistical Returns were presented, showing a total membership of 2,310, an increase of 2. There had been 37 deaths against 20 births; 18 removals into other Yearly Meetings against 17 removals-in, while admissions had numbered 27 against 7 losses by resignation, etc.; 151 members were reported as "practically withdrawn," attenders number 267 in Ulster, 52 in Leinster and 22 in Munster. Naturally enough a note of discouragement was heard in considering the State of Society.

Two reported expressions with a voice of hope from a visitor from across the channel will make this clear:

Joseph J. Haughton felt that we must be conscious of a lack of power. Did we really want to see God more truly than ever before? When Paul saw Christ, he was henceforth a new man. When George Fox got a vision of God, he became a power in the land.

Charles E. Jacob felt his own great need was to know Christ personally. In the recent momentous experiences a good many had felt the nearness of God in a new way. If we realized His presence in our daily life, He would enable us, so that our words would be healing words, and we should be a power for good.

Henry T. Hodgkin felt that these times of sorrow had had the effect of drawing us all closer together. In the midst of it all the question arose, how were we to serve our Master? Have we, a little body of people, any service to render by which the discordant elements can be drawn together into a common life? How were we to become a unifying force? To do so we must have a unifying principle. In Jesus Christ men found unity. In Him alone, through the ages, men of different types had found their unity, and had worshipped Him together. It was His will to manifest Himself as the unifier through each one of His children, and as we each followed Him fully, bearing His cross, so we might each become centres of reconciliation.

Perhaps the greatest freedom of expression was felt and the most encouraging note sounded on the subject of education. An increased appropriation for Brookfield School was the outcome.

The Yearly Meeting has emphasized the curtailment of liberty due to the war and to the Sein Fein outbreak and Friends everywhere must feel deep sympathy for our brothers and sisters in Ireland.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WATSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

A SONG OF WHISKY.

Sing a song of whisky,

A pocket without pence;

A purse that's always empty,

A head that has no sense.

Four-and-twenty jailbirds

Under lock and key,

Curse the drink that cost them

The birthright of the free.

The Brewer in his counting-house

Is counting out his money;

The Bar-man in his parlor

Is eating others' honey.

While starving little children,

And women lean and poor,

In rags and broken-hearted,

Beg from door to door.

Sing a song of whisky—

Sound it all the time;

The horrid song of whisky—

Sorrow, sin and crime.

—Everybody's.

MARS vs. BACCHUS.—War grips not only bodies and purses, but habits and appetites.

Temperance and prohibition have changed from abstractions to edicts. A British banker writes: "This is no time for waiting on slow moral reformation of a people; Russia with a stroke of the pen has shown what can be done when a national vice hinders a nation's work." The ban on vodka heads the war list, in extent of uprooting; that on absinthe comes second; afterwards trail British and German tax increases, curtailed output, and restrictions on consumption.

Russia drunk to Russia sober is the outstanding example. From 9,233,000 kegs a year consumption dropped to 102,000 in first month of prohibition. Monopoly receipts dropped 98 per cent. But budget loss has readily been made up in multiplied power to pay other taxes, plus tremendous increase, individual efficiency and well-being. State savings banks deposits increased 325,000,000 roubles in first eight months of prohibition, against 7,000,000 increase a year before.

Lloyd-George said: "It is as if Russia added millions of laborers without expense of maintaining them." Of Russia's miners over 30 per cent. are gone to war, yet output has risen 30 per cent. The prohibition experience resembles that in West Virginia, whence 3,500 miners departed in 1915, yet the remainder worked 208 instead of 201 days, and increased State output 5,000,000 tons. Number of Russian factory fines has fallen 30 per cent. In the Moscow government, among 215,000 workmen total loss of time decreased 63 per cent., and after holidays and pay-days 92 per cent. Number of fires in eight governments fell from 3765 to 1839, 56 per cent. Moscow's 3000 beggars have virtually vanished. Sales of clothing, groceries, tools and livestock have largely increased. Many peasants for the first time own a clock or sewing machine.

Other belligerents have gone part way. France, beside banishing absinthe, forbids sale of spirits to soldiers, women and young people. Germany, besides restricting spirits and commandeering distilleries, cut her precious beer output first to 60 per cent. last Tenth Month to 48 per cent., now to 40 per cent.—with product pronounced disgustingly thin.

England is still taking over some distilleries, buying much of the alcohol output of others, and taxing general output hard. The drink industry is under the government Control Board, with retail hours cut to two short periods daily, certain areas taboo, and experiments in "dilution" with soft drinks.

Influences cross the sea. Remington Arms and duPont Powder seek munition workers. Both specify total abstainers.

Modern war spills much more blood,—but much less rum.—Taken from Boston News Bureau.

THE DANGER HOUR.—At the Raritan Copper Works in Perth Amboy, N. J., they studied their accidents and found that the time of greatest peril is the first hour of the day shift on [Second-days] and on the days following holidays. They have a General Safety Committee, which gets the facts and publishes them in a bulletin called the Ingol. Here is the Ingol's comment on the accident figures:

"To any man who can think in a straight line, these statistics mean just one thing. It is a plain fact, and we'll state it plainly. Drinking at night means foggy eyes and unsteady nerves next morning. Then the accidents pile up.

" We hold no brief for prohibition. What we are working for is safety. Cut down the booze, and as surely as day follows night you will cut down the accidents."

And this is only one case out of many. It is up to you, Mr. American Workman. Which will you have? Safety or whisky? You will not have both.—Collier's Weekly.

THE PRESENT STATUS OF PROHIBITION IN THE UNITED STATES.—We now have nineteen prohibition States, including Virginia, in which the law is to become effective Eleventh Month 1st of this year. Twelve of these States have adopted prohibition by popular vote. These are Arizona, Colorado, Kansas, Maine, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Virginia, Washington and West Virginia. The other seven became dry by legislative act. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Idaho, Iowa, Mississippi and Tennessee. Elections on this issue will be held in five other States this autumn—namely, in California, Montana, Nebraska, South Dakota and Michigan. Texas will probably vote on the question next summer and possibly other States also will "choose sides" for the future.

UTAH TO BECOME DRY.—The Legislature of 1915 enacted statutory Prohibition for that State. Governor Spry retained the bill in his possession until it was too late for the Legislature to pass it over his head and then vetoed it. In the Republican convention recently Governor Spry was defeated for renomination by N. L. Morris, a strong advocate of Prohibition. Both of the United States Senators, Smoot and Sutherland, turned turtle and lined up with the dries in favor of State-wide Prohibition. Other influential politicians who have been on the booze wagon for years past transferred their belongings to the water wagon. This action means that with scarcely a shadow of a doubt Prohibition will become effective in Utah inside of the next year.—The American Issue.

APPLYING ROOSEVELT'S LOGIC.—Colonel Roosevelt, in a letter which has been made public, says: "The time is ripe for the passage of the suffrage amendment. . . . Twelve States already have enfranchised women without producing to even the smallest degree any of the evils prospected."

Well, that sounds logical. But if, as Colonel Roosevelt says, the time is ripe for the suffrage amendment, because twelve States have adopted it, by the same reasoning, the time is more ripe for the passage of a Prohibition amendment, because nineteen States have adopted that policy.

In addition to this, there is dry territory in the other States of the Union, which, with the Prohibition States, makes four-fifths of the area of the Union dry. More than one-half of the population of the United States is living in Prohibition territory. No evil effects have come from the adoption of this policy by States, counties and cities, but there have been multiplied blessings.

The time is ripe for a Prohibition amendment to the Constitution.—The American Issue.

DRIVING THE SALOONS OUT OF PENNSYLVANIA is a tedious process, involved in many difficulties, because the business has been able so far to control the legislature. Some progress, however, may be noted by comparing statistics of five years ago with present conditions. In 1911, we had three dry counties. We now have eleven. We have 10,512 licensed saloons in the State, but this is fewer by 636 than five years ago. During the same period there has been a decrease of 101 in the number of wholesale houses. There are ten towns of more than 10,000 population that have banished the saloon. Mahanoy City, however, is not one of these, for while she has a population of more than 15,000, Mahanoy has more saloons per capita than any other town in the State, having one licensed grog shop to every ninety-five men—one saloon to every fifteen votes cast for Governor in 1914.

WETS AND DRYs.—The Anti-Saloon League in a comprehensive survey of the influence of the rum traffic and its connection with poverty, insanity, crime and prosperity shows that Pennsylvania has 9606 men and women in its poorhouses and that nine dry States with a population nearly twice the size of this State have but 7824 persons in pauper institutions.

The same dry States have 17,466 insane persons in asylums and Pennsylvania, with only about half the population, has 15,058.

In ten years industrial efficiency has increased in the dry States to such an extent that wages have gone up 103 per cent., and in Pennsylvania, a notoriously wet State, wages have increased but 53 per cent.—North America.

SINCE Colorado went dry, says Governor George A. Carlson, accidents in the State have decreased seventy per cent.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE subject of the shortage of labor and the consequent danger of older men and women laborers being overworked was brought forward at a recent Sidcot Preparative Meeting (England); the need in question met with a ready response on the part of two of the leading boys of Sidcot School, who spoke of the desire there exists in the school to be of service. The matter has since been taken up with enthusiasm, and a "service corps" of eighteen boys, under the command of the Head Prefect, J. Quartus Smith, acting in consultation with the Headmaster, has been organized to work on the land in the Winscombe district on two afternoons in the week as well as on alternate Seventh-day afternoons. Some of the older girls have also offered to help in weeding and fruit-picking. The rate of pay is 3d. per hour; the money earned will be devoted to one of the many existing agencies for the relief of distress. The boys, who are 16 years or more, voluntarily give up their share in the cricket of the summer term. During a sample week fifteen boys and six girls were employed; eighty-two hours of labor were given by the boys, in some cases in gardens which could not otherwise have been kept under cultivation.

AN appeal to Friends following the meeting of the Laymen's Missionary Congress, held in Washington some weeks ago, concludes thus:

We, therefore, urge Friends—

1. To an earnest study of the issues involved in the present world situation, and our own study in the face of the world's needs.
2. To a deeper and more intelligent prayer life, in the private closet, at the family altar and in our public meetings.
3. To a clear recognition of God's ownership of all that we possess, and our own place as stewards responsible to Him for its use.
4. To an enlistment of each one in the service of our King as whole-hearted and without reserve as that of the men of to-day to earthly powers.
5. To higher standards of Christian living and service for humanity, both in our own community and to the peoples far away.
6. To separation from everything that makes our power for service less than it ought to be, and a complete surrender to the leadership of the Spirit of God, in this time of opportunity and peril.

The following notes are taken from the Annual Report of the Ackworth School—the Westtown of England:—

The Report presented to the business meeting told of a full School of 180 boys and 125 girls, with no prospect of decrease. The excess of expenditure over income was £384, largely owing to the increased cost of coal and provisions; the house expenses alone were £741 more than in 1914, raising the cost per child to £50 ls. 3d. To meet the increased expense a charge had been made on each scholar of 30s. for the laundry. A more startling economy was the discontinuance of the "weekly pence" to the children, that time-honored benevolence dating from the first year of the School. A graceful donation of £700 had come from members of the Redfern family in memory of their brother, William B. Redfern, and a gift valued at £1700 from Sir James Reckitt, Bart., on the occasion of his golden wedding; also legacies of £500 and £200 from the late Agnes Smithson and Louisa Thompson. The report recorded the death of John Taylor, for forty years clerk of the works, to whose faithfulness, ability and incorruptibility Joseph Firth Clark and Wilfred Irwin bore testimony.

Frederick Andrews, the honored Headmaster who has now held the office for the term of forty years—more than any of his predecessors—gave his annual address in the afternoon. The shortage of four teachers on the boys' side had been made up by the prompt voluntary extra service of those who remained. Economies and self-denials in food had not been found to affect the health of the children, for last spring was the healthiest within memory. In matters educational fourteen scholars had been awarded the Senior School Certificate. The war had somewhat stimulated the interest in French. The natural history society had been active on both sides, and essay writing had been above the average. Attention had been given to the principles of Quakerism, and some of those not Friends had shown even more interest in these things than the full members. Appropriate reference was made to the death of Fred. Enoch, the brilliant old scholar lecturer.

The peace plank in the platform of the Republican party reads: "We believe in the pacific settlement of international disputes, and favor the establishment of a world court for that purpose."

This plank is so important that the history of its adoption is worth recording. We understand that the words were written, or rather dictated, by Richard Bartholdt, of St. Louis, when, because of the enormous number of peace proposals, the subcommittee had practically decided to ignore the question. Realizing the state of affairs, R. Bartholdt broke into the committee-room during its executive session, summoned some of his friends around him, and insisted on the insertion of some kind of a peace plank. When asked how it should be worded, he then and there dictated the words as they subsequently appeared.—Exchange.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Samuel W. Pennypacker, former Governor of Pennsylvania, died on the 2nd, at his home at Schwenksville, Pa. He was seventy-three years old. Governor Pennypacker for many years had been a foremost figure in Pennsylvania affairs.

The staff of the visiting physicians of the Philadelphia Hospital for Contagious Diseases has reached the conclusion that the germs of infantile paralysis float about promiscuously in the air. Food with which they come in contact is contaminated, they believe, and when the bacilli reach the intestinal tract through this medium the development of the disease begins. This opinion is the result of the study of scores of cases of the malady here. Other authorities in many parts of the country, however, maintain that the germs enter the body through the nasal passages.

One-sixth of the world's output of radium is made within seven miles of Phila. in a factory at Lansdowne, which is one of six plants of its kind in the world. It has a capacity of producing three grams of radium a year. The process by which the metal is made was discovered by Dr. D. H. Kahakjian, Assistant Professor of Physics in the University of Pennsylvania and a resident of Lansdowne.

Active work has been undertaken on the campaign of the Philadelphia Wool and Textile Association to increase the number of sheep and output of wool in Pennsylvania and the nation generally.

GENERAL.—Congress adjourned finally on the 8th, concluding a session lasting nine months and two days, and will not reassemble until Twelfth Month 4th, unless some emergency causes the President to call for an earlier date. In the Senate and House the concluding session was brief, devoted to bits of legislation and routine business that had been left over from yesterday's protracted sittings.

Ninety-two labor laws have been passed by Congress and State Legislatures during the past legislative year, according to a survey which was made public at New York by the American Association for Labor Legislation on the eve of Labor Day. "The most significant items in this legislation," says the Secretary, Dr. John B. Andrews, "are two national laws, one prohibiting the shipment in interstate or foreign commerce of certain products in the preparation of which the labor of children has been employed, and the other providing a model scale of workmen's compensation for personal injuries among Federal employes, of which there are now more than 480,000."

Evidence from the States in which women have voted goes to prove, says Thomas A. Edison, that with the ballot women are more fairly treated under the law, the working woman is better protected and social and moral improvement is accelerated.

The Bureau of Education opened a nation-wide campaign on the 1st to induce aliens to come to night school and learn English. The Commissioner of Education has designated men dealing with the immigrant's problems from every angle, to serve on a national committee of 100 to further the purposes of the campaign.

On the 4th inst., the President accepted for the Federal Government the log cabin at Hodgenville, Ky., in which Lincoln was born, in a speech devoted to an eulogy on the civil war president. Standing on a temporary platform at the foot of a hill topped by a magnificent granite memorial building housing the Lincoln cabin, he praised Lincoln as the embodiment of democracy.

John P. St. John, candidate for the Presidency on the Prohibition ticket in 1884, twice Governor of Kansas—1879 to 1883—and one of the most widely-known temperance advocates in the United States, died at Olathe, Kan., on the 7th. He was eighty-three years old and had been in failing health since a heat prostration two months ago while on a speaking tour.

Here and there one hears much talk about the children and the movies. Clergymen and others in discussing the matter make sweeping statements with reference to the number of children who go to the pictures and seem to be under the impression that children constitute the major part of those in attendance. The National Board of Review of Motion Pictures in co-operation with the People's Institute of New York has investigated this subject, however, and finds that children constitute but 17 per cent. of those present at the average exhibition. In the evening the audiences are almost entirely composed of adults.

FOREIGN.—The following is from Kingston, Jamaica: "Everybody is agreed that we have lost about 50 per cent. of our exportable crops for a year," said Governor Manning, after returning from a tour of inspection of the damage caused by the hurricane of the 16th ult. "Bananas are all down; in some parts of the country cocoa has been severely damaged; coconuts have been blown off trees and many of the blossoms have been blown off, too. I am hoping that most of the ground provisions have been spared."

According to a despatch from Nanking, China, one million persons are threatened with starvation and several hundred thousand have been rendered homeless as a result of floods which are raging along the Hwai River, in Anhwei Province.

Lieutenant Ernest H. Shackleton has rescued the members of his Antarctic expedition who were marooned on Elephant Island. Shackleton returned to Punta Arenas, Chili, with his men safe and well on board the rescue ship Yelcho.

The following is on the authority of a New York paper: "The kindness of the Turks toward their prisoners of war was one of the chief impressions gathered by Clarence Butler, of Grand Rapids, Mich., and William Hoffman, of Columbus, O., instructors in the American College at Beirut, Syria, on their 3000-mile journey that took them to Damascus, Jerusalem, Tarsus, Constantinople, Sofia, Budapest, Vienna and Berlin."

NOTICES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL.—By the latest decision of the Pennsylvania Board of Health, schools are at liberty to open whenever they wish, but they may not take children younger than sixteen before Ninth Month 29th. As nearly seventy of the pupils about to gather at Westtown would thus be excluded, it is practically impossible to assemble prior to this date, which will be Sixth-day. It is therefore probable that the School will open on Second-day, Tenth Month 2nd. Final notices may be expected about Ninth Month 20th. We will endeavor to get down to full work immediately on the opening of School. One of the week-end breaks will probably be omitted, the vacations may be cut somewhat, and School held a little longer in the Spring. But we will count on making up most of the lost time by more diligent work.

Several changes have been made in the Faculty. Annie B. Gidley was a year off for study and her duties as Assistant Principal will be taken by Edith L. Cary and Ida L. De Long. Elizabeth W. Paige, of Lynn, Mass., will supplement the Latin Department, and Caroline Nicholson of Richmond, Indiana, will take some of the German classes, filling her time with English and History. Alfred Lowry, Jr., has leave of absence to spend the year in the camps for the French prisoners in Germany. Frederick O. Tostenson will take his place. The two other new men are Eber Grant Spicer, who is a graduate of the Massachusetts Agricultural College and has had many years of successful experience with boys, and Joshua Alban Cope, who is a graduate of the Yale School of Forestry and has been working on the Government Forest Reservations in Montana.

The group of house teachers who will have the chief care of the boys will be greatly strengthened by these additions to the men's faculty, and various changes will be rendered possible. It is proposed to have a class in Forestry, under Joshua A. Cope, and one in Agriculture for the younger boys by Eber Grant Spicer. Boys who are interested in these things will be encouraged to take their open air exercise in working among the trees or in the gardens and fields, under the oversight of these two men and of James F. Walker. These classes in out-door subjects, as well as those in Drawing, Manual Training and in Domestic Science, will be conducted on the regular lines of Vocational Training, and will count as part of the High School Course. Many colleges now give credit in their entrance requirements for a certain amount of such work.

THE TEACHER'S GUIDE.

About the school the children's voices rose
In joyful sound and filled with glad echoes
The wood. I stopped and viewed the happy throng.
"Am I the one to lead their feet along
The upward way?" I cried. I was dismayed,
And turned with haste into a woody glade.
There prone I fell and prayed. At length a voice,
Though still and small, did make my heart rejoice.
It bade me be as simple as a child;
Of worldly wisdom full, yet undefiled;
As gentle as the Christ; as firm and true;
A living model for the young to view.
I rose and hastened to the school, my face
Aglow from heart afire with new-born grace.
I saw the upward way before me shine,
And knew my guide must be the One divine.

KEEPING THE BALANCE OF TRUTH.

Whatever the difference in external conditions when one century is compared with another, and whatever the mode of expression in any age, there are certain truths that are perpetual, and certain concepts that have their foundation in that which is unchanging. Hence, our own age may derive some strength and confirmation in good from voices of the past, "echoing up" through intervening centuries or generations. The comfort of knowing a sure refuge and defense is as great and as real now as when the Psalmist wrote, "Be Thou my strong habitation, whereunto I may continually resort."

In view of the shakings and commotions now disturbing the world, some of us doubtless have need of "staying our minds" with the consideration of that which cannot be shaken; and we may find instruction in the language of George Fox's shepherding spirit, when in 1666 he wrote from "Lancaster gaol" an epistle "for staying the minds of such as might be hurried or troubled about the change of government."

"All friends. Let the dread and majesty of God fill you! Concerning the changing of times and government, let not that trouble any of you, for God hath a mighty work and hand therein. He will yet change again, until that come up which must reign, and in vain shall powers and armies withstand the Lord, for His determined work shall come to pass. But what is now come up, it is just with the Lord that it should be so, and He will be served by it. Therefore, let none murmur nor distrust God; for He will provoke many to zeal against unrighteousness and for righteousness through things which are suffered now to work for a season; yea, many whose zeal has been even dead shall revive again, and they shall see their backslidings and bewail them bitterly. For God shall thunder from heaven and break forth with a mighty noise; His enemies shall be astonished, the workers of iniquity confounded, and all that have not on the garment of righteousness shall be amazed at the mighty and strange work of the Lord, which shall be certainly brought to pass. But, my children, look ye not out, but be still in the light of the Lamb, and He shall fight for you. The Almighty Hand . . . preserve and keep you whole, in unity and peace with Himself and one with another. Amen.

G. F."

Did George Fox and his friends then feel that they had nothing to do but to trust and be still? Never was human conduct farther from apathy or inertness, and their confidence in the Divine Sovereignty never released them from personal efforts for the realization of the Kingdom of Heaven in the practical affairs of this life. However deficient in analysis might be their position in regard to changes of government, it was not intended as a doctrine of fatalism. The burden of mutual responsibility in society pressed constantly upon them and none were more active and alert than they to fulfill its demands themselves and to urge its claims in every direction. Rulers and officers of every class were boldly addressed in the interests of righteousness and order, and on behalf of the persecuted and oppressed; and King Charles II. received some plain words concerning his own duty and the rights of his people.

"King Charles," thus wrote George Fox, "thou camest not into this nation by sword nor by victory of war, but by the power of the Lord. Now if thou dost not live in it, thou wilt not prosper. If the Lord hath shewed thee mercy and forgiven thee, and thou dost not show mercy and forgive, God will not hear thy prayers nor them that pray for thee."

The letter contains further admonition and warning as to what would follow if the King should "uphold persecution," or should "bear the sword in vain." But while King and Parliament and magistrates were thus entreated and admonished, those men who claimed ecclesiastical authority were not overlooked. "Many ways were these professors warned, by word, by writing and by signs; but they would believe none till it was too late."

Further than this, those "Quaker worthies," mindful of what they owed to their cause to clear it of unjust charges and wrong judgments, would publish their principles abroad, and the "Declaration against plots and fighting" reveals the animus of their labors and their zeal. "Our principle is," said they, "and our practices have always been to seek peace and ensue it; to follow after righteousness and the knowledge of God; seeking the good and welfare [of all], and doing that which tends to the peace of all."

Thus were all aspects of the case regarded by Friends; and as they sought to discharge their responsibilities to the public, to "those in authority" and to one another, they could then with "confidence and quietness" leave the final events and the cause they cherished in the hand of Providence. In the repeating of history to-day, there is ample justification for the industrious and courageous labors of many of the friends of peace and friends of Truth; yet to seek after Divine help, and to endeavor to maintain faith and quietude, will be part of that fervency of spirit which the apostle enjoins upon us in close connection with being "not slothful in business," each having its place in the great essential of "serving the Lord."

TESTIMONY OF ISAAC PENNINGTON.

"Concerning the Seed or inward Principle, whereby Life is begotten and maintained in the Heart." (Text abridged.)

[Many therefore of his disciples, when they heard this, said, This is an hard saying; who can hear it? John vi: 60.]

The Lord God who is full of everlasting . . . compassion towards mankind in general, but more especially towards those in whom he hath begotten a sense of want of him; . . . hath chosen a seed or inward principle of life to appear in

. . . Many who have been overwhelmed with misery and whose spirits have melted and failed with the want of the sense of their God, have felt this principle revealed in their hearts.

Now the main thing necessary toward the redemption of the soul, . . . after the revealing of this principle, and some sense and feeling of it, and the turning of the mind towards it, [is] to wait to be made more and more acquainted with it, . . . and to be guided by it.

For though this principle be all life, yet it is at first but as a seed, and the appearance of the Lord in it is but as in a seed; very little, low, weak, hard to be discerned, easy to be overlooked and despised, and some greater and more undeniable appearance expected. Yet that is not the way, but the soul must become subject unto, and bowed under this little appearance; and so as the seed gets advantage and grows bigger . . . in thy heart, the appearance of the Lord will be greater and fuller there. But to look for the greater appearance, before the seed be owned and received in its lesser appearance, . . . is not the way of God, but the deceit of the enemy, whereby he would destroy the souls, . . . which he certainly will do, if he can keep the seed from growing there, and the soul from joining with and growing into it.

Therefore watch to feel the savour of life in thy heart day by day, and therein to feel leadings and drawings from the life, suitable to thy state; for in this savour and in these drawings, rises the true light, which leads into the way of life. And then watch against the reasonings and disputations which the enemy will raise in thy mind, who will strive to make thee a judge over these drawings; whereas the light which ariseth in the savour and in the drawings is thy King (though in this low appearance) and not to be judged by thy mind, thoughts and reasonings, but to judge them all down, and be bowed unto and obeyed by thee. And consider, in the weight of thy spirit, art thou (in thy darkness and with thy earthly mind) fit to be a judge concerning the light which ariseth in thee? Or rather, is not the light, in its lowest and weakest appearance, appointed and fitted by the Lord to judge thee, and make thee bow down in fear and trembling before it? And thy crown (thou in thy highest exaltation) is to be cast at the lowest footstep thereof; and then it will in some measure, thou lying at the foot thereof, and bowing in spirit before it, enter into thee, and enlighten and quicken thee. But in thy being wise about it, or taking upon thee to judge concerning it, it will stand at a distance from thee, and leave thee in thy darkness and captivity.

Therefore consider where thou art, and breathe into the Lord to reveal that unto thee which is proper for thee at present, and to bow thy spirit under His present will and manifestation to thee.

And be content to be little and low, and to receive little and low instructions from God, and to walk in the path of brokenness and humility before the Lord; for this is His way of fitting for and advancing into the high and glorious power of His life. And this my soul is assured of, that none shall enter into or abide in His kingdom, but as they become little, poor and naked, and as they are led by the little child of God's begetting, who not at all answers the wisdom of man and his expectations, but still confounds them, and leads on in such a path as, if the eye of man's wisdom be open, it will still be crying out it can never lead to life. Yet that which disputeth not, but believeth, at seasons feels a progress, and that the growth of life had advantage in the heart by those very things which at present seemed to give death the advantage.

Therefore watch against thy understanding, and all the workings thereof, as ever thou desireth life; for it will still betray thee, and either keep thee from the way, or turn thee out of the way, whenever thou hearkenest to it. And mark this, that which God sows and brings up in thee is a sensible plant, not a knowing mind; and thy right judgment is only in the sensibleness of that plant, and not in the understanding or comprehension of thy mind; yea, that sensible plant (which thy wisdom will be very apt to despise and perk over) must batter down and bring to nothing thy understanding, and grow up in the stead of it, if ever thy soul be made an habitation for the life. Therefore sink into the feeling, and dwell in the feeling and wait for the savour of the principle of life, and the touches and drawings of the savour, and walk along in it towards the land of life, parting with it, and leaving behind thee whatever the savour of life disreliseth; and entering into and taking up whatever the savour of life reliseth, that thou mayest be prepared for the Lord, and the glorious appearance of His spirit in thee.

And as thou art led into this, and cometh subject to this, so wilt thou taste the Lord, and feel the sweetness of His ointment, and the peace of His nature and the joy of the beginnings of His kingdom in thy heart, and the blotting out of thy iniquities for His name's sake. For though the enemy may lay a load upon thee, and fill thee as much as he can with his filth, and lay it close to thy charge, inasmuch as thou art not able to acquit thyself at all, but art as ready to charge thyself therewith as the enemy is to charge thee, yet the Lord considereth the seed he hath sown in thee, and the desire which he hath wrought in thy heart to be joined therewith; and he knoweth whence the stirring of this mind is, and how weak thou art in this hour of thy darkness and captivity; and the intent of his heart is to deliver thee from all this, and not to condemn thee for it.

But oh! take heed of limiting the Lord to give forth so clear a light, as the natural understanding will be judging necessary! but be content with the light which ariseth in the savour, and shineth inwardly to thy spirit in the drawing; and be subject and bowed under the light of the drawing, though ever so much against the light of the creaturely understanding and the reasonings thereof.

Clearness of light is a state which is to be grown up into; but before thou comest to this, thy understanding must be darkened, confounded, and brought to nothing; and thou canst not have such a clearness there, while it is confounding. There is, indeed, a true clearness in the principle of life (proportionable to its state and growth) even then; but the reasonings of thy dark mind will be continually overclouding and overbearing it (as if it were darkness, and not the light) and will prevail, unless thou be kept in the savour and suffer not thy understanding to judge, but keep it under the judgment of the savour. Mark, therefore, heedfully this which follows:

The first work of the Lord is to confound the knowledge and understanding of the creature; especially in those who have been deep in wisdom and experience of things; for if they were not closely pursued with darkness and confusion, they would presently be gathering a stock into the old storehouse again, and so grow wise after the flesh and never learn the life of the Spirit. Now, in this work of confounding, how can the leadings of God's Spirit be manifest and clear after the flesh, and to the fleshly understanding? Yea, if they were manifest after this manner, how were it possible to withhold the fleshly part from drinking them in? And so the man would live again but the seed not live, which gains its life (and being, and form, and perfection) in the man, by the death of the man; even by the man's being hunted, and battered, and broken out of his wisdom and knowledge and reasonings and comprehension; and becoming as a fool or child, being able to know nothing, nor retain nothing, nor perform nothing, nor keep his standing, but still as he is led, and taught, and created, and preserved in the power, and by the presence of the life.

A MONTHLY MEETING AT WESTTOWN.

FRANCIS R. TAYLOR.

For a people whose instincts would naturally lead them to true preparedness in every phase of life, Friends are, in some particulars, peculiarly neglectful of right opportunities. Philadelphia Friends are rightly wary of school-bred "Reverends" and scholastic degrees of divinity, but that same caution, carried to excess, stultifies the teaching of the Bible and Church history. No one denies in these days that a knowledge of both, call it "head knowledge," if it be, is an aid and incentive to the spirit underlying the narrative. A map of Paul's journeyings or of the Crusader's Palestine may not be inspired writ, but they are valuable vade mecum to the student of the Acts or of Peter the Hermit. In educating for the "duties of life" it is possible to hold too closely to the commercial, domestic or professional duties and to blink the fact that our theory of Church government (which we believe to be the apostolic theory revived) includes as a part of the "duties of life" a share in the burden of Church government, in addition to the share in the economic life.

Our housewives and business men are expected to be fathers and mothers in Israel. Granted! Now what are we doing to develop them for it? Our Church government is in theory the acme of democracy. Admitted! What is it in practice?

Those of us who attended Friends' Schools in the grammar grades were escorted to mid-week meeting by our teachers, and once a month listened to the routine of Preparative or Monthly Meeting "business." Perhaps no effort was made to explain the why or the wherefore, and the mysterious and impersonal sameness of it used to impress me, at least, with an awe worthy of some obscure ritual or occult rite. To listen in suppressed silence, to be thankful when there were only four queries instead of eight (or nine now) and to whoop for joy when released—such was Monthly Meeting twenty years ago and mayhap to-day to a ten-year old boy.

Then came an unexplained change of policy, or better, lack of it in the educational system. Our thirteen-year old was sent to Westtown for four years of guarded education, and at seventeen graduated, having never been to a Monthly Meeting during the entire period. Then came four years of college, and at his majority he was certified fit for citizenship and business, perhaps an adept at athletics or socially accomplished, but without training or experience in Quaker or, if you will, Christian polity. He had had eight years of mid-week meetings, but no more training, teaching or experience in the theory or practice of Church government, whether apostolic, or congregational, than if the system, of which he was both a beneficiary and a product, didn't exist.

And the rest was inevitable. The duties of life,—domestic, commercial or professional, again absorbed him, and his meeting,—well, "those on the First-day of the week by our membership generally; other meetings not so well attended."

Enough of criticism, even though it come from one who loves and appreciates the school and the college involved. During the past decade Haverford College has encouraged its students to bring their certificates of membership to Haverford Monthly Meeting (re-established in 1905), and some have availed themselves of the suggestion, with mutual benefit.

I can see little reason why a similar expedient would not be beneficial at Westtown School. We take great care to admit only Friends, and require Clerk's certificates as to their membership. We are annually attracting students from a wider group of meetings both geographically and from the standpoint of Friendly practice. Pastoral, Conservative, Liberal, Revivalistic, Gurneyite, Wilburite and Little Body Friends are rightly welcomed to our beloved institution. Some of them have no conception of the Philadelphia type of Monthly Meeting, and probably very few of them understand its theory and its possibilities.

If we are right in believing that Eastern and Western Friends can profit by mutual understanding of each other, and if our theory of Church government is capable of great possibilities, why cannot we accept the opportunity to present to the stranger youths within our gates the theory and practice of a Monthly Meeting, at the same time that we are teaching our own children the significance of the system with which they have long been, perchance, unwillingly familiar?

Incidentally, the effect on our Monthly Meetings themselves would be highly beneficial. Instead of remaining the dread assemblies of cut and dried routine that many of them now are, concerned only with the minimum of duties upon which the Discipline requires a report to the Quarterly Meeting, they would experience a real growth of life in dealing with outside or community concerns such as the ancient order of things involved. The Monthly Meetings at Moorestown, Germantown and Haverford have significance for their communities, and perforce, present the worth-while subjects that appeal to men and women of ability, who would not be satisfied to attend a meeting concerned only with the selfish topics of the purely introspective type.

But to return to Westtown. There are many subjects peculiarly the concern of the students that suffer by too much Faculty or Committee interference. Unkept rooms, littered lawns, discipline and restraint are, by modern methods of pedagogy, looking more to self-control from within than from above. One must not expect too much from "Student Government" plans, but neither, on the other hand, should we exalt the birch and ignore the wholesome influence of the school "leaders." This influence is very real to the school boy. "Arthur" is a beneficent factor at other schools than Rugby, and in all generations. Happy the school that has a wholesome run of "Arthurs" in a succession of Senior Classes.

But what was (and is) Arthur but the best type of Overseer—his influence and his power the greater because unconscious and unassuming. Four years of school life rarely pass without developing a few such spirits, and the unerring allegiance of boyhood readily discriminates between the good and the bad influence, even though it follows the latter.

I do not believe the South lawn at Westtown can be permanently free from paper, banana peels and apple cores until the boys undertake it, and the undertaking would be worthy of a Monthly Meeting concern. How frequently are our youth reminded of the children in the early days who maintained the meetings on the ruins of their demolished houses, when all the adults were in English jails! Their responsibility fitted them to their undertaking. Each Westtown generation sees better equipment and greater facilities, but do we require the assumption of responsibility that any true educating involves or do we always grant the opportunity to assume responsibility?

A Monthly Meeting at Westtown would not work miracles, but it would educate. It would not register 100 per cent. perfect attainment, but what Monthly Meeting does? It would present many problems, unique problems, but so does every other new departure. These problems are interesting, but would require too lengthy discussion for this article. If the object is worth while, the curriculum of the School and the organization of Concord Quarterly Meeting could easily be adapted for the purpose without burdening either one. One can hardly doubt that good would result from sympathetic, uncompulsory association in the actual practice of Church government by earnest, sincere girls and boys, handling their own problems in conjunction with their teachers and friends, and learning, early in life, to assume some of the responsibilities and obligations of social existence as well as the benefits stored up for them in an ever-increasing degree by generations of loving, sacrificing effort at our beloved Westtown.

IF YOU WOULD PROFIT.

If you would profit in the way of God, despise not the day of small things in yourselves; know this, that to desire and sincerely to breathe after the Lord is a blessed state. You must seek, before you find. Do you believe? Make not haste; extinguish not those small beginnings by an over-earnest or impatient desire of victory. God's time is the best time; be you faithful and your conflict shall end with glory to God, and the reward of peace to your own souls. Therefore love the judgment, and love the fire; start not aside, neither flinch from the scorings of it, for it will purify and refine you as gold seven times tried; then cometh the stamp and seal of the Lord upon His own vessel, holiness to Him forever, which He never gave, nor will give to reprobate silver, the state of the religious worshippers of the world. And herein be comforted that Zion shall be redeemed through judgment, and her converts through righteousness; and after the appointed time of mourning is over, the Lord will give "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Then shall you be able to say, "Who is he that condemneth us? God hath justified us; there is no condemnation to us that are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

Wherefore, my friends, walk not only not after the fleshly lusts, but also not after the fleshly religions and worship of the world; for that which is not born of the Spirit is flesh; and all flesh shall wither as the grass, and the beauty of it shall fade away as the flower of the field, before God's Sun that is risen, and rising. But the Word of the Lord in which is life, and that life the light of men, shall endure forever, and give life eternal to them that walk in the light.

And I entreat you, by the love you have for Jesus, have a care how you touch with fleshly births, or say Amen, by word or practice, to that which is not born of the Spirit; for God is not to be found in that, in yourselves or others, which calleth Him Father, and He hath never begotten it in them; that latitude and conformity is not of God, but secretly grieveth His Spirit, and obstructeth the growth of the soul in its acquaintance and intimate communion with the Lord.

WILLIAM PENN.

If we are going to have peace, it must be proclaimed by the common people. We shall not have peace till they understand that it is their interest as well as their duty. When that time comes, we shall have peace guaranteed so that no tyrant can move it.—HENRY WARD BEECHER.

GOD BLESS US EVERY ONE.

"God bless us every one!" prayed Tiny Tim,
Crippled and dwarfed of body, yet so tall
Of soul, we tiptoe earth to look at him,
High towering over all.

He loved the loveless world, nor dreamed indeed,
That that, at last, could give to him the while,
But pitying glances, when his only need
Was but a cheery smile.

And thus he prayed, "God bless us every one!"—
Enfolding all the creeds within the span
Of his child-heart; and so, despising none,
Was nearer saint than man.

I like to fancy God, in Paradise,
Lifting a finger o'er the rhythmic swing
Of chiming harp and song, with eager eyes
Turning earthward, listening—

The anthem stilled—the angels leaning there
Above the golden walls—the morning sun
Of Christmas bursting flower-like with prayer,
"God bless us every one!"

JOHN BRIGHT AND WAR.

MARGARET E. HIRST.

Wars upon native races always aroused Bright's deep indignation, and in this election campaign of 1880 he had for text not only the Afghan but the Zulu war. In allusion to both, he said, "I believe all wars are savage and cruel,—but I mean harsh and cruel wars on uncivilized or half-civilized men. When I read of transactions of that kind something always puts to me this question, What is it that makes, if anything makes, this needless and terrible slaughter different in its nature from those transactions which we call murder? . . . At most, in regard to either of these people, the case was one of suspicion, but was it right, upon a mere suspicion, that a country like this should send in the one case 20,000, and in the other 40,000 troops, to invade territories, and to put to death not less, perhaps, than 20,000 men engaged in the defense of their own country, which in our case we considered honorable and needful?" He had the courage on a later occasion to describe the Zulu warriors as men "who, if they had been of our nation, would have had songs written in their honor, and magnificent orations delivered in their praise, and their leading men who fell would have found, no doubt, a home for their bones and a tablet in Westminster Abbey."

In this same speech one passage is peculiarly characteristic of the tenderness which always underlay his abhorrence of war and oppression. Next to children, Bright loved animals, and his eloquence made the sufferings of the army camels an item in the indictment of the Disraeli Government.

"You know something of the untold miseries which war brings upon men and women and little children; but there is one point that nobody, so far as I know, has ever touched upon, that which has always had a certain interest for me, and which has excited my sympathy. I have seen in some of the narratives of the Afghan war that all the region round had been swept for camels as beasts of burden for the forces. What became of the camels? The least number I have heard it put at was 30,000—it has been reckoned as high as 40,000 or 50,000 camels, who have perished in these expeditions. One of our greatest poets in a beautiful stanza, has one line where he says, 'Mute the camel labors with the heaviest load,' and though the camel is not able by any voice of his to make protest or complaint, yet the burdened, overdriven, exhausted, dying beast—I cannot but believe that even the cruelties inflicted on him will be found written upon imperishable tablets by the recording angel."

The general election of 1880, marked by Gladstone's great Midlothian campaign, ended in a decisive victory for the Liberals. Bright again entered the Cabinet, but his tenure of office was not to be long. With his colleagues he became involved in the deplorable South African policy, and cannot be acquitted of a share of responsibility for the errors and delays which culminated in the disaster of Majuba Hill. But when he awoke to the facts, he was one of the strongest influences for peace and conciliation. Indeed, if hostilities had been continued, the Cabinet would in all probability have lost both Bright and Chamberlain. The discoveries of the mistakes of this year had probably aroused his vigilance, for he became a strong opponent of the Cabinet's Egyptian policy, although in this struggle he stood alone. When the bombardment of Alexandria took place he resigned. The only wonder is that he delayed so long, but Gladstone had repeatedly assured him that the negotiations would have a peaceful end, and he was very reluctant to embarrass a Government, to some of whose members he was bound by ties of old and intimate friendship.

What then had he accomplished in the cause of peace during almost fifty years of political activity? Throughout his life he had stood firmly for principles of foreign policy, which were profoundly unpopular when he first advocated them, yet became the admitted maxims of the British Government for many years of the nineteenth century. He denounced secret diplomacy and entangling treaties, and the heedless spirit which goes to war for prestige or intervenes in quarrels where the country's interests are not involved. With Cobden's help, he taught the nations to know one another better, and showed them the folly of the panic-breeding competition in armaments. When Lord Derby, in 1878, declared that "the greatest of British interests is peace," he showed himself a pupil in the school of Bright and Cobden. But it needed less wisdom to draw this moral after the object lesson of the Crimean War and the convulsions of Europe during the '60's and '70's. Bright had the courage and insight to teach the principles of peace in the midst of the fury and madness of war.

It was a common sneer of their opponents (even echoed by Tennyson) that Bright and Cobden's advocacy of peace was based on the fear of the mere monetary and commercial losses of war. Bright had lived through the years following Waterloo, and he had seen the abject wretchedness of the mass of the people, due to the pressure of war debt and war taxation. As he said, he cared for the condition of the people among whom he lived, and the impulse of pity and indignation inspired his opposition to the Corn Laws and to war. In his old age he wrote, "In war the working-men find the main portion of the blood which is shed, and on them fall the poverty and misery which are occasioned by the increase of taxes and damage to industry." The economic arguments against war are neither ignoble nor unpatrician, and Bright never shrank from employing them. But the moral argument fills and colors every speech which he made. This duty of his teaching may be closed by the peroration from perhaps his most characteristic speech.

"I do most devoutly believe that the moral law was not written for man alone in his individual character, but that it was written as well for nations, and for nations great as this of which we are citizens. If nations reject and deride that moral law, there is a penalty which will inevitably follow. It may not come at once, it may not come in our lifetime; but rely upon it, the great Italian poet is not a poet only, but a prophet when he says,

"The sword of heaven is not in haste to smite, Nor yet doth linger."

We have experience, we have beacons, we have landmarks enough. We know what the past has cost us, we know how much and how far we have wandered, but we are not left without a guide. It is true we have not, as an ancient people had, Urim and Thummim, those oracular gems on Aaron's breast—from which to take counsel, but we have the unchangeable and eternal principles of the moral law to guide us, and only so far as we walk by that guidance can we be permanently a great nation or our people a happy people."

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, SIXTH PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

[The two papers contributed to former issues of THE FRIEND concerning "Secret Societies," and given under the title "Were our Fathers Wrong?" have suggested the following, taken from an Exchange.—Eds.]

The following is the concluding portion of a letter of John Quincy Adams to the Boston Press:

The use of the name of Washington to give an odor of sanctity to the institution as it now stands exposed to the world is, in my opinion, as unwarrantable as that of my father's name. On the mortal side of human existence there is no name for which I entertain a veneration more profound than for that of Washington. But he was never called to consider the Masonic order in the light in which it must now be viewed. If he had been, we have a pledge of what his conduct would have been far more authoritative than the mere fact of his having been a Mason can be in favor of the brotherhood.

Treating of the order of the Cincinnati—a secret society composed of soldiers of the Revolution—Thomas Jefferson says: "The uneasiness excited by this institution had very early caught the notice of General Washington. Still recollecting all the purity of the motives which gave it birth, he became sensible that it might produce political evils, which the warmth of those motives had masked. Add to this, that it was disapproved by the mass of citizens of the Union. This alone was reason strong enough in a country where the will of the majority is the law, and ought to be the law. He saw that the objects of the institution were too light to be opposed to considerations as serious as these; and that it had become necessary to annihilate it absolutely. On this, therefore, he was decided. The first annual meeting at Philadelphia was now at hand. He went to that, determined to exert all his influence for its suppression. He proposed it to his fellow-officers and urged it with all his powers. It met an opposition which was observed to cloud his face with an anxiety that the most distressful scenes of the war scarcely ever produced. It was canvassed for seven days, and at length it was no more a doubt what would be its ultimate fate. The order was on the point of receiving its annihilation by the vote of a great majority of its members." (Jefferson's Works, Vol. 1, page 418.) Owing to the influence of French envoys—who were greatly tainted with infidelity and filled with the spirit of Red Republicanism—the society, contrary to the ardent wish of Washington, did not disband, but it was modified. Jefferson's conclusive reasons for disapproval of such institutions are given in the succeeding pages of his works, and they are mostly equally applicable to all other secret orders.

If you wish to know what the pledge is, please to consult the recently published writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 1., from pages 416 to 422; and especially the paragraph beginning at the middle of page 418. I would earnestly recommend the perusal and meditation of the whole passage to all virtuous and conscientious Masons, of whom I know there are great numbers. If they wish to draw precepts for their own conduct from the example and principles of Washington, or from the deliberate and anxious opinions and solicitude of Jefferson, they will find in those pages lessons of duty for themselves which they might consider it as presumption in me to offer them. The application of the principles in a case not identically the same, but in every essential point of argument similar, and in many respects from a weaker to a much stronger basis, I would leave to their own discretion, though first divested of its passions. It is, in my opinion, an unanswerable demonstration of the duty of every Mason in the United States at this day.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

SOCIAL PROGRESS AND THE DARWINIAN THEORY:
A REVIEW.

The motive of a book is always interesting. The motive of Dr. Nasmith's Social Progress and the Darwinian Theory is especially interesting because it leads into the very thick of the causes of present-day happenings. The purpose of the book is to turn men from the long-enjoyed belief that war is biologically advantageous to the less-accepted view that war is biologically suicidal. Any one who reads first hand will in all probability be surprised with the reasonableness of the argument that supports this claim.

Physics is somewhat distant from the philosophy of force. It was, however, indirectly by way of the former that George Nasmith became unforgetably impressed by the latter. When a student in Germany he was so distressed with the militaristic aspirations, and the requirements of the military system then influencing the German people, that he determined to devote his life to combating the ideas that gave rise to the system.

The philosophy of force directs those individuals who have to do with the conduct of nations to consider antagonistic struggle between nations as the chief and proper method of natural selection. The worth of a nation is proportionate to its superiority in such struggle. According to Novikov, when commenting upon wars: "The doctrine that collective homicide is the cause of the progress of the human race."

Dr. Nasmith's views are based upon the thought of Darwin, whose doctrines, upon last analysis, afford the "force advocates" a precarious footing, but properly supply a most firm foundation to Dr. Nasmith's conclusions. It is true, man wars against inferior species and against his physical environment with a relentless energy. These facts are evident. But do species war within themselves? Nature affords few examples of productive intraspecies conflict, nor do the wars of man against their own kind contribute at all to man's "vital intensity." The organization of men and not their dissociation forwards allowable war against nature. Such is the conclusion that Dr. Nasmith obtains from the writings of Darwin.

Another difficulty is the oblivion of those who entertain the philosophy of force to the fact that the employment of intellect in affairs has proportionately decreased the efficacy of force, so that we see in this day, when intellect functions so widely, the sad exhibit of social troubles reduced not to the arbitrament of reason but to the decision of force and the strength of arms. These current views are readily traced to the philosophers of a recent generation, such as Spencer, Bodin and others equally proficient in the perversion of biological facts. For instance, Nietzsche says: "A good cause halloweth every war."

George Nasmith continually insists, on the contrary, that struggle between men always reduces the effectiveness of the contesting group, and that, conversely, it is organization, association and co-operation that produce "vital intensity." Most interesting is the intellectual revolution described in later chapters.

The results of the industrial revolution have at the present time, to a large degree, surpassed the most sanguine imaginings of the eighteenth century. In a similar way the results of the intellectual revolution which has already set in will completely surpass our present conceptions. So the prophecy runs.

International morality will agree with current individual morality and once for all prick the bubble of romantic conception of an unmoral, impersonal state. At this future time, Germany will see clearly that to fine France in 1870 one billion dollars was both disadvantageous and also unmoral. England will enjoy a similar education. In short, the doctrine of good-will between nations, international honesty, together with social fair dealing, will supersede the present unmoral program. The reason for the change will be due to the sudden realization of the simple truth that good actions are an advantage. Men may properly contend, as Lord Cecil contends, "That the action of the State toward other States ought to be the same as the action of an individual toward other individuals."—HOWARD W. ELKINTON, in the Westonian.

PACIFICISM VERSUS PASSIVISM.

H. A. OVERTRETT.

Most of us who are pacifists, I find, are pacifists only up to a certain point. When the point is reached, we cave in ignominiously and join the enemy. "You mean to say, do you," says the enemy, "that if the Japanese or the Germans were to land on our shores with a million men you would refuse to fight?" The scorn that flashes from the eyes of the militarist is too much for us. "Oh, in that case," we stammer, "of course." In short, we surrender.

We pacifists, I believe, ought to learn not to be frightened into so easy a capitulation. After all, one is not required by the laws of logic or by any other laws to answer every question by a simple yes or no. It is a permissible bit of tactics to answer a question by asking other questions. That is the course which the pacifist may well pursue when this trump question is asked about the hypothetical Japanese or Germans who are to land on our shores and shoot us all up.

But the question that may properly be asked at that juncture is one which most pacifists have no thought of asking for the simple reason that their pacifism is altogether too narrow and superficial. Their pacifism is the pacifism of "Don't kill," "Killing is hideous"—negative pacifism—the pacifism of the emotional shudder. It is the pacifism of "Don't disturb us in our gentle ease;" "The world is good enough as it is;" "Why kill, when you might have Fords and garden parties." It is not the pacifism of constructive social effort.

The constructive pacifist will speak thus: "Japanese land in America? Germans land in America? But why should they land?" And the militarist will answer: "Why should they not? Haven't they a thousand reasons to be at outs with us?" "Oh, well," says the pacifist, "if we are foolish enough to let the Germans or the Japanese be at outs with us, I suppose we'll have to pay the price." "I mean, of course," says the constructive pacifist, "that the question whether we are to go to war or not isn't to be settled on the day that a Japanese or a German horde threatens to land on our shores. It is to be settled long before there ever is the thought of any one's landing on our shores. If it is not so settled, why the pacifist may just as well shout 'Stop!' to the incoming tide as to presume by his mere hatred of war to keep war from coming. And when war comes he'll have to join in and pay the price with the rest of his foolish fellows. The pacifist, in short, who waits until war is upon him and then cries out in shuddering distress isn't a pacifist. He's just a belated foolish virgin."

"So the pacifist would fight if the Japanese landed?" asks the militarist with relief.

"He'd fight long before they landed. He'd fight while all the militarists were drinking toasts to patriotic peace and plenty. He'd fight for just human relations. For real pacifism is opposition to every least thing—every strained relation, every misunderstanding, every exploitation, every snobbish pride of race or country, every provincial prejudice—that makes for war. Pacifism, in short, is preparedness—long-range preparedness against group hatred and envy and malice and robbery and misunderstanding.

"Take the case of the Japanese," he continues. "While we are trembling in every militaristic limb of us lest the little brown men come over, what single effort are we making to understand what the little brown men really want in this world of ours? Doubtless their wants are not all 'nasty and brutish.' Doubtless among their wants are some that are as truly human and reasonable as our own. Doubtless, too, there are others that are not as admirable. It would be worth while, would it not, to attempt at least to find out what the wants were, to come to some measure of mutual understanding with this vigorous people across the sea? Instead of that what do we do? We hold the Japanese off at arms' length. We talk to them diplomatically—which means with veiled suspicion and with a minimum attempt at real understanding. We send over missionaries to convert them to the religion of the Brotherhood of Man, and in our daily talk and in our newspapers, we cast upon them the bitterness of our white man's contempt. 'America for Americans,' we snarl, and then piously, praying to a God that loveth all, we join peace societies.

"The point is that pacifism which is passivism isn't pacifism at all. The real pacifist is up and doing long before there are even rumors of war. Real pacifism, in short, is a constant constructive effort to set right the relations of men. And by that token there are very few real pacifists. There are plenty of emotional war haters, but very few who hate war deeply and understandingly enough to fight war while it is yet peace, to fight war while war is masquerading in the apparently harmless guise of national rivalries, protection tariffs, immigration restrictions, flag worshippings, nationalistic patriotism, snobbish leisure, and so on."

"And so," says the militarist.

"Your question is answered," says the pacifist. "If I, as a pacifist, wait resignedly until the Japanese or the Germans are ready to land on our shores, I shall have to go forth and take my medicine with all my equally foolish fellows. But if I'm a true pacifist, I shan't be waiting. I shall move heaven and earth to get things straightened out long before the landing. That's the job of the real, red-blooded pacifist. That's his job to-day—not a fretful crying out against this hideous war, not a helpless whine that war must cease, not a nervous stopping of the ears and shutting of the eyes—not any such Miss Nancy pacifism, but a pacifism courageously vigorous to get human relations straightened out, to get one's people out of their silly flag-worshipping provincialism into a frame of mind that makes for generous understanding, for mutuality, for common justice. Pacifism that doesn't accept that job, a job that requires the courage to tell men to their faces of their prejudices, their ignorances, their snobbishnesses, their stupid prejudices, their selfish lusts—pacifism that doesn't accept that bigger, more dangerous job isn't pacifism worthy the name."—N. Y. Post, Eighth Month 24, 1916.

THE HIDDEN PATH.

I sometimes think beyond the hills I know,
A little hidden, shady path must go,
And I one day will gladly follow on,
Seeking the garden end,—that lies beyond.

I'm sure all blossoms blow more wondrous there
Within this secret garden, sweet and fair,
And souls grow lovely like a perfect rose
Where ends the hidden path,—in God's dear close.

—FLORENCE VAN FLEET LYMAN, in the Springfield Republican.

It is always worth remembering that the money spent in one battleship would build a Harvard University and then leave enough to build a Tuskegee and a Hampton Institute. An arbitration costs perhaps $1,000,000. Lucia Ames Mead has called attention to the fact that "three weeks before Paul Kruger's 'ultimatum,' Joseph Chamberlain, British Minister, refused to refer the difficulties to an arbitration board of two Dutch and three British chief justices. Had he done so, England would have saved three years of bitterness, a setback to all local progress and reform, and the hatred of a people who lost 20,000 women and children in concentration camps; she would have saved $1,100,000,000, which might have given that third of England's population who are living in dire poverty on less than six dollars a week per family the following things:

- 100 Old People's Homes at $100,000 each.
- 1,000 Public Playgrounds at $50,000 each.
- 1,000 Public Libraries at $50,000 each.
- 1,000 Trade Schools at $200,000 each.
- 500 Hospitals at $200,000 each.
- 3,000 Public Schools at $100,000 each.
- 150,000 Workingmen's Houses at $2,000 each."

SEEKING AFTER GOD.

I said, "I will find God," and forth I went
To seek Him in the clearness of the sky,
But over me stood unendurably
Only a pitiless sapphire firmament
Ringing the world-blank splendor; yet intent
Still to find God, "I will go seek," said I,
"His way upon the waters," and drew nigh
An ocean marge—week strewn and foam besprinked;
And the waves dashed on idle sand and stone,
And very vacant was the long blue sea,
But in the evening as I sat alone,
My window opening to the vanishing day,
Dear God! I could not choose but kneel and pray,
And it sufficed that I was found of Thee.

DAVID E. SAMPSON.

Few Philadelphia Friends of the past forty years will fail to recall the face and figure of David E. Sampson. The following extract from a paper of his home town in North Carolina will be the first intelligence to many of his recent death in Winston-Salem on the afternoon of last Seventh Month 10th:

We pause to pay tribute to a choice spirit and noble character, just called from service among us to the higher life. A faithful, unselfish servant of his fellow-men and a prophet of the brighter day was David E. Sampson. Though physically blind for many years, mentally, spiritually and morally his sight was never dimmed. The vision of the "new earth" was ever before him and toward that final goal of the Christian soul he strived persistently. For nearly half a century as a minister of the Gospel of Christ he pointed men to the "new heaven," but he never forgot that they were living in an old world that is full of poverty, disease and injustice.

He was a champion of righteousness not only for the sake of saving men's souls for a home in heaven, but also for the sake of saving their lives to make better homes in the world. It was his burning desire to make the community in which he lived a little better place for children to grow up in and a little happier place for men and women to live in that contributed most to David E. Sampson's success in establishing here a Friends' meeting.

Until the end of time the seed which he planted will bear fruit. He did not live to see the coming of the "new earth" for which he looked, but he did live to contribute something fundamental and enduring to the forces that ultimately will bring the perfect day of truth and light and justice.—Winston Journal.

THE GLORY OF AGE.

"What is the glory of age?" I said,
"A hoard of gold and a few dear friends"
When you've reached the day that you look ahead,
And see the place where your journey ends.
When Time has robbed you of youthful might,
What is the secret of your delight?"

And an old man smiled as he answered me;
"The glory of age isn't gold or friends,
When we've reached the valley of Soon-to-be,
And note the place where the journey ends.
The glory of age, be it understood,
Is a boy out there who is making good.

"The greatest joy that can come to man,
When his sight is dim and his hair is gray,
The greatest glory that God can plan
To cheer the lives of the old to-day,
When they share no more in the battle yell,
Is a boy out there who is doing well."

JOSHUA ROWNTREE.

In an interesting article in The Friend (London), Edward Grubb reviews the recently-published life of Joshua Rowntree, an English Friend whose character and life ought to be better known in America.

"He was a man," says Edward Grubb, "whose real features the best of biographies can only very faintly and imperfectly portray. To us who were privileged to know him well, there was something quite indescribable in his character—its combination of rugged force with deep tenderness, of the loftiest and sternest ideals with profound humility, of passionate enthusiasm with sound judgment, of unwearied service for others with rich personal experience of inward rest. With all this was the unflinching and irrepressible humor which made him the life of any party of which he was a member—the humor of a soul at rest with the eternal realities—and which forbade him to take too seriously even himself and his own enthusiasms. He said of a distant relative, whom he had met for the first time, 'Being one of us, he sees exactly where the world is wrong!'"

"His niece and biographer, S. E. Robson, has been successful in seizing the salient points of his life's work—his almost life-long connection with the Adult School movement; his labors for the benefit of his townsmen, particularly the fisher folk; his brief Parliamentary career, when he sat as a Home Rule Member in the dark days of Irish Nationalism; his untiring opposition to the Opium Trade, which he just lived to see crowned with success; his efforts for Peace and Temperance. One thing that is not mentioned is the practical withdrawal of his life-long support from the Liberal Party, when he became convinced, in 1911, that it was inevitably drifting into war with Germany.

"Joshua Rowntree was too saintly a man to be really happy or successful as a Parliamentarian. The inevitable compromises of political life were profoundly distasteful to him, and he was too highly strung for the rough and tumble of the House of Commons. He saw too far ahead even to be popular in the large sense—as he found when in 1892, after six years of devoted service, his townsmen failed to re-elect him; and when in 1900 he narrowly escaped injury in the riots that ensued through his inviting the husband of Olive Schreiner to address a private meeting, in the hope of promoting a better understanding between the British people and the Boers. The dignified address to his fellow-townsmen which he drafted, and which was signed by those whose windows had been broken in the riots, finds a worthy place in this volume, and is accompanied by a very beautiful letter addressed to him by the late J. Keir Hardie. The fact that a cause was unpopular never stood in the way of his supporting it, if only he believed it to be for the true interests of his fellow-men. As J. Rendel Harris says in the Foreword:

"You might be sure he was at the forefront when hard or daring deeds had to be done, and that winning causes knew him at the end of their long day, and losing causes, or what seemed to be such, knew him in the strain of their long night."

"As a public speaker, Joshua Rowntree succeeded mainly through the fire of his passionate earnestness and sincerity. Sometimes halting at first, he would soon rise to heights of real eloquence as he pleaded the cause of the poor and the oppressed wherever they might be, and the tones of his voice still linger in one's ear as he drew from his wide experience pathetic illustrations of the sorrows that man inflicts on man. He had a profound belief that the heart of a working-class audience is nearly always sound, and he never hesitated to appeal to the best that was in men. His friend, E. Richard Cross, quotes this judgment of his public speaking:

"Lord Chief Justice Russell, who heard one of his Exeter Hall speeches, said of him that he only just missed being a very great orator; for, though he had no particular skill in arranging his thoughts, he had the much rarer gift of touching with sureness of power the springs of moral emotion in his audience."

"But it was not classes of people so much as individuals who drew from him the best that he had to give. There was no one who knew him, especially if poor and in difficulty, who could not find in him a wise and sympathetic counsellor, who could not be sure of getting the unstinted gift of his love and clear judgment as to the right course to take. Very touching is the story told by a friend:

"I remember once, when I was walking from the Valley on to the South Cliff at Scarborough, I came upon a little girl in tattered clothes who seemed to have lost her way. 'Please, can you tell me where Josepher Rowntree lives?' she said. 'I want him.'" As I look back, it seems to me that this was very much what we all felt."

"He rarely felt the call to speak in Friends' meetings for worship till after his retirement from Parliamentary life in 1892, but in his later years, before he was overtaken by illness, his vocal ministry was frequent and powerful and refreshing."

THE INDIAN AND HIS BASKET.—An incident associated with the recent pilgrimage of the Friends' Historical Society to John Woolman's birthplace is worthy of presentation.

We were told on that occasion that the Woolman tract at the juncture of the two branches of Rancocas Creek, was associated with the "Indian" story narrated in the following rhyme. It was known to some who listened to the recital that this same legend had been handed down to New England boys and girls as something that belonged to their local history. It is hardly likely that the same incident happened at two places and quite questionable indeed if it ever happened at all. A Friend tells us that she thinks it was written by a person named Williams, of Newport, R. I., who was a descendant of the kind-hearted farmer alluded to.

THE INDIAN AND HIS BASKET.

Among Rhode Island's early sons
Was one whose orchards fair
By plenteous and well-flavored fruit
Rewarded all his care.
For household use they stored the best,
And all the rest, conveyed
To neighboring mill, were ground and pressed,
And into cider made.

The wandering Indian oft partook
The generous farmer's cheer,
He loved his food, but better still
His cider fine and clear,
And as he quaffed the pleasant draught
The kitchen fire before,
He longed for some to carry home
And asked for more and more.

The farmer saw a basket new Beside the Indian bold,
And smiling said I'll give to you
As much as that will hold.
Both laughed, for how could liquid thing
Within a basket stay,
And yet the jest unanswering
The Indian went his way.

When next from rest the farmer sprang,
So very cold the morn,
The icicles like diamonds hung
From every spray and thorn;
The brook which babbled by his door
Was deep and clear and strong,
And yet unfettered by the frost
Leaped merrily along.

The self-same Indian by this brook
The astonished farmer sees,
First dipped his basket in the stream,
Then hung it up to freeze.
And by this process oft renewed
The basket soon became
A well-glazed vessel tight and good
Of most capacious frame.

The door he entered speedily
 And claimed the promised boon,
 The farmer laughing heartily
 Fulfilled his promise soon.
 Up to the basket's rim he saw
 The sparkling cider rise,
 And to rejoice his absent squaw
 He bore away the prize.

Long lived the good man at the farm,
 The house is standing still,
 And still leaps merrily along
 The much diminished rill.
 And his descendants still remain
 To tell to those who ask it,
 The story they have often heard
 About the Indian's basket.

NEWS ITEMS.

EASTERN QUARTERLY MEETING of Friends was held at Rich Square, Northampton County, N. C., Eighth Month 26th, the meeting of Ministers, Elders and Overseers having been held on the preceding day. This meeting was well attended and proved to be a time of deep searching of heart. Much good counsel was given and a desire was expressed that we might be more faithful in the future than we have been in the past to uphold and maintain the high profession which we make as true Friends.

Our beloved sister, Abbie A. Hollowell, of Wayne County, N. C., who is so afflicted that she has to use a crutch in walking, came one hundred miles that morning to be at our meeting. She was wonderfully favored in the ministry, for notwithstanding the fact that she has had few educational advantages, she preaches with the power and demonstration of the Spirit.

The Quarterly Meeting at large convened Seventh-day, at 11 o'clock. The Meeting was larger than usual. A living silence soon spread over us and many, we felt sure, felt their entire dependence on Him who has promised to be in the midst of all rightly gathered assemblies. The silence was broken by one of the Lord's anointed servants with these words, "There is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the end thereof is death." He was led to speak very feelingly. A young Friend in the body of the meeting soon followed with a lively testimony repeating the words of our Saviour as He wept over Jerusalem, saying, "How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!"

Our dear minister said she had been reminded time and again since they had assembled of a few lines which she read when she was a child. She tried to put them from her, but the promptings became more and more certain until she could not feel peace in her mind without expressing them. The application and results she thought might be left to Him who knows the hearts of every one. The lines are as follows:

"Come ye gay and thoughtless crowd,
 You must die and wear the shroud.
 Then, O then, you'll want to be Happy in Eternity."

"Though you deek your bodies so,
 Soon death's hand will lay them low,
 Then you'll cry and want to be Happy in Eternity."

Our dear afflicted sister followed with this searching text, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?"

After remaining for some time under a solemn covering of silence which seemed to be felt all over the meeting, it was thought a proper time to take up the annual business which precedes the Yearly Meeting. It was transacted in much unity.

The Representatives were present from the three Monthly Meetings which constitute Eastern Quarterly Meeting. One minister, who had previously obtained a minute to attend Ohio Yearly Meeting and Seipio Quarterly Meeting, N. Y., had his minute endorsed at this time.

A large number of both men and women Friends were appointed Representatives to our ensuing Yearly Meeting, which begins the first Seventh-day in Eleventh Month. The meeting solemnly concluded.

On First-day there were three meetings held for Divine Worship. Two of these were held at Rich Square and one at Cedar Grove. They were all favored seasons. At Cedar Grove the house was nearly full, made up largely of young people. Three ministers were very much favored to declare the everlasting Gospel with power and one was engaged in supplication, "returning praise and thanksgiving to Him who had been pleased to manifest Himself in our midst to the contriving and tendering of many hearts." Before the close of the meeting a young Friend near the middle of the house arose and addressed the young people in a very tender, touching manner. He encouraged them to be faithful to the manifestation of Divine grace while the day of the Lord's tender visitations is extended unto us. He had come twenty miles to be at that meeting. He said, "I could have attended meeting this morning with another denomination, but so strong were my impressions to come here, I could not put them aside. There is nothing quite so dear to me on this earth as being in a good Friends' meeting."

Many of the young people were tendered and contrited in heart. Such favored opportunities as these are not at our command. All of our members should be encouraged to be more faithful and more diligent in the future to make our calling and election sure, while time and opportunity are so graciously extended unto us.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The U. S. Department of Agriculture has made the following report on roads in Pennsylvania: "The total mileage at the beginning of 1915 was 91,555.84, of which approximately 10,000 miles, or 10.9 per cent, were surfaced. The State has a highly organized highway department, with 10,200 miles of road, designated as State highways, directly under its supervision and maintained at State expense. Contributions for maintenance were also made for some roads other than those designated as belonging to the State system.

The most magnificent of the palaces of the ancient Pharaohs, that of Merenpthah, has been discovered in Egypt by an expedition from the University of Pennsylvania Museum, according to a recent announcement. News of the excavation of the home of the Egyptian kings came to Philadelphia in a letter from Dr. Clarence S. Fisher, head of the Eckley B. Cox, Jr., expedition to Egypt.

Robert S. Bookings, of St. Louis, a native of Cecil County, Md., has established in Delaware College a loan fund for worthy students from Cecil County. This gift will open the door of opportunity to many a young man struggling for an education.

GENERAL.—Appropriations of the late Congress were brought to the grand total of $1,637,583,682, the greatest aggregate in the country's history and exceeding that for the last fiscal year by more than half a billion dollars.

Four treaties were ratified by the Senate. The most important were the long pending Niagara convention providing for the acquisition of a canal route and naval station rights in the bay of Fonseca for $3,000,000, and that ratified in the closing hours providing for the purchase of the Danish West Indies for $25,000,000. Another was the treaty with the republic of Haiti providing for an American financial protectorate. Also a treaty with Great Britain providing for protection of migratory birds on both sides of the Canadian border was ratified.

During the session of Congress just closed 17,800 bills and 642 resolutions were introduced in the House. Of these 252 bills became laws and 33 public resolutions were adopted, in addition to 150 private bills and resolutions passed.

Congress passed the act to appropriate $3,000,000 with which to continue purchasing national forest land in the White Mountains and southern Appalachians.

Under the United States flag there are now three railroads owned by the government—in the Philippines, in the Panama Canal zone and in Alaska. Future railroad construction in the Philippines must apparently be a State business.

Writing of the First American Congress on Child Welfare, which was organized by social workers in Argentina, and held in Buenos Aires in mid-summer, Edward N. Clobber, Northern Secretary of the National Child Labor Committee, takes occasion to praise the "breadth of vision" of the South American people, and to emphasize the "isolation" of the social workers of the United States in the development of distinctively American ideals in social welfare.

Study of the latest census figures recently showed that of the 13,000,000 persons of foreign birth in the United States, approximately 3,000,000, most of them men and women of voting age, were unable to understand English. Accordingly, the Division of Immigrant Education in the Bureau of Education began to promote special facilities for the illiterate foreigner.

FOREIGN.—Great simplicity marked the formal reopening on the 20th under Li Yuan-hung of the Parliament dissolved three years ago by Yuan Shi-kai. The new President, all the members of his Cabinet, with the exception of Tang Shao-yi, who has been named Minister of Foreign Affairs, all the foreign advisers and important Chinese officials attended without body-guard and were unmolested. President Li Yuan-hung and other prominent Chinese wore conventional European morning suits and high hats.

The longest petition ever presented to Parliament, arrived the other day from Ulster, Ireland. It was two-and-a-half miles long and bore the signatures of 115,000 persons who asked for the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors for the term of the war and at least six months thereafter in Great Britain and Ireland.

Aeroplanes are to be included in the equipment of an American exploring expedition that is setting out from Buenos Aires to study a little-known region which includes Mar Chiquita, a lake having an area of some one thousand square miles, located about 350 miles northwest of Buenos Aires.

NOTICES.

LONDON, Eighth Month 21, 1916.

TO THE EDITORS:—

A few weeks ago the writer called attention to the awful destitution among the refugees in Russia—those millions of men, women and children, who have fled from the clash of contending armies, leaving wide areas of devastated country behind them, and who are now suffering for want of the bare necessities of life. Food, shelter, clothing, medical care, medicines, nursing, are among their crying needs.

The Society of Friends (London Yearly Meeting) has since my last letter sent a number of its members to Russia and is about sending others. The Russian and English Governments are facilitating the operations of these brethren. These Friends represent some of the best professional skill and business life of England. They do not charge for their service—it is a labor of love. Among them are young graduates of English Universities imbued with a love for Christ and for their fellow-men. They face present perils of travel, disease and possible death, that they may mitigate the sorrows of the humble, helpless non-combatants who are the victims of cruel war.

The personal touch of Christian sympathy and advice is one of the most valuable parts of their work, and may be quite as important as the urgently required financial assistance. These English Quakers cannot conscientiously destroy human life, but they will endure much stress and hardship in order to save it.

In France alone, 108 of the Committee's workers have been established in thirteen centers in the ruined districts of the Marne and the Meuse. Maternity and general hospitals have proved an inestimable boon in districts where doctors and nurses have been commandeered for military service.

In seventy-five towns and villages, thousands of destitute have been relieved with food and clothing. Many huts have been built by the Committee's workers. Open-air classes have been organized for the children and work-rooms for women. Farmers have been supplied with seeds, live stock, tools and implements. The Committee's receipts up to about two months ago were £60,000, and the monthly expenditure was about £4,000. The sufferers to be relieved in Russia during the approaching Autumn and Winter are unthinkable.

The past work of this War Victims' Relief Committee in Belgium, France and Holland has been very great. Its successful and economical administration of monies committed to its care has induced many benevolent people to contribute who otherwise would feel cautious about doing so. The donors know that the money is well spent. The cost of the distribution of funds placed at the disposal of the Committee has only been about four pence to the pound, or about eight cents out of every five dollars. Such a business-like and careful administration of relief funds, to such an extent, is probably unprecedented.

The material blessings enjoyed by America may tend to veil our eyes from a view of the homeless and sorrowing millions of Europe. Will not those who read this appeal make haste to more largely answer it?

Contributions can be forwarded to C. Walter Borton, care of the Provident Life and Trust Company, 409 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., who will forward them to the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee in London.

"BETTER LIGHTING" AT TUNESASSA.—This long-needed improvement—installing Electric Lights—is being accomplished at Tunesassa.

Under plans approved by a competent engineer, an Electric Generator, Storage Battery and Wire System are now being set in place at Friends' Indian School.

This betterment will be appreciated, as oil lamps have been insufficient and unsafe.

We want to complete raising the sum of $1500, the contract price, before School opens, and would ask co-operation to that end. The Treasurer has already $432.

The Book Committee of the Representative Meeting has reprinted the Marriage Rules and Advice, as now appearing in the Discipline. To this is appended information concerning the legal requirements under the laws of the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland. The pamphlet is held in stock at the Book Store, to be had for the asking by any who desire to possess it.

In a recent issue of THE FRIEND on Ninth Month 7, an invitation was extended to open correspondence with friendless prisoners, held for longer or shorter terms in some of the many jails in our country.

Since our publication of this appeal we have received several mild protests. The appeal was made in the best of faith by those who have been identified with this good work for a considerable time, and who have known of those "whose burdens have been lightened and whose lives have been cheered by this simple means."

We recognize that the plan advocated is open to abuse and we have learned that it has been so grossly abused that those in authority in one of our large Eastern States have positively vetoed the plan.

We offer this information without comment. In proper hands it seems to us a channel for helping the helpless, but we would extend the caution which has come to us from those who have been identified with prison reform work for many years.—[Eds.]

THE MEETING.

Of the many poems and verses of Whittier in which he gives a peculiarly Quaker message and which have a decidedly Friendly tone and coloring, there is none that is so strikingly a Friends' message in verse as "The Meeting." It was written in his maturest style and is rich in its religious teaching.

It is with no expectation that any new truth is to be gleaned from it now that attention is directed to it, but the thought has come home with especial force that it is the fullest statement in concise terms Friends can turn to as an exposition of their simple form of worship.

The poet's guest, real or imagined, had attended the plain little meeting with him at Amesbury, and on the way home, the novelty of it having impressed the stranger—

"What part or lot have you," he said
"In these dull rites of drowsy-head?
Is silence worship? Seek it where
It soothes with dreams the summer air,
Not in this close and rude-benched hall,
But where soft lights and shadows fall,
And all the slow, sleep-walking hours
Glide soundless over grass and flowers!"
.....
Our common Master did not pen
His followers up from other men;
His service liberty indeed,
He built no church, He framed no creed;
.....
His sermons were the healthful talk
That shorter made the mountain-walk,
His wayside texts were flowers and birds,
Where mingled with His gracious words
The rustle of the tamarisk-tree
And ripple-wash of Galilee."

It is not the easiest of tasks to answer to our full satisfaction the question which the stranger puts, but the habit of attending meeting, having grown to a conviction that it is a service required of us, which we render gladly and which has become essential to our peace of mind, even then we find it a task to make clear to our questioner what Whittier's words make so simple to us.

Even if it were the outward self that asserted itself in worship it would be beyond our powers to make a satisfactory statement to our friend and questioner, but we see with Whittier that this part of our being is but a small portion of the whole and that part of our nature with which we are now concerned is the hidden self, in which our religious life is rooted and from which it must grow if it grows at all.

In this hidden part of our being we become conscious of the aspirations of others, of their soul's needs, we are made one with the hidden selves of these and with them are united to the Source of all.

This it seems to me is the most significant truth of the poem. It is not a principle that is easy of statement, it may be difficult to understand and to analyze, but when one becomes possessed of it, it is as natural a part of his being and of his life as are the arms and the feet of his body.

"Where, in my name, meet two or three,
Our Lord hath said, I there will be!
So sometimes comes to soul and sense
The feeling which is evidence
That very near about us lies
The realm of spiritual mysteries.
The sphere of the supernal powers
Impinges on this world of ours.
.....
The breath of a Diviner air
Blows down the answer of a prayer:—
.....
With smile of trust and folded hands,
The passive soul in waiting stands
To feel, as flowers the sun and dew,
The One true Life its own renew."

All worshippers of every name claim that God meets with them when they worship Him. This they claim is what constitutes worship. Their forms of approach vary, but their objects are not various. The Friends, however, put it to a test, as very few others profess to do. Who can know, they say, what He will have for us. We cannot read His mind. One can prepare a discourse and hand forth helpful counsel to others, but it is beyond our ken to know what will happen when our spiritual life has become united in worship with the spiritual life of others, and when all have become melted in the melting-pot which derives its virtue from the Source of all.

The Friends' meeting, if true to its ancient pattern and true to the thought as Whittier expresses it cannot be programmed. The most essential thing is ignored in such planning. The fundamental idea of linking soul with soul in spiritual communion and with the Over Soul of all is ignored by such a practice.

It cannot be that a thing so essential to our well-being as worship should be difficult of attainment. The things that man must have in this life God has not made especially difficult for him to obtain. If worship is real it must be profitable and it must yield a return. The test of its genuineness may be measured in part by the richness or poverty of this return. Whittier's test is the Scriptural one.

"So, to the calmly gathered thought
The innermost of truth is taught,
The mystery dimly understood
That love of God is love of good,
And, chiefly, its divinest trace
In Him of Nazareth's holy face;
.....
That worship's deeper meaning lies
In mercy, and not sacrifice;
.....

That the dear Christ dwells not afar,
The king of some remoter star,
Listening, at times, with flattered ear
To homage wrung from selfish fear,
But here, amidst the poor and blind,
The bound and suffering of our kind,
In works we do, in prayers we pray,
Life of our life, he lives to-day."

Wonderful attainment! we may well say, who can reach to such an exalted standard?

The coming together is not worship; we all know this. The thinking of good thoughts is not worship, no more is the delivery of a good sermon or the listening to it; these and many other items may be important adjuncts to worship, but they are none of them, nor all of them, put together, worship.

We cannot claim that Friends are fundamentally different from others in their definition of worship, but in what leads up to it, and in the outward helps to worship we claim that there is a difference that is fundamental. Whittier's conception of this does not lose sight of the essential adjuncts. If in worship as we have tried to say there is a fusing together of the spiritual natures of those assembled and the felt and brooding Presence of God's Spirit over all, there must be nothing that tends to mar this, and as the mind cannot pass abruptly from one state to another, there must be a preparation for public worship.

"So, where is neither church nor priest,
And never rag of form or creed
To clothe the nakedness of need,—
Where farmer-folk in silence meet,—
I turn my bell-unsummoned feet;
I lay the critic's glass aside,
I tread upon my lettered pride,
Confess the universal want,
And share whatever Heaven may grant.
He findeth not who seeks his own,
The soul is lost that's saved alone.
Not on one favored forehead flid
Of old the fire-tongued miracle,
But flamed o'er all the thronging host
The baptism of the Holy Ghost;
Heart answers heart; in one desire
The blending lines of prayer aspire;
'Where in my name, meet two or three,'
Our Lord hath said, 'I there will be.'"

It is an honest conviction that the times to-day call as emphatically for what Whittier advances in this poem as ever has been the case in the Society's history. As the circumstances of the lives of not a few of our members lead them away from the folds where they have been shepherded, they find other Christians zealous for the advance of the Master's kingdom and devotedly attached to the observances of their respective churches, but who are always willing to listen to the Friends' plea for a "silent meeting," and who feel and own the power of such a meeting when it has been held in the spirit portrayed in the poem.

In an unseen but a very real union of heart to heart, if we seek after the object for which the meeting is being held, we shall obtain it in greater or lesser degree and shall know of an inrush of power from beyond ourselves, which is what we must all depend upon to nourish up our souls unto that life which is the goal of our earthly pilgrimage.

THE PUBLIC MEETING FOR WORSHIP.

The following is a paper read recently by Alvin T. Coate in a Friends' meeting-house in Indianapolis. It was published in The American Friend, Eighth Month 31, 1916, at the request of several who heard it. It has only come to the notice of the writer of the foregoing paper since he finished his comments on Whittier's "The Meeting," and calls to mind a story narrated in his presence in the Whittier home at Amesbury many years ago, which may be repeated here.

A group of Philadelphia Friends had spent a day in the Merrimac neighborhood and late in the afternoon were in the little Amesbury home, in the poet's study. Our host looked us over and said, with a shade of merriment in his tones, "I should like to tell you of my visit with Uncle Greenleaf to an 'experience meeting.'" We were glad to hear something that concerned the poet which had never gotten between the covers of a book and our host continued: "We happened to be together many years ago in _____, when, on a certain evening, learning that there was to be a religious meeting near our hotel, held in the order of a revival meeting of thirty years ago, I asked him to go with me. He yielded to my request with considerable reluctance. We were quite late in arriving and I never knew what had transpired before our entrance, but we slipped into a rear seat and I know he hoped we were not noticed. But to his great discomfort we were soon seen; and as he was well known to many in the company, urgent appeals were made that he come forward and occupy a prominent seat.

He declined the invitation and we remained in our inconspicuous corner, feeling sure, however, that the information had spread throughout the meeting that the Amesbury poet was present.

I have always fancied that the fervency of the speakers was augmented because he was known to be there and when he leaned over to me and requested the loan of paper and pencil, which I gladly furnished, many interested glances were turned our way.

At the close of the meeting many requested a copy of what had been written, which my uncle gently declined to offer, saying it was of no value and of no interest, but finally to one a little more insistent than the others, and as I thought at the time a little more in need of a rebuke, he handed the slip of paper which he had creased and placed in his pocket.

It contained a brief memorandum after this order: 1—an exhortation; 2—a prayer; 3—a personal experience; 4—etc., until the last item was entered and the final line as follows:—Total seventeen performances." Here our conversation was interrupted and when we were able to resume the topic there was little time for more than this query: "Did Whittier enjoy the meeting?" The answer was an emphatic "No; he was broad-minded and liberal toward all who were sincere in their practices, but the worship which was most helpful to him and as he felt the most acceptable he could offer to his Heavenly Father, was that which had been dear to his mother and the others who made up the Friends' meeting at Amesbury, as his pen has immortalized it in verse."

I am concerned that our public meetings for worship shall more definitely promote individual, spiritual communion.

To-day's world is very full of distracting noises; all our human senses are in constant contact. In all our households there is the greatest difficulty in finding the quiet and seclusion so necessary for spiritual development.

It is a dependable law of life that we come to value and rely upon our faculties in proportion to their respective uses. If there were no light, it would be no hardship to be blind. If, then, we accustom ourselves to the uninterrupted employment of our physical senses and neglect individual spiritual exercise, the spiritual faculties, by this same law, atrophy and paralyze. But again, if this constant reliance upon physical and mental faculties be carried over into the Sabbath day and the meeting for worship, the avenues to God are in a way to be closed by those agencies which ought to be their opening. Mystical religion cannot thrive amidst these destructions and I am, therefore, apprehensive, not only for us of mature years, but even more for our children, that we may lose that skill and aptness in spiritual faculties which is the very life blood of our denomination, and goes far to make up for our multiplied shortcomings.

Notwithstanding much that is said to the contrary we, of this day and country, were never so little in need of instruction. Our children are so filled with schools and societies, with teaching and preaching, that the process amounts almost to cramming. Mental indigestion and nervous collapse are quite too common and by the same causes we have the flabby congregation, responsive only to music and the spoken word.

Will you tell me, if early Friends needed silent waiting upon God as an important part of their public and private worship—those men and women whose lives were lived out in isolation and solitude—how much the more do we whose ears are dulled with voices?

If they came to the close of such lives with spiritual faculties so keen as to have made the Society of Friends the Euclid of religion—those men and women of the wilderness, with few books and little vocal instruction—how much the more shall we not covet the secret place of the Almighty?

Now, the strange thing is that we will all assent to this plea and at the same time assent to a meeting inconsistent with it.

Neither is there for us the usual defense that we are a mixed people and unused to the practice of worship after the order of Friends. We are not a mixed people; a majority of our children and ourselves are of Quaker stock for generations. Indeed, the desire for greater freedom from a formalized meeting is more frequently expressed by younger Friends whose study of the sources and early practices of Quakerism has won their loyalty.

I force myself against an increasing reluctance to speak also of the dangers of an habitual or perfunctory oral service in meetings for worship. It is a serious thing to interrupt the voice of God in the congregation by vocal utterances. It is as essential to wait for the sure prompting of the Spirit as it is to avoid quenching the moving of God in the soul, and in no Friends' meeting should there be missing some sufficient period for meditation—a period respected by all.

Let no one think that nothing more is involved here than the character of the meeting for worship. For us everything is involved and for the world very much. For us, the day we, as a church, lose that spiritual altitude which has distinguished us in the past, on that day we lose ourselves in the broad stream of Protestantism. And speaking of this spiritual altitude, Dr. Peabody, at Bryn Mawr, recently said, "The average experience cannot rise into this region unaided. Mysticism is thus a faith for the elect, adequate for those who need no support but God. To these, the unbroken silence is more than the most stately ritual, the presence of God more convincing than any creed concerning him, and the Quaker meeting not bare and empty, but full and rich with the eternal Presence. Other foundation can no man lay than the life of God in the soul of man."

Whether we realize this in our several experiences, it is none the less the thing we aim at. Unless we have found a substitute for the practice and development of an inward religion, an experience of new life within, then the first purpose of our public meetings is to give the largest opportunity for this practice and development, and all forms of vocal utterance should lend themselves to this high purpose.

Every one who is abreast of the religious thought of the day knows that spirituality—that is to say, the conscious presence of God in human life—holds the attention of scholars in an increasing degree.

Destructive criticism has fought its fight and lost, along with dogma and controversial theology. The Society of Friends as it was, was never so highly esteemed by all evangelical churches; the Society of Friends as it is is in a way to become a voice in the chorus of Protestantism.

The very elect of Christian men and women are to-day saying to genuine Quakerism, whether consciously or not, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." Our own children, coming back from their college and university training, will cling to us or forsake us according as we cling to the one remaining essential, not practiced by other Protestant churches, and notwithstanding our increasing effort for the greater activity and efficiency of our church, it were better that not an additional member should come to us than that we should abate one degree our insistence upon the full opportunity for individual communion in our periods of worship, or that the real practice of mystical religion should seem to be on trial in a Friends' meeting.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

The one hundred and fourth annual session of Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends opened at Barnesville, Ohio, on Seventh-day, the ninth, at 9.30 o'clock, in the meeting-house at Stillwater. Although this was the official opening there had been various meetings before that. The Friends had begun to come on Fifth-day.

Sixth-day morning the Select Meeting was held. There were in attendance several Friends with minutes from other Yearly Meetings, all of whom were acceptably present. They were Job S. Gidley and Mary C. Foster, with her husband, Horace B. Foster, from New England Yearly Meeting; Alfred E. Copeland and his companion, Josiah Copeland, also Benjamin P. Brown, from North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

The minutes for these dear Friends were read in the Select Meeting and the Clerk was directed to present them to the Yearly Meeting.

The first sitting of the Yearly Meeting was held on Seventh-day morning and after a time of silence the opening minute was read by Carl Patterson, Clerk. All of the Representatives answered to their names. The minutes for the visiting Friends were then read and a welcome extended.

The Epistles from the various Yearly Meetings were then read with the exception of the one from North Carolina, which for some unknown reason failed to arrive. A committee was appointed to "essay" replies to these, if way opened for it, North Carolina included.

A letter from Friends at Fritchley, England, was read. A reference from Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting, Iowa, was considered, referring to the anomalous position of that Quarterly Meeting with respect to its position within the limits of Iowa Yearly Meeting, and expressing the hope that the time had come for it to be set off as a part of that Yearly Meeting. After a rather brief discussion it was decided to appoint a committee to take the matter under consideration.

Other routine business claimed the meeting's care at this first session.

Two public meetings were held on First-day as has been the usual custom, and as the day was fine and clear, many came from a long distance. The large house was well filled in the morning, and in the afternoon to overflowing. Many vocal testimonies were offered and petitions were raised to the Father of all our sure mercies for the many favors vouchsafed to His poor dependent children, and that we might have the Lord for our portion and the God of Jacob for the lot of our inheritance.

Not many years ago the road near the meeting-house was lined on First-day afternoon with teams which were hitched to the fences. This year there were comparatively few teams, but the grounds were literally packed with automobiles, coming from various parts of Ohio as well as from Iowa, North Carolina and elsewhere.

The first business to come before the meeting on Second-day morning was the report of the Representatives. They offered the name of Carl Patterson for Clerk and Wilson M. Hall for assistant clerk, and these Friends were appointed. After this a minute for Job S. Gidley of North Dartmouth, Mass., and one for Benjamin P. Brown, of George, North Carolina, were read. The minute of Benjamin P. Brown was rather interesting in its scope. He is privileged to attend all Yearly Meetings with which Ohio is in correspondence, also to appoint some meetings under the jurisdiction of the so-called "larger body" of Friends, and to do some work in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and in Scipio Quarterly Meeting. After the reading of these minutes the Epistle from North Carolina, which failed to arrive Seventh-day, was read.

The next thing taken up was the reading of the Answers to the Queries. The reading of these caused considerable concern and comment of a varied nature. It was noted that those who caused the answers to come up with deficiencies were not likely to hear the concern for them, and four Friends were nominated to assist the Clerk in formulating a brief statement of the exercises of the meeting. The following minute was adopted at a later session:

Job S. Gidley asked permission to appoint a meeting on Fourth-day afternoon, particularly for young people, both members and otherwise. The request was granted and the meeting was held to satisfaction.

A Friend requested to have the meeting close in open session, and this was done. He had concern particularly to query, Why is our Society growing rapidly smaller? Why are not we drawing others to us, instead of others drawing our members to them? His answer was that we are not faithful, that we do not yield to the intimations of the spirit as they come to us. We are too prone to think that having had some measure of Divine inspiration, we need do little more. On the contrary, we should do far greater things, with that help, than before.

MINUTE ON THE STATE OF SOCIETY.

During the consideration of the State of Society, attendant upon the reading of the Queries and Answers, some of our many deficiencies being brought into view, a deep and loving concern for our absent members was felt, that there might be an increase of faithfulness known amongst us.

The desire arose that those remote from meetings and who seldom have the privilege of attending Yearly Meetings, might know of the spiritual exercise and concern that prevailed in the meeting, because of these deficiencies, in the hope that they might be drawn nearer to us, and feel a measure of the love that the body feels for its individual members, thus becoming concerned through the power of Divine Love to be more faithful in the maintenance of our Christian testimonies.

The fact of our mid-week meetings being often small and that a few indulge in drowsiness and sleeping brought out the Query, "Would we neglect the attendance of these meetings, or go to sleep, were some great or noted person in attendance? How much more careful should we be when expecting Christ to meet with us!" May we strive to know such a deepening in the root of life, as to fill all our meetings with such spiritual significance as to make us unwilling to forgo their attendance.

The remedy for a lack of love to our fellow-man, it was pointed out, is a greater measure of the love of Christ in our own hearts, and we believe the silent prayer went up to our Heavenly Father for this blessing.

As we experience an increasing measure of this love of Christ within us, love for the brethren, and love for the worship of our loving Father will both increase to our edification and comfort. The importance of the reverent reading of the Holy Scriptures was touchingly alluded to, and its practice earnestly recommended. As we continue this we shall find comfort and enjoyment in both the collective and individual reading of the sacred writings, and these occasions will be looked forward to with interest as times of spiritual refreshment and uplift. The perplexities of the day and the urgencies of business may be relieved by such seasons of retirement, devotion and Scripture reading. That each one may not try to find excuse for his own shortcomings in the faults and failings of others, was feelingly brought to view and we were encouraged to examine for ourselves how and on what foundation we are building.

If any tend to become discouraged on account of the deficiencies of others the language arose, "What is that to thee, fellow thou Me."

"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty."

The session on Third-day was devoted largely to hearing and considering reports of committees.

From the Educational Report it appeared that there were 406 children of school age in the Yearly Meeting. Of these 199 have attended Friends' schools exclusively.

The report of the Committee on Education as connected with primary schools was taken up. Its work seemed to be satisfactory and $600 were appropriated for its use the coming year, to be used to pay the tuition of those pupils who are unable to pay for their own. One hundred and seventy-five dollars were granted the use of the Committee which has official charge of the distribution of the approved writings of Friends.

The report of the Boarding-school at Barnesville was the most compact and interesting given for years, and met with very general satisfaction. The Committee mentioned several things which had been instituted recently. One causing considerable favorable comment was self-government of the students. Another was the beginning of manual training, which has already helped a number of boys. Besides this, the spirit of the school has been very good, and the attitude of the students towards the officers has been excellent, and the spiritual life has probably never been better in the history of the institution. A number of improvements have been made on the farm, and the superintendent figured that the farm had made a clear gain to the School of $818. The average attendance of the School was about 80 during the winter term. The financial end had been handled with the same care that the other had been, evidently, for there was a balance of over $775 in favor of the School for the whole year.

The Yearly Meeting closed on Fifth-day as usual with the reading of the Epistles to the various Yearly Meetings with which it corresponds. The reading was followed by a most impressive silence and under the over-shadowing power, as we believe, of the Great Head of the Church, the meeting closed to meet next year, if consistent with the Divine Will. All the Epistles reflected something of the great struggle industrial and military with which the world is filled to-day, and our Friends generally seemed to feel the weight of our responsibility at this stage of the world's history. There was prepared by a Committee appointed for the service a little minute summing up the concerns expressed by different ones during the consideration of the State of Society, which is to be printed separately from the Minutes and circulated amongst our absent members. One of the pleasing features of the Yearly Meeting was the evening collection for the reading of the Bible at the Boarding-school. These readings were followed usually by much profitable advice from concerned Friends.

The social life at the Boarding-school during this week is one of the pleasant things long to be remembered by those taking part in it. Old and young are here brought together and see much of each other and Friends from all sections meet and exchange views.

A week spent at Ohio Yearly Meeting is something long to be remembered by those that attend and brings with it much that is good and strengthening we believe to the spiritual life.

This country is not suffering nor is it in danger from any lack of physical courage on the part of its citizens. It is suffering and it is in danger, serious danger, from a lack of moral courage on the part of its citizens, particularly those citizens who are in public life and as such the representatives of the country's interests. What this nation needs, what the world needs, most of all, is not physical but moral courage.—SENATOR WORKS, of California.

THE ABIDING ONE.

(The Christian.)

Some hearts are like a quiet village street,
 Few and well known the passers to and fro;
 Some like a busy city's market-place,
 And countless forms and faces come and go.

Into my life unnumbered steps have trod,
 Though brief that life and nearing now its close;
 At first the forms of phantasies and dreams,
 And then the varied tread of friends and foes.

Coming and going—ah, there lay the pang,
 That when my heart had blossomed and unloeked
 Its wealth to greet the loved familiar step,
 Lo, it was gone and only echoes mocked

My listening ear. But O, there came one step,
 So soft and slow, which said, "I pass not by,
 But stay with thee forever, if thou wilt,
 Amid this constant instability."

Then in his eyes I saw the love I craved—
 Love past my cravings—love that died for me.
 He took my hand, and in its gentle strength
 I learned the joy of leaning utterly.

Still do the countless footsteps come and go;
 Still with a sigh the echoes die away;
 But One abides and fills the solitude
 With music and with beauty, night and day.

THE SECOND ANNUAL POCONO MANOR PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Second Annual Pocono Manor Peace Conference was held, as it was last year, during the week-end following Labor Day. The speakers and those members of the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee who were able to attend, enjoyed the hospitality of the Inn and cottages. Owing to the unprecedented number of guests remaining at the hotel at this time, no delegates from other cities could be accommodated and the little group of conferees would have fared badly, had their number not been greatly augmented by the attendance of many Friends from the various cottages. At its best, however, the conference was small. Few came from either Buck Hill or the Pocono Lake Preserve (probably owing to the late date at which the program was announced), and few guests of the Inn availed themselves of the opportunity to hear the distinguished men and women whose names were on the program.

The first meeting on Sixth-day evening was opened by John B. Garrett, who gave a short address of welcome and then introduced Arthur Deering Call, Secretary of the American Peace Society, whose subject was "Our Inadequate Defense." In the course of his remarks the speaker gave a brief and clear summary of the new Naval Bill, a copy of which he held in his hand. It contains two passages which should be brought to the attention of all the peace people of the country. There is a clause in regard to conscientious objectors, distinctly stating that they shall not be excused on religious grounds, but shall be given some form of substitute service in case they refuse to bear arms. Another clause provides for drafting any citizen into the militia at the call of the President. This latter clause means that we are now a country under universal conscription—at the will of the head of the nation.

Lucia Ames Mead, of Boston, gave a forceful address on "The World Crisis and America's Duty," in which she deplored the great wave of militarism sweeping over this country.

Thomas Raeburn White presented the case for "The League to Enforce Peace" in his usual clear manner. To establish a reign of universal law is the aim of this organization and its suggested method, a world court backed up by world force.

On First-day evening, Gaius Glenn Atkins, a Congregationalist minister of Providence, R. I., speaking on "Christianity and War," brought the conference to a brilliant close. His command of language was very remarkable; his tolerance and Christian spirit, a convincing illustration of the point of view he was advocating. Reviewing the various roads to peace—the soldier's road, the lawyer's road, the diplomat's road—he gave each its due and with convincing eloquence pointed over and above them all to the Christian's road—the road to the peace that shall last. While it seems at present unlikely that we shall gather many from the outside world to future peace conferences at Pocono Manor, perhaps members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting who love the cause may get into the habit of coming together in the fall of the year to become better acquainted with one another and to gather renewed inspiration for the war against war which we of all people are destined by inheritance to wage without ceasing. If so, the holding of the Pocono Manor Peace Conference may be truly justified.

THE SITUATION IN MEXICO.

(AN OPEN LETTER AND APPEAL.)

(One of the United States commissioners now meeting at New London on the American and Mexican Joint Commission has written a letter of gratitude stating that the paper will be of real service to him in connection with his duties, and two of the Mexican representatives have written in similar vein. One of them has asked that copies of the letter be sent to about thirty of the leading men in Mexico, including Carranza. He also asks that we take under consideration a wide distribution of the pamphlet throughout Mexico and steps are being taken to have a good translation made. Dr. Leo S. Rowe, Secretary of the Commission, also recommends a wide distribution of the pamphlet in Mexico.)

To the Editors of the Daily and Periodical Press of the United States:—

Realizing the paramount influence the press of our country has had and will have in forming public opinion on the relations of the United States and Mexico, we appeal to all Editors to use their power in the interest of truth, sincerity and constructive statesmanship.

The popular conception of the Mexican situation is based on misinformation and ignorance. Very recently agitation and false ideas of the personality and aims of the Mexican leaders might have forced a war with a people oppressed, impoverished and exploited, who should have only patient sympathy and wise and disinterested help from the government and citizens of our country.

There is great need for the press to place the facts before our people and to interpret them in a broad and enlightened spirit. The people can learn the truth only through the press.

The occasion requires reporters trained by experience and study to observe and record the events and movements of real significance. There is equally great need for constructive editorial service to interpret the facts in the generous spirit of the true statesman and patriot.

The fundamental facts of the situation are, we believe, as follows:—

Mexico suffers from the misgovernment of centuries. The land has been, and is, held in vast tracts by private owners, of whom many are foreigners. While there are exceptions, nearly all these landholders have for generations reduced their tenants to peonage, or practical serfdom, and have forced them into ignorance and depraved conditions of life.

The vast natural resources of Mexico, in oil and minerals, have been made over by concessions to English, German, French, Dutch and American owners on such terms that the national wealth flows to other lands, and the native Mexican labor is exploited so that the workers continue impoverished and unenlightened.

The dictatorial and autocratic power of earlier presidents crushed out the democratic spirit and imposed throughout Mexico the rule of unscrupulous and all-powerful local political agents, who manipulated elections, administered the laws to suit the interests in power, and ruled with ruthless military authority.

Education, marriage and other social institutions have been church monopolies, and there have resulted ignorance and general neglect of what we consider common duties of decent living. Insurrection, revolution and local anarchy have prevailed for a period of years.

From the chaos some order is gradually appearing. In the judgment of men competent to form an intelligent and fair opinion, the so-called First Chief and his assistants are endeavoring honestly and with a fair measure of success to restore government and redress the age-old wrongs of the Mexican people.

A large number of the states are at peace. As rapidly and justly as possible land is allotted to small holders on terms that guarantee continued cultivation of the soil and the independence of the worker. The local political autocrats of the earlier régime are being gradually supplanted by duly constituted civil officers, who represent the best element in their communities. The church monopolies are abridged and education and other important matters are placed under civil authority. In a number of states traffic in alcoholic drinks has been abolished with immediate good results.

There has developed an intense rivalry among the different states to see which can organize the greatest number of schools. Already there are said to be twenty times as many schools as in the last epoch of President Diaz, and under the influence of Carranza five hundred teachers have been sent to the United States to study modern pedagogy and school administration.

Several of the states, chiefly in the north, near the United States border, are unsettled and in insurrection. Roving bands of outlaws are abroad and lawless leaders are making trouble.

For a time such men will make raids and commit depredations not only in Mexico, but occasionally over the border in the United States.

The boundary between the United States and Mexico is 1756 miles long, as far as from New York to Denver. Most of this distance is wild mountain and desert country, without roads and with very little water. For hundreds of miles there is no railroad on the Mexican side, and troops of either country must be transported on the United States railroad. Such a border cannot be patrolled so as to prevent occasional incursions by outlaw bands and it is more criminal than foolish for the press to urge such chance acts of outlawry as a cause for war.

These in briefest form are some of the facts the people of the United States are entitled to know. If properly presented and supplemented, they will revolutionize public opinion.

Although there is need of co-operation with Mexico for police and patrol duty, our country does not need a large force of young and inexperienced troops on the border.

The army needed is a force of educators, teachers, doctors, sanitary engineers, farmers and agricultural experts, who will volunteer for terms of two or three years in the spirit of service, such as we rendered Cuba at her time of crisis. It would be legislation worthy of our country for the government to make a liberal appropriation for such co-operation. It could be done by a slight curtailment of the proposed naval program.

In conclusion, we again appeal to the press of our country not only to exert its power in supplying in larger measure trustworthy information about Mexico, but also to take its true place in guiding the thought of America and the world along constructive lines of international service and goodwill. Such an editorial policy, widespread and consistent, will raise a discussion that has presented many unworthy and ignoble elements, to a place of enlightened, fraternal service worthy the press of a great democracy.

THE NEED OF THE WORLD.

I know the need of the world, though it would not have me know;
It would hide its sorrow deep, where only God may go;

Yet its secret it cannot keep;
It tells it awake or asleep;
It tells it to all who will heed,
And he who runs may read,
The need of the world I know.

I know the need of the world when it boasts of its wealth the loudest,
When it flaunts it in all men's eyes, when its mien is the gayest and proudest,

Oh, ever it lies, it lies!
For the sound of its laughter dies
In a sob or a smothered groan,
And it weeps when it sits alone!
The need of the world I know.

I know the need of the world when it babbles of gold and fame;
It is only to lead us astray from the thing that it dare not name.

For that is the sad world's way—
Oh, poor blind world grown gray,
With the lack of a thing so near,
With the want of a thing so dear!
The need of the world I know.

I know the need of the world when the earth shakes under the tread

Of men who march to the fight, when rivers with blood are red,
And there is no law but might,
And the wrong way seems the right;
When he who slaughters the most
Is all men's pride and boast,
The need of the world I know.

Oh, love is the need of the world! Down under its pride of power,
Down under its lust of greed, for the joys that last but an hour,

There lies forever its need,
For love is the law and the creed;
And love is the aim and the goal
Of life, from the man to the mole,
The need of the world is love.

SOME CEDAR LAKE ECHOES.

It was a happy party of eleven that started from Broad Street Station on Eighth Month 3rd, for Cedar Lake, Ind., to attend the Young Friends' Conference. The trip was as comfortable as possible, the exclusive use of a Pullman sleeping car being given us. We spent the time in getting acquainted with one another and in indulging in anticipations of the coming experience. Two more delegates joined the party later, bringing the total to thirteen. We left the train at Crown Point, Ind., on the afternoon of the fourth and were conveyed from there in automobiles to the conference grounds, about eight miles distant. There we were speedily assigned to our quarters, and after that preliminary was satisfactorily or otherwise completed, had a chance to look around a little and see where we were.

The grounds, which belonged to the Moody Church of Chicago, covered about twenty acres, and overlooked the lake, and were well wooded with oaks and hickories. Curiously enough there wasn't a cedar tree to be seen. The lake was quite fair-sized, having a shore line of seven or eight miles, and furnished much wholesome recreation in the way of bathing and boating. Cottages, dormitories and tents provided shelter for the men, while the girls occupied rooms in the lodge or main building. The dining-room was in a separate building nearby and a large tent, well screened, was also used at times for lectures and classes.

A deeply religious atmosphere prevailed over the entire encampment and those in charge of it, which made the spot a particularly suitable one for the purpose of such a gathering. It naturally took us from Philadelphia a little time to get acquainted and fully partake of the spirit of the Conference, but we early were brought to feel the solemnity and power of the occasion, and as time passed, entered more closely into fellowship with our western Friends. We realized that we all were seeking to direct our lives by the same great truths and principles, and though our methods of worship found different channels of expression, we were brought very closely together in our meetings, and truly felt that "it was good for us to be there."

The Conference was divided into small groups of about ten persons, who met every morning after breakfast out-of-doors and spent a half-hour or so in Bible study. Several of the Philadelphia delegation were leaders of these groups and in this way we all learned to know each other better and to work in greater harmony.

The regular class-work of the day followed. Three lecture periods filled the morning and gave everyone much food for thought. Mission study, Bible study, church history, teacher training and studies in Peace were some of the subjects treated of by competent instructors. We were favored in having George Nasmyth with us for a part of the time to lead the discussion on the Peace question.

An open parliament followed the lectures, in which everyone was at liberty to express an opinion on the subject under discussion, and a good number took such a liberty. Many matters were discussed at length, and while to some of us this discussion did not always appear fraught with much profit, we nevertheless admired the way the affair was conducted and led. The position of Yearly Meeting Clerk could hardly be more arduous. Dinner was welcomed after this and the afternoons were given over to physical recreation. Swimming was by far the most popular sport, though baseball and tennis had some devotees. The vesper meetings, following supper, were held out-of-doors, as a rule, and were very impressive occasions, as indeed were all the devotional meetings, and we were told that more gatherings for silent worship had been held at this Conference than at any previous ones.

After the vesper services there was usually an inspirational address. Three which were given by Ozora Davis, the president of Chicago Theological Seminary, were especially helpful and uplifting.

The whole spirit of the Conference seemed to be one of deep and earnest searching after truth and righteousness and the upholding of our simple Quaker faith, though many of our western brothers seem to have little regard for some of our so-called minor testimonies.

We parted with a feeling of broader understanding of each other and thankfulness for the privilege of meeting and mingling so pleasantly together. Some of us who had never attended such a gathering before will always look back to the days spent at Cedar Lake as a deep and rich experience in our spiritual lives. We came away with renewed willingness and determination to dedicate ourselves to the promotion of our Lord's Kingdom on the earth.

ROBERT H. MARIS.

It is out of date to deny that God exists. "Atheists?" said a preacher in a recent sermon. "Oh, no. We're too polite for that in these days. We just bow God out of our homes, our offices, our businesses, our lives." And is the man who, recognizing the existence of God, then gives God no place in his life, better off than an atheist? Real life begins for us only when we let God himself become our life. To know that God is, and to reject Him, marks us as lower down than those who may have honest doubts that He is.

No man would ever win on the battle-field if he realized that each man is worth to the world, of the possibility of losing a Milton, a Lincoln, an Edison with any man who falls in battle.

KEEPING UP WITH THE CHURCH.

[We have been requested to withhold the authorship of this paper, which was sent us for publication a few days ago. The editors have had no part whatsoever in the preparation of it, but can subscribe to the spirit of the paper, which they know to be most kindly. In line with what the writer says, we would add our conviction that a wide door stands open for the extension of a wholesome influence through the columns of THE FRIEND. Every week brings us proofs that THE FRIEND is widely and carefully read, and freely commented upon. We want very much to enlarge its sphere, and if our present readers will send us names of those to whom we may send sample copies, we shall esteem it a favor, and we believe good will result.—Eds.]

I wonder how many of the people who criticize the Society of Friends are qualified to pass judgment? I wonder what percentage of them are well informed regarding the Society and the activities of its members? I have been repeatedly surprised by statements made to me by young members especially, indicating a lamentable lack of up-to-date knowledge of what is going on amongst Friends in America, or even amongst the meetings of their own Yearly Meeting. They seem to expect the Society to do a great deal of useful service in the world without the offer on their part of any assistance, and finally to bring the facts to their attention in some compelling manner that shall win at once their admiration and abiding respect. But the idea of being themselves in some measure responsible for the condition of the Society, for its influence for good or ill, for its vitality or lifelessness, seems never to have occurred to them. Let me illustrate.

While visiting at the home of a young married couple in a suburb of Philadelphia where there are not many Friends, I asked whether they value their membership, and was assured that they do. I asked whether they are doing anything to show their attachment to the Society, and was told that they usually attend meeting in the city on First-days and sometimes during the middle of the week. On further inquiry I found that they knew very little about the "activities" of the Yearly Meeting or of different subordinate meetings, or of individual members of prominence in the various meetings. Their circle of acquaintances was quite limited; the meeting had not called upon either of them for any kind of service or extended towards them much expression of personal interest or esteem; and, while they had not felt in the least neglected, they had not been obliged to think much about the Society or of any possible service they might have as members of a Friends' meeting. "Do you read THE FRIEND?" I asked. "No, we do not take THE FRIEND," they said. "Well," said I, "how can you keep up with the church, or become of service in it, unless you keep informed as to what is being done in and by the Society and endeavor to discover what service you may render?" We had some further talk about the Friendly idea of individual initiative as preferable to superimposed tasks, and about the great need of more young people who are willing to "take up the mantle" of prophets whom they would honor and strive to emulate. The function of a church paper was explained, and the reasonableness of giving some business-like attention to our religious duties just as we do in secular affairs. Later I ordered a sample copy of THE FRIEND sent to them, and have been informed that they now are regular subscribers, and are manifesting an increasing interest in the affairs of their meeting.

Another illustration of the need of keeping up with the church was afforded by a young man from a rural neighborhood who announced that he was heartily in favor of the governmental policy of military "preparedness." This youth is the child of several generations of Friends of the "most straitest sect," and yet the fundamental basis of our testimony against all war, or preparation for war, impressed him as a new idea. He responded to it heartily and with a candor that was beautiful. "Is there no force other than physical or material force?" said I. He hesitated. "Thee believes in moral force?" I questioned. "Yes, certainly I do," was his reply. Then we discussed the declarations of the Apostle Paul, "The Gospel is power," and "our weapons are not carnal, but they are mighty," etc. We talked about the effect of these immaterial forces as compared with the material weapons, how they win by constraint and draw together, whereas the material forces that are used in efforts to coerce always antagonize and tend to break asunder all worthy relationships. We came by degrees to the fundamental teaching—"the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus"—unselfish service—the Christ method as opposed to the policy of selfishness, which has been the way of the world. My young friend seemed to see in a new light the meaning of vicarious love. The heroism of Jesus, "the measure of the stature of Christ," seemed so beautiful to him that he exclaimed, "I knew I didn't belong on that side. I never could bear to think of killing anybody. I had so much rather argue the way I feel." Wondering, then, how he could have become so confused by the popular way of thinking—the double standard—one standard of morals for individuals, another for nations—I said, "Don't you folks read THE FRIEND?" "Oh, sometimes," he said; "Auntie takes it." "Don't you read the Peace literature that Friends are so active in circulating?" He thought they had received nothing in that line except an appeal for money and a request to write to President Wilson in opposition to the Naval Bill. These, he said, displeased his father because he had no money to spare, and because he thought we ought not to meddle with the President's business. I avoided discussing their interpretation of popular government, but I did plead to the best of my ability for more attention to Christian thought and less to the paganism of the daily press; more time for Christ and less for teaching that is well calculated to confuse some minds and to lead away from Christ.

The Society of Friends more than any other denomination assumes that its members will voluntarily share the labors of the church in response to a sense of individual responsibility. Relatively little active service is superimposed by the meetings. Under such circumstances can it be other than gross indifference or sad neglect that accounts for so many members not keeping up with the church? If we really want to be worthy of our Quaker ideals or ancestry, should we not at least try to keep informed as to what is going on amongst Friends and what the best thought in the Society has to say on present issues? It seems to me that to the members of any denomination the careful, regular perusal of the church paper is as much a religious duty as reading a trade paper is to a business man. Every member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting who is old enough to appreciate good literature should read THE FRIEND, and should endeavor to extend the usefulness of this periodical and of the religious Society in the interest of which it is published.

SEET the day is ending in a glow of gold and red—
The flash of fire and the heart's blood shed,—
And, afterwards, the dull, still grey of sorrow—
Look up! above there shines the Star of Hope!
Hope for a brighter morrow!

The glare and gore are sinking 'neath the earth,
And with them dies the light—and lives are grey,
Yes, Hope on earth is dead, but to give birth
To Hope in Heaven.

The shades of night herald a brighter day;
Though earthly ties are riven
Earth's loss is Heaven's gain;
Though prayers may seem of no avail
God's promises can never fail:
Peace, Peace shall reign!

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

OUR LITTLE HOUSE-WREN.—(Written by an eight-year old boy).—Early in the spring we made a wren-house out of a piece of a log and bored it hollow with an auger. A knot-hole just the size of a quarter was the door. We put the house in a wild crab-apple tree in our yard.

We looked and hoped for a wren, but the sparrows came first and tried to get in at the door, and pecked and pecked and pecked at it to get it larger. Then the little wren came and he was glad to find the house. He hopped in and out and filled the yard with his song.

He sat on a branch and called and called Mrs. Wren. It sounded as though he said, "Oh, tweet, tweet, tweet; gee, gee, gee! Come and see! Come and see the fine house I've found!"

One day we saw a white speck in the house and soon there was a happy family. And now Mr. Wren sings and sings all day long his cheery little song. And I think the reason why the wren always sings so cheerily is because God wants people who hear him to cheer up and be happier.

Our neighbor has a wren-house that looks more like a real house than ours, with a little porch around it, and little pillars to hold up the porch, and you'd think our wren would like that house better. But I guess the reason he likes our log cabin is because of our garden near by, and the dead honeybees he can get to feed the babies with. So he sings and we are happy.—From The Continent.

SOME WONDERS FROM NEW MEXICO.—Most of "Our Younger Readers," especially those who go to school, know something about New Mexico. The following from a letter to The Continent, a Presbyterian weekly, may interest older as well as younger.

The writer says, speaking of a trip through Rio Grande Canyon, "This canyon is simply solid red lava walls 800 feet straight up, with a wild river jumping over rocks and falls at the bottom. This country must have been terribly churned up recently. Think of a lava flow 800 feet deep 50 miles wide and 800 miles long! I found some carved rocks in the canyon, the carvings done by Indians of an extinct race."

The writer also tells of finding "some water-oussels," (pronounced oo-s'll), in the canyon. Know them? Little slate-black birds that build nests back of waterfalls and then have to fly through the falls to get to and from the nest. These birds gather at a rapids and jump in at the head and let the water roll them over and over down the rocks. They act just like a lot of boys. But their strangest habit is walking on the bottom of a pool, under the water. They walk around and eat and look up at you just as though they were in the air. And they never get wet.

The letter speaks of seeing the white-throated swift. "It is the fastest moving living thing on this earth. No man has ever found its nest or seen its eggs. . . . Away up at the top of the canyon those we saw were like little spots of light floating and wheeling. In shape and movement they resemble the common chimney swift, the most mysterious creature on the earth."

Stopping at a forest ranger's house for shelter from a snow-storm near the last of Fifth Month the writer saw "a pet porcupine named Splinters. Splinters climbed all over everybody, and the baby pulled him around without his showing a bit of anger. But there was one member of the family that Splinters hated, and that was the cat. Just to emphasize his hatred he slapped poor pussy's nose full of quills."

Our narrator also tells about a beaver colony among the mountains numbering nearly 150, which had built twenty lakes, some of them covering nine acres.

GIFTS FROM THE COUNTRY.—Nancy sat on the back step, her chin buried in her hands, her eyes fixed gloomily ahead, her whole attitude showing the deepest dejection. A few yards away, seated on the chopping-block, sat her brother Dan, whittling a piece of soft pine. His lips, usually puckered for a merry whistle, were closely shut, and he looked quite as dejected as Nancy.

Aunt Madge came around the corner of the house and stopped in surprise at the gloomy looks. Then she sat down beside Nancy. Nancy moved over a little to make room, and gave her a quarter of a smile.

"Don't you think you'd better tell me about it?" asked Aunt Madge, after a minute.

"Oh, Aunt Madge!" cried Nancy so vigorously that Aunt Madge fairly jumped, "it's horrid to live in the country and not be able to do anything!"

"Why-y-y!" exclaimed Aunt Madge, too surprised to say anything else.

"You see, it's this way," explained Dan, putting his knife in his pocket and coming closer, "we'd like to do the things you were talking about last night—you know—the things city boys and girls do for mission schools, and gifts to send away, and such things, but we can't."

"Why not?" asked Aunt Madge.

"Why, Aunt Madge," cried Nancy. "You know. We haven't a thing to give."

"Oh, you funny, funny children!" laughed Aunt Madge, "when you could send such lovely things every month of the year."

"What?" demanded Nancy, breathlessly.

Aunt Madge looked up over her head, where a climbing rose rioted in wonderful bloom.

"This month, roses, and next month, daisies, and after that clover-blooms, and next, goldenrod and asters, and then, autumn leaves," checking them off on her fingers.

"But who would want common country flowers?" queried Nancy.

"Why, girlie," returned Aunt Madge, "there are hundreds of children in every big city who have never seen a flower growing, and the Flower Mission Bands are glad to have the help that only you country boys and girls can give."

"But how could we get the flowers to the city?" asked Dan.

"It takes money to send them."

"The express companies carry them free of charge to cities within 150 miles. You drive over to the railway station every morning with the milk and you can take every day a box which Nancy can help you pack," said Aunt Madge.

"You said every month!" challenged Nancy, her quarter smile now grown a complete one at the prospect.

"Yes, little Miss Doubter!" retorted Aunt Madge. "In the spring, of course, mayflowers, hepatica, blood-root, after that violets; then buttercups. And for the winter, what do you think of rose hips, with their bright red, and bittersweet berries, or barberries?"

"I know where to get whole armfuls of ground-pine, too," said Dan.

"And pine cones, lovely big ones," added Nancy. "Will it not be fun?"

"But that is not all," said Aunt Madge. "Can you imagine how the little tots, in the day nurseries, for example, would love these for doll tea dishes?" and she opened her hand.

"Acorn cups!" cried Nancy. "The biggest ones I ever saw grow on our tree in front of the house. I always played with them myself when I was little, but I never thought—"

Aunt Madge smiled, and went on:

"And Dan says he always has more pop-corn than you can use. I never ate any candy half so good as Nancy's sugared pop-corn. You could fill as many bags of net with it as you pleased and send them to a mission school at Christmas. And if you were to tap those three big sugar-maples that I see just over there, and make some maple-sugar in the spring—well, I could wish that I might be one of the children that would get some of it, that's certain. And I haven't said a word yet about beechnuts, butternuts and hickory-nuts!"

"Oh, Aunt Madge!" sighed Dan and Nancy together, too excited and happy to say more.

"That is not half!" declared Aunt Madge. "What about the berries, a long procession of them? If you cannot send the berries themselves, you can make them into jellies, and the apples, cherries, pears, and all the other fruits that you have in such abundance can be made into jelly or jam for hospitals, and the express companies will carry these, too, free of charge to the Flower Guild which is in every large city. Then down by the lakeside," and Aunt Madge pointed to the little lake which gleamed through the trees, "I saw shells that would be wonderful to some city children I know. Those pretty white pebbles on the shore at the boat landing would be a great treasure to some others. And there are cattails, and the wonderful milkweed pods, and more things than I can say. I think you are very rich and fortunate children."

"So do!" exclaimed Nancy, springing to her feet. "Thank you for helping us to find it out. We must get right to work. What will you do first, Dan?"

"Hoe that pop-corn to make sure of a good crop," said Dan, taking his hoe down.

"I'll gather some flowers and let them stand in water up to their necks before I pack them in a box to send with the milk wagon to-morrow morning," said Nancy. "Then I am sure I can find some ripe berries up in the west pasture. We mustn't waste a minute, there is so much we can do."—J. GERTRUDE HUTTON, in Everyland.

POCONO NOTES.

"When the moon's far beam greets the sun's last gleam,
O'er the star-lit zenith line,
'Tis then the happy voices are calling to and fro
As the rowers hail the sunset trail
On the lake at Pocono."

Surely "the moon's far beam" never met "the sun's last gleam o'er the star-lit zenith line" more entrancingly than during the past fortnight. The annual exhibit of symbolic floats—representing the inventive faculty of our campers—was particularly attractive in the star-light, with such illumination as each supplied. One brave youth had a large white dove of peace, suspended above "This is what we all pray for." The return of the egrets was admirably portrayed in a canoe, while another brought to our attention the various insects of the summer by their several models and sounds. Little Red Riding Hood and the Gold Dust Twins were much appreciated. Robert Fulton's first steam-boat, called forth much applause because of its simple and ingenious construction, as well as "The Will-o-the-Wisp." The originality displayed by those who enter into these contests determines their relative merits, together with the inexpensiveness of the material used. Some thirty to forty floats were in the procession, which passed the judges. A popular vote is also taken before the latter announce their choice.

Pocono Lake Day, in like manner, had its special entertainments on land and water, when the native talent was brought out to the satisfaction of all present.

Considering the wide range in age and interest represented in our community this solidarity of purpose and enjoyment is the more remarkable. The mid-week gatherings from house to house have also afforded some very interesting occasions. At one of these, President Sharpless reviewed American educational institutions while Dr. Froelicher of Baltimore, contrasted private and public schools and told us stories of his fatherland. The education of women in Japan and nature-study on the Preserve have also been presented to attentive audiences, the latter with specimens gathered from the woods.

Clubs are being organized for more scientific study. Walks and overnight camping parties have been greatly enjoyed under the guidance of two competent directors. John D. Carter leads the bird students among us. This is a veritable paradise for children, and, during these days when infantile paralysis has cast its shadow over so many homes, it has been a happy retreat so far from the grip of that malady—prolonging their stay upon the mountain.

It is a real concern to lead this lovely group of 250 children in all the wholesome ways of outdoor life and at the same time to give them every opportunity to develop their own initiative. There has been an unusual appreciation of the fundamental purpose of the pioneers of this colony, to keep on the ground floor of simplicity. Professor Sayce of Oxford, England, and Lady Barlow, have both been our guests and the latter addressed quite recently a camp-fire gathering concerning the conduct of the Society of Friends and conscientious objectors in England.

Professor Bird Baldwin also gave us a most illuminating talk on the physical and mental development of children.

Professor Sayce is traveling across America for the first time and he was deeply interested in our mode of life. He has contributed more to archaeology than any living Englishman. Lady Barlow also said this was the first camp-fire that she had ever seen.

The character and comfort, with the full attendance at our First-day meetings has been well maintained throughout the season, which has been extended some weeks longer than previously. The testimony borne by Dr. Galus Atkins, of Providence, R. I., last First-day to the value of our form of worship was beautiful. J. E.

NEWS ITEMS.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.—Friends' Select School has sent out notice to its patrons of one week's postponement of the opening of school, from the twenty-fifth of Ninth Month to the second of Tenth Month. The School is particularly favored in not having had any cases of infantile paralysis in any of the families connected with it during the summer. No cases have been reported either in the families of teachers or of any of the pupils of the School.

The School buildings have been extensively renovated during the vacation. Paint has been substituted for paper on many of the school walls, which is a decided advantage from a hygienic point of view. An electric lighting system has been installed throughout the School, the Assembly Room and offices being provided with the semi-indirect type of lights.

The teaching staff of men and women remains the same as last year, except that the English Department is reinforced by Alice Owen Albertson, a graduate of Friends' Select School and Bryn Mawr College, who has spent a year in post graduate study at the University of Munich, Germany, and who has also had several years of successful experience as a teacher. She is to take the place, for the year, of Gertrude Roberts Sherer, who is spending the present year in post graduate study at Leland Stanford University, Cal. Esther M. White, A. B. Bryn Mawr, of the History Department, has leave of absence for the first half year. Her place is to be taken by Dess C. Ebbert, A. B. Ursinus, A. M. University of Pennsylvania, who for a number of years has been head of the English Department in the Jenkintown High School. Dorothy Houghton, a graduate of Friends' Select School, and also of Vassar College, has been added to the teaching staff as a general assistant.

Several of the teachers, unable to go to Europe, have taken more or less extensive trips during the summer in this country and Canada, and two have spent a good part of the summer in study. Lewis W. Cruikshank, of the Science Department, took post graduate courses at the University of Wisconsin, and Margaret S. James, of the Elementary School, at Teachers' College, Columbia University.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Eckley Brinton Cox, Jr., of 1604 Locust Street, one of the founders and a contributor to the support of the University Museum, died last week at his summer home at Drifton, near Hazleton, Pa., after an illness of more than a year. He was a member of a family of pioneer anthracite operators, all of whom are widely known in Philadelphia. He was forty-three years old.

Seth Low, former Mayor of New York, twice Mayor of Brooklyn, and for eleven years President of Columbia University, died on the 17th at his country home, Broad Brook Farm, Bedford Hills, N. Y., at the age of sixty-six years. He had been ill several months of a complication of diseases.

It is announced that there are in Philadelphia this year 610 little farms, upon which poor families have grown an average of $300 to the acre. This is the work of the Vacant Lots Association.

GENERAL.—The lowest death-rate in the country's history is shown in preliminary vital statistics for the year 1915, made public at Washington, by the Census Bureau. The rate, 13.5 per 1000, is based on reports from 25 States and 41 cities with a total population of about 67,000,000. In 1914 the percentage of deaths was 13.6, the lowest recorded up to that time. The average rate during the period 1901-05 was 16.2.

This year will mark the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the American Sunday-school Union, with headquarters in Philadelphia. During the past year, nearly 1500 new Sunday-schools have been organized, into which over 7000 teachers and over 68,000 scholars have been gathered. The society's representatives also visited and rendered aid to 14,752 schools, including 76,156 teachers and 902,109 scholars. In connection with this work 10,770 Bibles were distributed and 25,633 copies of the New Testament Scriptures.

A paternal interest in Italian subjects and their children in America is evidenced by King Victor Emmanuel's bestowal upon Arthur Curtiss James, of New York, of the cross of a chevalier of the crown of Italy. The honor is given in recognition of his erecting on New York's East Side, a $300,000 building to house a school for Italian children, which is conducted by the Children's Aid Society, and is helping to make good Americans of the children.

National banks with capital and surplus above $1,000,000, according to an act of the late Congress, may open branches in foreign countries or invest 10 per cent. in stock of special corporations formed to do a foreign agency business for concerns holding the stock.

Announcement that an unlimited fund had been set aside by the Ford Motor Company of Detroit, to be devoted to the treatment of crippled children throughout the country who are in need of orthopedic or surgical care was made by Samuel S. Marquis, head of the Ford Educational Department.

Carl E. Milliken, Maine's Governor-elect, is thirty-nine years old and engaged in the lumber business, is a temperance man in practice as well as in theory, believes in prohibition and proposes to see that it is enforced.

SOME IMPLICATIONS OF SILENCE.

A somewhat cursory examination of the periodicals intended to represent the Society of Friends discloses what may be an interesting fact. The subject of Silence looms large in those that speak for conservatives, while the same subject is conspicuous for its absence in those periodicals that support a programmed service under the leadership of a pastorate. This indication is confirmed by the observation of one most favorably situated to speak for the modern system. "Our people," he is quoted as saying, "do not know what to do with silence." Let the comparative situation as regards the treatment of this subject be what it may, we have no need to deal with surmises in saying that the subject of Silence is very frequently to the fore in our columns. Three or four of last year's editorials treated phases of the subject. One of these seemed so serviceable in a large Monthly Meeting that it has been put into circulation as a tract. Quite as noteworthy, however, and more directly bearing upon the phase of the subject now proposed for treatment is the additional fact that news announcements of the recognition of silence and of its use by other denominations than Friends appear very frequently in our paper. Now it is an account of a "service of silence" established by Episcopalians; again some one tells us how frequently of late in church services the minister instead of the familiar "Let us pray," will use the expression, "Let us unite in silent prayer"; or we have the privilege of printing a review of a book on Silence prepared jointly by a churchman and a Friend. Altogether in the two papers known as THE FRIEND, and in some of the monthlies, these announcements of the use of Silence are so numerous and some of them so momentous as to amount almost to a movement for the general adoption of that which is often noted as specific in the system of worship of the Society of Friends. For this reason and for others, certain implications of silence in worship seem to have a far-reaching importance. It may even transpire that the time-honored method of our Society may contain the basis of a reality for Christianity.

The first implication has to do with the ministry. It has often been said "the silent meeting is the school of the prophets." How much of the prophetic ministry is developed in such meetings is of course dependent upon the quality of the silence. If it reaches the condition of united prayer the apostolic situation is realized: "What is it then, brethren? When ye come together, each one hath a psalm, hath a teaching, hath a revelation, hath a tongue, hath an interpretation." Now in the case of those who are accustomed to a professional ministry this situation might easily be fraught with far-reaching results. "The teaching" or "the revelation" not unlikely would be entrusted to others than the professional, and the prophetic quality might easily disclose a poverty in the ordinary service that would be more or less awkward. Doubtless, honest churchmen who have established such "services of silence" have faced this implication. We know some of them are of the spirit to accept such a possible outcome as here indicated with rejoicing, and we are sure they would proceed to make adjustments to it that in the end would greatly spiritualize their services. Be that as it may, professional ministers and a lay congregation would surely under such training come to see the universal quality in silent worship and have at hand a ready means of joining others without the usual prejudice as to forms of ordination and authority for Christian work. It would be a great step forward in the practice of Christianity to have such a pass key for many doors now rather securely locked.

The second implication is in a way quite as momentous as the first. If groups or congregations of those who regularly observe the outward ordinances learn to unite in silent worship it follows of necessity that new experiences in baptism and the supper will be disclosed. Nothing is more noteworthy in Quaker literature than the confession of one and another of the reality of the ordinances as thus spiritually administered by the great High Priest of our profession. Without quoting from seventeenth century writers, the following from a present-day author (T. Edmund Harvey) will disclose the depth as well as the breadth of this possible experience: "For surely there are not merely two or seven sacraments, but seventy times seven, for him whose heart seeks ever fellowship with his brothers and with the Father above him, who would be loved in them, and served by their service. The whole world is God's and full of His light; our lives are His and they are our fellows. And since in every heart of man is some well through which the God-given waters of life may flow, we may go forth in faith to our work; as we serve our neighbors and search for Truth, in the spirit of followers of Christ Jesus, seeking that our own wills may be wider and deeper, and that their springs may be shared more fully by others, God will make priests of all of us, and, if He will it, prophets too." ["A Wayfarer's Faith," p. 57.]

Thus a ready-to-hand means like united silent worship that is quite sure to introduce all who honestly and earnestly practice it into the privileges of "priests and prophets," is fraught with tremendous consequences in a system that looks upon priest and prophet as a separated class. We hail the wider recognition of silence, therefore, as a great unifying force. How much or how little it may modify ecclesiasticism may depend upon the degree in which we are able to show it to be prophetic and sacramental. Any protest against professionalism in our Society or outside of it must be largely conditioned by evidence—the evidence of personal character—that we attain the ends claimed by this professionalism more fully without it.

EVIDENCE OF THINGS NOT SEEN.

BY WM. W. CADBURY.

Why do I believe in the great spiritual forces of the unseen world? Why do I believe in God?

These are questions that often assail the thinking young man or woman during school or college days. Our faith in God is our greatest possession and we should ever seek to nurture it, lest we be lost on the great ocean of unbelief.

Our religious life may be strengthened in different ways. Perhaps a sermon stimulates us to new effort, or it may be that the still, small voice speaks to us with conviction in the silent moments of public worship or private devotion.

But there is another source of inspiration open to all and that is the beauty of nature. If we but open our eyes to the works of our Creator how are we thrilled by His majesty and power!

These thoughts came to me while walking over some of the trails of the Canadian Rockies, and that my reader may share in a measure the inspiration of these wonderful mountains I shall briefly describe one of these walks.

Starting one afternoon from Field, my path first led to a remarkable rock formation known as the "Natural Bridge." Here the Kicking Horse River dashes against a rocky barrier, but finding an outlet below, pours through this natural aperture, while the rocks that nearly meet above form a natural bridge. From this point the way leads through lofty spruce trees to Emerald Lake. Here the road is known as the Avenue of the Peak, for at the far end a lofty snow-white mountain appears. Everything along this roadway tends to remind one of the Supreme Being—the lofty trees, like pillars in the nave of a great cathedral, vaulted ever above by the clear blue sky and carpeted below by the most beautiful wild flowers—"paint brushes," blue-bells, white heliotrope and many more.

Finally through a turn in the road the beautiful Emerald Lake is seen, its clear blue waters reflecting in their depths the snow-white mountains. As the evening shadows gathered, a pair of owls appeared, perching on the tops of stately spruce trees and calling to each other across the still water of the lake.

Sleep came readily in the solemn stillness of this distant lake, and early next morning I was skirting its shores bound for the Yoho Pass. A steep climb through spruce and pine brings one to the beautiful lake and lonely cabin at the summit of this pass, where my path turned sharply to the left, and I walked for several hours high above the Yoho River, and just below the snow line of Michael's Peak and the Vice-president and President Mountains.

Across the valley rose the peak of Mt. Balfour and the magnificent cataract known as Takakaw Falls was ever visible falling from a height three times that of Niagara, while its spray flew out far from the rocky precipice.

My path now led me down into the valley once more, past an abandoned camp, where a porcupine turned up his bristling quills at me, showing that innate fear so characteristic of wild animals. I could not but meditate on how slow man has been to overcome that fear and learn that men are brothers and God is their common Father. It is this same fear and distrust that urges the civilized nations of to-day to arm themselves against their own kind.

Another detour led me up the valley of the Little Yoho, above the glacier from which the river flows, to stand in the very midst of the snow peaks themselves. Then a scramble down a rocky mountain-side and through the spruce trees till I caught the trail again, along the mountain stream, past another great cataract, known as the Twin Falls, through marshy passes, down the bed of a stream, wading across a dashy mountain torrent, where the trail disappeared, finally to be discovered again and at last, after almost forty miles of tramping, to the comfortable camp at the foot of Takakaw Falls.

The Englishman and his wife, in charge, gave me a cordial greeting and I soon made the acquaintance of the Chinese cook and boy who were delighted to find a friend who could speak to them in their own tongue.

Another night in the forests, with only the thunder of the great waterfall to disturb nature's stillness, and then next morning an easy walk over a carriage-road of eleven miles, brought me back to Field.

The emerald-hued lakes, the great glaciers, virgin forests and delicate alpine flowers, mighty cataracts and great mountains such as Burgess, Kerr, Cathedral and Steven, how far removed are these from our busy city life! We all need these experiences to lift us above our daily routine to give us a new vision of God in His all-comprehensiveness. Everyone cannot visit the Canadian Rockies, yet somewhere and somehow each can get in touch with God's great "out-of-doors" and if the eyes of the soul are opened the glories of the creation will give a new vision and a new faith in the Creator.

AT SEA ON THE PACIFIC, Eighth Month 11, 1916.

CONSTRUCTIVE PEACE IN MEXICO.

The summer campaign of open-air meetings conducted by the sub-committee on meetings of the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee has recently been reported in these columns. It was of interest to many Friends as showing what real successes may be made in new fields of Peace endeavor. Of equal interest, we hope, will be the following account of the first Fall meeting of the large committee with its reports by the sub-committees of work already done and of new work planned.

The sub-committee on Governmental Relations laid before the meeting a concern of great scope and importance. Throughout the summer this Committee has been occupied with the Mexican situation. They issued five thousand copies of a paper called "A Program of Constructive Peace" one paragraph of which, entitled "Help to Mexico," ended with this sentence: "The teacher, the engineer and the physician have it in their power to solve forever the Mexican problem." A second leaflet entitled, "An Open Letter and Appeal," of which five thousand copies were distributed, was printed in last week's issue of THE FRIEND and will be familiar to its readers. A translation of this leaflet into Spanish has been made by Señor Bonillas, one of the Mexican Commissioners, and the paper was warmly commended by others of the Commission.

Out of these two leaflets, the Program of Constructive Peace and the Open Letters, as well as out of the deep concern which has been felt by the committee on this pressing question of the relations between this country and Mexico, has arisen a vision of an immediate practical task and opportunity. The plan has developed from some suggestions made by our friend, Herbert Welsh. Largely in accordance with his ideas, the committee on Governmental Relations proposes first of all to send some one of reputation and ability down to Mexico to get at the facts of the situation, especially the facts from an educational standpoint. It would be of the greatest value to be able to send to the periodical and daily press an authoritative statement of the Mexican situation from a Peace point of view. This advantage is, however, merely incidental. The main concern behind the sending of such a person to Mexico is to look into the possibility of starting a school where Mexicans can receive industrial training and instruction in the mechanical arts. Industrial training has proved in this country to be of the highest importance in the development of a backward race. Such a school might grow from small beginnings into a second Hampton Institute, and what could be more valuable than the consequent development not only of individual students, but of whole neighborhoods to whom they would take back inspiration and better methods. Above all, the very existence of such a school, large or small, would be a constant proof of American sympathy and good-will; a constant influence for the right sort of international relations between the two countries.

"HOLLAND'S WELFARE."

The large committee received the proposition with encouragement and approval. They do not doubt that interested Friends will rise up to supply the funds necessary for such a gigantic enterprise. Without such enthusiastic support we must abandon a plan, which, if carried into execution, would afford a real lesson of constructive Peace.

Work of less spectacular nature but of no less value is that pertaining to the Literature Committee. While some Friends are fearful lest Peace workers confine their efforts too much to the mere preparation and distribution of literature, others feel that in such work lies a quiet force for the spread of the Peace cause that can hardly be measured and is nevertheless of the utmost value. The Literature Committee reports the distribution of one hundred thousand copies of a flier entitled "Keep Cool," and ten thousand copies of an address by Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, "Do Large Armaments Provoke War?" Seven thousand copies of the latter were distributed without effort or much expense, so great was the demand for them. It is reported from the Peace Headquarters that no literature that has been on the shelves for a long time has been as popular. Copies were forwarded to members of Congress while the Naval Bill was under consideration and several interesting letters of thanks were received. One Senator even included the address in one of his speeches and had it printed in full in the Congressional Record.

To give in detail all the work that has been done by the Literature, or indeed, any of the Committees, would require more time and space than are at our command. This brief account is an effort to acquaint the readers of THE FRIEND with some of our major interests and activities, because our work is the work of the Yearly Meeting and can only prosper as members of the Yearly Meeting bear it on their hearts and their purses.

ANNE GARRETT WALTON,
Secretary.

CHANGE.

O soul of mine, why tremble at the dark
Of the cold stream? Can so divine a spark
Be lost in crossing? Nay, the further shore
Is not so far and thou shalt grieve no more
The shadow vale once o'er.

O soul of mine, thou hast not known such joy
As lies before, the peace without alloy,
The partings over, gone are all thy fears,
No pain, no tears.

O soul of mine, so close allied to clay
As thou hast been, in the immortal day
Thou shalt be housed in splendor, waits for thee
The dawn of immortality.

—NELLY HART WORDSWORTH, in The Springfield Republican.

Some years ago I ran across the following paragraph in a little religious paper for the use of children and young people:

"Americans who are travelling through the picturesque little country of Holland, should not fail to visit the Berenstraat in Amsterdam, for they will find in that street a school which has a curious history. England, Holland and America, all had a hand in the making, so that it may be termed an international affair. A school on Dutch soil whose pupils speak no language but their own, yet conducted by English Quakers from funds derived from an American citizen—surely this is a unique combination!"

"There are many instances in which charity commissioners have had to step in and alter the distribution of funds which had accumulated in consequence of the trust becoming extinct. There is, however, one trust connected with Devonshire House Meeting in London which must be unique, as an illustration of the austerity with which Friends one hundred and more years ago maintained their testimony against all war." (Quoted from a private paper.)

Several years since, just before I was sailing for Holland to attend a Dutch wedding in Amsterdam, our Friend Joel Cadbury, of Philadelphia, requested me to visit this school, founded with funds that came originally from his ancestor, John Warder. He desired me to bring him some account of this school as it now stands.

In 1781, John Warder, a member of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting, became unwittingly involved in the reprisals carried on between England and America, by means of privateers. He was engaged in business as a merchant, and, in connection with a certain Captain Smith, was owner, in equal proportions, of a vessel called the Nancy, which set sail from England for New York.

This Captain Smith, without any knowledge or approval on his part (as John Warder assured his friends), took out letters of marque, commissioning the Nancy to act as privateer toward any vessel of the other contending powers. Holland was included in this, as an ally of America.

It so happened that the Nancy, carrying twelve guns, and the Eleanora, carrying eighteen guns, encountered a Dutch East Indiaman on its homeward voyage to Amsterdam. They attacked and captured her, and, from the nature of her cargo, she proved a rich prize.

On hearing of Captain Smith's action, John Warder, in order to guard himself against any claims that might arise, insured for £2000 with the underwriters at Lloyd's on the supposition that such an amount would cover his share in the captured vessel.

This boat, The Hollandische Welvaren or Wolvaert, was taken into Limerick to refit, but on her way around to London, encountering a storm, was lost.

John Warder then claimed and received from Lloyd's the amount of insurance, less the premium and expenses, making the exact amount, £1833, 3s. 9d.

With their known testimony against war, the Friends of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting visited John Warder in the matter. He, being in sympathy with Friends on the subject of war, and, as a proof that he wished to act in accordance with Friends' views, placed £2000 of stock in the joint names of himself and two Overseers in trust, Tenth Month, 1782, from which all just claims should be paid as they arose. In this trust deed he stipulated eighteen months, and, if within that time no claims came forward, the investment should become his own. But the Monthly Meeting thought that "no stipulation as to time could bar the Christian obligation for restitution" (quotation from the minutes).

Two years and a quarter having elapsed and no claimants appearing, John Warder requested the Overseers to transfer the stock into his own name, which was accordingly done. Soon after this John Warder sailed for America, landing in Philadelphia, and was gone four years, though without the certificate of membership for which he had applied.

In 1790, he was visited again by Friends in London, but he sailed for America a second time without a settlement, and in 1792 the London Monthly Meeting made a statement and requested Philadelphia Monthly Meeting to visit John Warder on their behalf.

In Third Month, 1793, a reply was received. The report states that John Warder (while considering that everything needful had been done by him) is willing to set apart a sum of money for such claims as may arise. And a letter from the committee in Philadelphia enters more fully into the case "expressing a hope that John Warder may be considered to have complied with the wishes of the Meeting nearly enough and that the Meeting may feel disposed to appoint a few Friends to unite with one who may be appointed by John Warder, in making a strict inquiry after the owners of the prize, so that thereby he may be enabled to get clear of his entanglement to his own peace and the honor of righteousness, having observed a commendable disposition in him and his family in their attendance at Meetings and in other respects." This compromise seemed only just and there was evidence that the arrangement would be carried out, but unfortunately John Warder's affairs becoming embarrassed, he was unable to put this into execution until 1799, when he transferred the whole amount of £1833, 3s., 9d. to three Friends of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting in perpetual trust, stating "that if, after diligent search, such owners cannot be found the Monthly Meeting shall dispose of such amount, in such a way as they shall think most consistent with their principles of justice and equity." The case of John Warder was now dismissed and a certificate of Christian Fellowship forwarded to Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, Northern District, in 1800, as he had taken up his residence in that city.

The Devonshire House Monthly Meeting had no easy task in seeking those who might have suffered loss, and for twelve years very little was done, war interrupting communication with the continent, but in 1812 a committee of six Friends was appointed for six years "to take such measures as may seem suitable."

At length, as a result of extensive advertising in Dutch newspapers and by means of an old ledger which they found, certain claimants appeared.

The committee reported from year to year and the Monthly Meeting continued to order payments until 1818, when no further claimants appearing, the committee was discharged.

At this time, by good investments and from accumulating dividends, the original sum had increased to more than seven thousand pounds, so that after paying out £3345 to claimants, there was left a balance in cash and stock of more than the original amount. It was therefore clear, that, whilst great delay had occurred in the disposal of the fund, there had been no waste in the principal.

The question arising before Friends to decide was: "What shall be done with the money?" The Monthly Meeting allowed a year to elapse and then recorded its judgment in the following minute:

"This Meeting has solidly and fully deliberated on the subject of the Trust property remaining in the hands of Trustees connected with the case of John Warder and having read and considered the Trust deed, is of the judgment that the application of the remaining accumulated sum is completely vested in the disposal of the Meeting according to its judgment of the principles of justice and equity." A committee was then appointed to take up the matter of the appropriation of this balance, but for some years nothing occurred in their reports to the Monthly Meeting excepting that more stock was purchased with dividends. At length, in 1824, a definite proposal came before the Meeting, and the problem was solved by a visiting Dutch Friend.

John Stephen Mollett had become greatly interested in an infant school which had recently been started in Spitalfields, one of the most poverty-stricken parts of London.

As there were no free schools in Holland, he suggested that such a school might be established in Amsterdam with great success.

The money had come from the ship Holland's Welfare, and they were agreed that for Holland it should be expended, so that the proposal met with favor in the Monthly Meeting, but from one cause or another a delay of over four years occurred before this was put into execution, and in the meantime several special cases of distress in Amsterdam were relieved through J. S. Mollett and an annual distribution of bread was made, at which time the origin of the fund was explained to the people. Stephen Grellet being present on one of these occasions remarked that "no more powerful peace sermon could have been preached than that embodied in these circumstances."⁸

Finally, in 1829, a house was taken on the Bereenstraat and a school opened for indigent infant children, modelled on the plan of the London school, J. Stephen Mollett superintending the arrangements. The success was marked, the benefit and example being freely acknowledged by the citizens, for in their list of public schools later, "Holland's Welfare" stood first, while in a letter from J. S. Mollett, just prior to his death, he writes: "This school remains to be a blessing to the city, and though other public schools have now been established, 'Holland's Welfare' obtains a marked preference." After some years the house became so old that it was found necessary to rebuild and English Friends, not wishing so excellent an institution to be closed, as it was a proof of their views against war, subscribed the money and in 1864 the present substantial building was erected at their own expense.

The lower part is of yellow plaster with a full rigged ship over the door and the initials J. W. in three places across the front. Under the window is painted "Bewarschool Amsterdams Welvaren."

A large wooden tablet, inserted in the wall of the main entrance, recounts in both English and Dutch the circumstances leading to the founding of the school.

Children of poor parents are admitted, between the ages of three and six years, though some of these seemed to be somewhat older. As order and cleanliness are cardinal principles, "the children must be taken to and from the school by a member of the family, and they must be neat, tidy and plainly dressed. Sweets are not allowed."

At the two daily sessions the elementary branches are taught, short poems, suited to their age and capacity, are committed to memory and lessons in singing given. The school opens and closes with singing and prayer and a daily reading of the Bible.

A committee of four ladies superintends the management with a school mistress and three assistants. In the summer a vacation of three weeks is given and one at Whitsuntide.

To quote from a granddaughter of John Warder: "A lively scene is presented in the morning with the arrival of the rosy-cheeked children, all eyes catching sight of a clock dial pointing to the school hour with the inscription 'Let op den Tyd' meaning 'Be Punctual.' Gathering in two rooms the young voices are heard in the opening hymn, and later their arms and hands can be seen swinging and whirling in circles to imitate the windmill, so familiar a sight in Holland.

"On the wall in the upper floor were pictures of William Allen, Samuel Gurney, Elizabeth Fry and J. S. Mollett. In ⁸Stephen Grellet's account is as follows: "We came to Amsterdam on the eighteenth of Seventh Month, 1832, and visited the Infant School, supported out of the interest of the residue of the money proceeding from the share of John Warder in the prizes made during the war by a vessel in which he was concerned. They have now upwards of sixty children in that school. The building purchased for the purpose is a convenient one, and the matron, under whose especial care it is placed, appears to act the part of a mother and a Christian towards these young children. Our testimony against war is exalted through this act of justice and benevolence. Many persons come to visit the establishment."—Memoirs of Stephen Grellet, B. Seebahn. London, 1860, Vol. II, 250, 251.—[Editor].

the little library (shown me with much pride by the lady principal, were 'Sewel's History of the Quakers,' in Dutch, dated 1717, 'History of Friends in America,' 'Life of Joseph John Gurney' and 'Friends' Memoirs in English' (several volumes), but as most of the leaves were uncut, I judged these books had not been read.

"As I could speak no Dutch and they could speak but little English our conversation was limited, but the children crowded around us when they found we were from America, making up for lack of speech that was understandable, by a vigorous shake of the hands. They could certainly shake hands in English even if they could not speak it, and my husband's ear trumpet was intensely interesting.

"They recited and sang for us and their bright, friendly faces were a pleasure to see."

J. S. Mollett died in 1851, but for ten years previous to that his son-in-law, Daniel Boissvain, Jr., had become associated in the work and continued his interest for many years after to the satisfaction of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting.

The school's influence has been exerted not only over the thousands of children who have been in attendance, but it has been a model for other infant schools throughout Holland.

"Holland's Welfare!" It is a fitting name for a school where the children of the poor find instruction, warmth and shelter; where they are taught to love God and their country.

The John Warder School is still doing its good work and we trust will be a blessing to generations yet to come.

Through the kindness and courtesy of a descendant of John Warder, the following information concerning him has been furnished:

John Warder was the son of Jeremiah and Mary Head Warder, and was born in Philadelphia the fifth of Fifth Month, 1751, at the southeast corner of Market Street and Letitia Place (now Letitia Street). He was the eleventh in a family of twelve children. He went to England in 1776. Family tradition has it that he was not in sympathy with the American Revolution, and that no doubt was the cause of his removal. He established himself in business in London, and in 1779 married Ann Head, of Ipswich. No doubt his certificate of removal went to London at the time of his removal there.

John Warder made several trips to this country in connection with his business; but in 1795 he settled permanently in Philadelphia, and in connection with his sons, established an importing house at the southwest corner of Delaware Avenue and Race Street.

He died Fifth Month 7, 1828, at the age of seventy-seven, and was buried in the Friends' Western Burial Ground at Sixteenth and Race Streets. It is recorded that on his death-bed he enjoined upon his sons not to withdraw the prize-money from the English trustees for their own use.—From Bulletin of Friends' Historical Society.

"THY STRANGER THAT IS WITHIN THY GATES."

Two years ago in London, a Friend found a young man from a province of Austria, stranded and not allowed to carry on his college course. "Come to America with me," was his impulsive invitation, and the two set sail together.

Arrived in Philadelphia, the youth found employment, "a man without a country" as yet, his brother languishing as a prisoner of war in Russia, his parents in the far-off land, writing at long intervals, their little son begging to go to America that he may escape the army; what wonder that this immigrant of ours feels his isolation? His lodging is but a "roosting place," and if any one invites him as a guest over a "week-end," his response is hearty.

This is only one instance among many of young men and women far from home, working in our great cities, who do not wish to be patronized, but who are hungry for friendship, who ask if Friends live up to their name, who are waiting for an evidence of brotherly interest, whose affiliations in after life may be moulded by kindness and Christian influence.

Therefore, if any of our readers have a home they can oc-asionally share with such, "let us leave the latch-string out" to thy stranger within thy gates (Deut. v: 14), thus widening their outlook and our own. Harold Lane, Secretary of Friends' Institute, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, knows of many who come under his notice, and he could bring the host and the guest together.

Then, too, our country Friends may be cordial in their own communities. We read lately of a good woman who had quietly ministered to the afflicted. During her absence from home her granddaughter "exercised" the old horse, whose habit was to stop at certain houses, so she, too, caught the spirit of sympathy and learned the blessedness of giving.

MARY PRYOR HACK.

The failure to receive recent copies of The Friend [London] may have deprived some of its usual readers of the knowledge of the death of Mary Pryor Hack, of Brighton, which occurred Seventh Month 13, 1916, in her seventy-ninth year. Her books, "Self-Surrender," "Christian Womanhood," "Consecrated Women," etc., made her known to many in America some years ago and were read with much acceptance. She also published in 1886 a sketch of her great grandmother, Mary Pryor, who experienced a remarkable preservation at sea in 1798 on a religious visit to America. This book elicited high praise from one of our American authors.

She was the last survivor of a "great-hearted family to whom Brighton will ever be indebted in its [religious], educational and philanthropic history;" the youngest daughter of that saintly minister Daniel Pryor Hack, who died in 1886, and herself a minister.

A close companion says of her:—"Her one desire was to live to the glory of God and help to bring souls to Christ; this was her constant prayer."

One of her younger friends wrote regarding her death, "It is the close of a long chapter in all our lives, for what that family have been to our meeting and to Brighton cannot be reckoned—the easy hospitality and the perfect sympathy in every one's concerns. I know for years I shall have the feeling I must go and tell them all about it whatever happens to me." Here lived the godly parents and three daughters, all active in good works, Fanny, also a minister, not long outliving her parents.

Ten years ago the two sisters, Mary and an elder one, Priscilla, removed from town to Fir Croft, in the outskirts of Brighton, to live with their brother Daniel, whose wife had died; and the three presented to Brighton their ancestral home with adjoining house and large garden to be used as an open space for the town, the re-modeled houses as additional room for adjacent schools. The same "easy hospitality" was continued at Fir Croft, the last home, and many a weary missionary or tired worker found that luxurious house and its spacious, well-kept garden a haven of delight and repose.

These three were worthy representatives of their family. In his generous and unflinching devotion to the uplifting of his fellow-citizens Daniel Hack was busy until the summons hence came suddenly six years ago. At the time of the Franco-Prussian war, in 1870, he was critically ill with small-pox, at Metz, contracted while giving his services in relief work.

Priscilla, the eldest, lived to her ninety-second year, filling her place in the home with an ease and grace that a younger woman might envy. When she died last autumn, Mary herself had been stricken with a mortal disease, but maintained the traditions of hospitality and loving service till she gently fell asleep in Jesus. Throughout an intimacy of nearly fifty years I found her a true and faithful friend.

EVERY true prayer has its background and its foreground. The foreground is the intense immediate desire for a certain blessing which it is absolutely necessary for the soul to have; the background of prayer is the quiet, earnest desire that the will of God, whatever it may be, be done.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

THE OPEN HEART.

Would you understand
The language with no word,
The speech of brook and bird,
Of waves along the sand?

Would you make your own
The meaning of the leaves,
The song the silence weans,
Where little winds make moan?

Would you know how sweet
The falling of the rill,
The calling of the hill—
All tunes the day repeat?

Neither alms nor art,
No toil, can help you hear;
The secret of the ear
Is in the open heart.

AGRICULTURE IN WEST CHINA.

BY JANE C. BALDERSTON.

To one, who has grown up in a land where strong farm horses and good implements and machinery are essential to successful farming, the results obtained in Western China, where these things are practically unknown, seem literally marvelous. Except in the plowing of the rice fields, only man-power is used in all the preparing of the ground and caring for and harvesting of the crops. The nearest approach to farm machinery is a very crude plow, which is used in the rice fields and drawn by the clumsy water-buffalo. And as for farm implements, I have seen only one variety, a sort of hoe, which seems to be used for everything. But in spite of all this, gardens are as well kept as the best in our country, and good fresh vegetables are to be bought the year 'round.

In searching for the reasons for the productivity of this region let us consider first the natural causes. The climate is considerably warmer than that of Pennsylvania, especially in winter. The temperature seldom falls below 35 degrees, and frost is quite rare. (In the mountainous regions of the province this, of course, is not true, but I am speaking now of the lowlands, and especially the Chengtu plain.) The country is really semitropical, and all growth is much more luxuriant than in our temperate clime. By the first of Sixth Month flower gardens are running riot, and rose arbors are sending long shoots away up among the trees.

The rainfall varies considerably in different years. In 1914, there was a total of 50.73 inches here in Chengtu, while in 1915 the total was only 21.98 inches. In winter there is much mist and cloud, but not sufficient rainfall to enable the crops to mature without the help of irrigation. The rainy months of the year are Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Months. During the summer and Autumn there are beautifully clear days with plenty of sunshine, but considering the year as a whole such days are the exception rather than the rule. Once in a while we have glorious views of snow mountains about one hundred miles west of us, but from Tenth Month 4th last year to Sixth Month 7th this year they were not once visible. (The days which are not sunny are not necessarily dull and unpleasant. I think we would all burn up if we did not frequently have the clouds between us and the sun!)

The soil of this plain is alluvial in its formation, and so is very fine and rich. The surrounding region is known as the "Red Basin" because it is formed from red sandstone, and it, too, supports luxuriant plant life. Coming over the hills which border the plain, one is struck, first, with the fact that the hills are terraced and cultivated clear to the top; and secondly, with the very red color of the soil as it shows out between the bright green strips of wheat and vegetables on the terraces. In places where the soil is too thin to support vegetation, the Chinese place huge pieces of this sandstone around over the ground, and in the course of a few months the rocks are gone and they have the soil they need.

Thanks to the wise foresight of a Chinese statesman who lived nearly two thousand years ago, a splendid system of irrigation covers this entire plain. The waters of the Min River, where it breaks through the mountains to the north, are turned from their channel into a great network of ditches. As we came over the plain late in last Third Month we were always in sight of several of these, and there seemed to be an abundant supply of water flowing through them. The method by which the water was turned first into one channel and then into another was very evident and very simple: they simply block up one ditch with mud and open another.

The methods of transferring the water from the ditches into the fields are also very simple. Where the level of the water is already about the same level as that of the field, men simply scoop it out with large wooden ladles. Where it needs to be raised a few feet the commonest device seems to be a tread-wheel, which is turned by means of small treadles, by two men who sit perched above it. When the wheel is in motion an endless chain of wooden floats, operating in an inclined trough, pushes a continuous stream of water up to the higher level. People who live near a river get water from that by means of huge wheels made entirely of bamboo. They are turned by the current, and lift the water into bamboo troughs away above one's head, whence it is carried off to the fields by means of more troughs of the same material. The cups, which are situated on the circumference of the wheels, and in which the water is lifted, are merely hollow bamboo stems.

Even these methods of irrigation do not reach all the gardens, and many farmers draw water from wells for all their crops. Within city limits, especially, this is the chief method. From the window of my room I can see four well-sweeps in operation, and nearly every morning I see the large vegetable gardens next door (a few acres of them) all being watered by hand. These wells are, on an average, from ten to twenty-five feet deep.

But it is not only favorable climate, rich soil and well established irrigation systems which produce the splendid crops of the Chengtu plain. The farmers seem to be unwearying in their diligence, and they spare no pains in making their crops as fine as they know how to make them. One would almost believe that weeds do not grow in China if he did not occasionally find them flourishing in ravines and out-of-the-way places where cultivation is impossible. And every available bit of land, including much which we would consider quite unavailable, is under cultivation. In coming from Chungking to Chengtu, a distance of three hundred miles, we saw only two level pieces of land of any size which were not being made use of. One of these was a sandy stretch which is generally under water. The other was a high place which was almost covered with stones and was evidently quite barren. But we did find rice paddies away up in mountain ravines. And on terraces between rice fields, even where they were practically perpendicular, we almost invariably found peas and beans growing. Along the Yangtse we saw crops of peas being grown during the winter months on sandy spots, which during spring and summer are covered with from ten to fifty feet of water.

The methods of fertilization are not such as add to the sweetness of the air in China. Every sort of refuse is used, being collected in buckets and carried thus through the city streets and out to the fields. It is then placed in concrete tanks, of which there is one situated alongside of nearly every field. Here it is turned into liquid form, and in this form it is applied, not to the garden as a whole, but to individual plants. In the case of rice, it has to be simply added to the water in which the grain is growing.

Let us consider now what are the results of all this labor. As every one knows, the main crop over most parts of China is rice, and a great deal of it is raised on this plain. Some of the paddy fields are under water the year 'round and make a very pretty feature of the landscape. As we came overland last spring the plowing of these fields was beginning, and such an awkward process as it seemed to be! Great clumsy water-buffaloes laboriously drag one foot after another out of the mud and water, only to sink away in again at the next step. Of course the man who follows the plow has just as hard a time, except that he is not quite so heavy. He goes in well above his knees at every step. In the Fourth Month the seed-bed is planted and the next month the little spears of rice are transplanted, one at a time. Imagine the labor which would be involved if wheat fields, even though they were small ones, had to be set out one plant at a time, and that with the ground all under water! The crop is harvested in late summer or early autumn. All through this part of the country the water is then drained off and a crop of wheat or vegetables is raised before the next rice needs to be planted.

While wheat is not as indispensable in the life of the Chinese as it is in ours, still a good deal of it is grown as one of the winter crops. It did seem strange in early spring, almost before we are rid of snow at home, to see wheat already three or four feet high. But then we were more or less prepared for anything after having seen peas blooming at New Year's. Both awned and awless varieties are grown, but chiefly the former. The grain is ground and made into a sort of spaghetti, which is a popular article of diet. But bread such as we use is quite unknown.

Barley, millet, corn, buckwheat and oats are grown to a limited extent in the uplands where rice does not flourish. There seems to be no clover or alfalfa raised in the province, though the latter flourishes in North China. This is doubtless due to the fact that there are almost no horses or cattle to be fed.

Another extensively-grown winter crop, which is ready for harvest late in the Fourth Month, is rape, a plant very similar to, if not identical with, our wild mustard. It is grown chiefly for oil, which is not only used in cooking but is also the chief source of illumination all through the west of this country. The small lamps in which it is burned look much like those which our miners wear in their caps, and give about as much light.

In variety and quantity of vegetables grown I would guess that the Chengtu plain is second to no other place in the world. Consul General Hosie, in a report of the products of Szechwan in 1904, names fifty-four varieties of vegetables and eighty species. There are several different sorts of beans, of which two or three kinds are grown throughout the year. The Chinese use them all as vegetables, though some do not seem especially palatable to the "foreigner." Peas can be bought during all the months in which they are not to be had at home; only during the summer they are not on the market. Small, inferior white potatoes are to be bought during the summer months. But sweet potatoes are so abundant and so cheap that they are considered suitable food only for poor people and for pigs. Those of us who are not above eating them, however, find them excellent. Several kinds of cabbage are grown, one or two varieties of squash, eggplant, rather poor celery, fine large cucumbers, and most of the other things we have at home. There are also many things which we do not have. The Chinese are very fond of leeks in their own cooking. Bamboo sprouts is another favorite dish which the "foreigner" also is learning to enjoy. They are only beginning to grow tomatoes since seeing them in the gardens of those who have brought them from other countries. Asparagus they do not yet have, nor any sweet corn which is at all worthy of the name. Our regular field corn is used as a vegetable to a certain extent.

One thing a person misses in looking over a Chinese landscape is fruit orchards. There are single trees scattered about here and there, but even these seem very few. Consequently it is a continual surprise to find a supply of fruit always on the market. The Chinese themselves are not a fruit-eating people, and this may be one reason why, in spite of lack of trees, the foreigner can always get all he wants. Through the winter months there are excellent oranges and tangerines; a small sort of grape-fruit also appears in the spring, but it has not yet attained any degree of perfection. In latter Fourth Month and early Fifth Month cherries come, which are neither very large nor very sweet, but which one eats because they are a change. Starting with the cherries, but lasting on into Sixth Month and Seventh Month, comes the loquat, a large variety of haw. The fruit is yellow, about the size of a large plum. There are from three to six seeds in the centre, each larger than a cherry-pit, and the layer of fruit which surrounds these is not very thick, but it is very sweet and good when the fruit is at its best. After cherries come apricots, which are very nice for three or four weeks. Through Sixth Month and on into Seventh Month excellent peaches are to be had. There is only one variety, free-stones with very pink flesh; but from the success attained in raising these one would guess that other kinds would flourish if they were given a chance. The next fruit is plums a variety much like our "green Gage," and small, inferior apples. Pears are large, but woody and fibrous; and pomegranates are nice for those who like them. Towards winter come splendid persimmons of various kinds. They grow as large as apples and one eats them with a spoon like oranges.

Of the fruits which one misses, apples, such as one gets in the States, would perhaps head the list. Bananas also are not to be had at all. The trees grow here but the fruit does not mature. A few kinds of berries grow in the mountains, but here the only available sort is mulberries, and most people do not care for those.

Considering the subject of agriculture in West China as a whole, one finds much to admire, as well as much that may still be improved. Probably there is no other portion of the earth so well irrigated as this plain. Nor is intensive gardening carried on in many other places on such a scale. But the Chinese farmer does not have the knowledge which would enable him intelligently to plan for and improve his crops from year to year. Seed selecting or testing, fruit spraying, or any of the modern methods of the Western farmer are still quite unknown to him.

But this state of affairs is not always going to continue. Just as America has already borrowed the soy bean from China, and is learning (according to recent numbers of the Independent) that the loquat, and one of the varieties of Chinese cabbage, are worthy of a place in our orchards and gardens, so China is learning that there are not only crops but methods in other parts of the world which are worthy of her notice. Agricultural schools are even now being started and great numbers of students are coming back each year from countries where they have seen modern methods in operation. A few years or generations are bound to see the old order changing. With the output of this region such as it is under present conditions, what may we not expect for the farmer of the future in West China!

NATURE STORIES.

"There's a great wild pull
That comes into my heart,
Like the pull of the wind on the sea.
There's a far, far call,
Flute-sweet and small,
Like the song of new sap in the tree.

There's a restless joy,
And a glad, dull ache,
And a longing to understand
The meaning that lies
In butterflies,
And sunsets, and stars, and sand.

For the spring has bloomed
In a goldeny mist
Of willow buds, sap and tears,
And the fleecy sky
Gives promise shy
Of the 'country that knows no fears.'"

NEWS ITEMS.

WILLIAM C. AND ELIZABETH C. B. ALLEN arrived in Philadelphia Ninth Month 18th, having spent the past four months in England and Ireland. Most of this time they were engaged in religious work in England. There was much in both countries to call on their sympathies in this time of suffering and stress among members of our Society. They have been visiting with relatives and friends near Philadelphia since their arrival and plan to leave for San José, California, about the middle of Tenth Month.

THE work of The World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the churches has been already presented to Friends by our Peace Association,—but perhaps all our members do not know of it. The Alliance was established at a conference held in Germany just as the war began. "This was the first International Peace Conference of Christians." Ten national councils have now been formed, the American Council, of which Sidney L. Gulick, is Secretary, comprises 250 of the leading Christian citizens of the United States; they come from forty different communions. (Our friend William C. Allen is a member.) The aim of this Council is to carry on systematic education in true Internationalism by means of Peace Makers' Committees in every local church. No new meetings or organizations are proposed, but the work is to be done through Bible Classes, Clubs and other Societies already in existence; suitable petitions to the President and to Congress are also suggested. No financial obligations are invited, except as individuals may wish to help by contributions. When a church or meeting wishes to join, it reports to headquarters of The World Alliance, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, and sends for a Peace Makers' Manual.

The Commission on Peace and Arbitration of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America co-operates with this movement. It certainly seems that the Society of Friends might join in this work, even if all our meetings have some Peace organization.

HORACE E. COLEMAN is known as a fellow-member to many of our readers. The following, under the caption "A Karuziawa Sunday School Institute," will be of interest:

In this Japanese mountain resort, the missionaries and Japanese unite training work with their recreation, and this summer the interest has taken a new turn, for Horace E. Coleman, as the recently arrived First-day School Field Secretary for Japan, has brought from America to Karuziawa a splendid First-day School exhibit and library.

The progress which Japan is making is shown by the subjects discussed at the Institute, such as "Teacher Training," "The One-Room School," "Graded Social Service," "Story Telling," etc. For two weeks, Japanese teachers, pastors, Bible women and superintendents will be in training at the Karuziawa summer school. The suggestive motto of the school is "The Children of To-morrow Make the Church of To-morrow," and the school prospectus says, "Japan will be won to Christ as soon as the children of a few generations are led to Christ. Observation and experience justify the declaration that less time and effort are necessary to win twenty children to Christ than one adult."

A CORRESPONDENT sends the following, which some of our readers may have seen already in print elsewhere. It will recall to mind much that concerned many friends of Westtown when in the nineties they were busily engaged in preparing for her centennial celebration:

MOSES BROWN SCHOOL.—One of the most interesting events of the past year at Moses Brown School was the Mid-winter Alumni Dinner. Great interest has already been shown in the new Alumni Association and an effort is now being made to gather the names and addresses of as many graduates and old scholars as possible in order to publish a school directory in time for the Centennial Celebration in 1919. In connection with the Alumni Association it is interesting to call to mind some of the meetings of former Alumni Associations which have been allowed to lapse. The reports of many of these meetings have been preserved at the School and much of the matter which they contain is worthy of publication. It was for one of these gatherings that Whittier's poem, "The Quaker Alumni," was written. We reprint an account of an address on the founding of an Alumni Association, delivered by Pliney E. Chase, in 1859.

Pliney E. Chase, of Philadelphia, said that he had considered it a pleasure, and almost a duty, on his way to the meeting, to make a pilgrimage to the school. He visited the building, the playground, the groves,—and while he found much that was unaltered, he found many changes, some of which he was satisfied were real improvements and cheering marks of progress. The pleasant associations that were awakened by the visit had given additional interest to the present gathering, and additional reasons for hoping beneficial results from the organization of an Alumni Association. Such an organization would not only afford an opportunity for frequent agreeable reunions among those who had been bound together by the ties of early friendship and kindred pursuits, but it would also, undoubtedly, react advantageously on the institution to which it owed its existence.

The school was established for the purpose of affording a "guarded education," and it is the duty of its friends and of those who administer its discipline to see that the intentions of its founders are wisely carried out. A rightly guarded education will not only shield the pupil from the undue influence of a worldly spirit, but it will also protect him from the even greater danger of unbounded self-complacency; it will not limit its teachings to any narrow and merely sectarian views, but it will embrace all broad and liberal instructions, subordinated to the highest moral and religious principles,—principles that are recognized not only by Friends, but by all sincere, earnest Christians. If the Association, co-operating with our beloved Alma Mater, secures to all the future pupils of the school such an education as this,—after the world has accomplished its purpose, and the memory of all temporal things has become like a long forgotten dream, the influence we are now inaugurating will continue to be felt, in the character and dispositions that it will aid in impressing on coming generations, as a portion of their eternal inheritance.

THE following testimonial is from the forthcoming report of President Robert L. Kelly, concerning Prof. David W. Dennis, of Earlham College: "First of all, it becomes necessary to speak of the death of that beloved teacher and inspirer of us all, David Worth Dennis. He spent almost all of his professional life in the interest of Earlham College. His influence for good transcended all means of measurement or power of statement. So long as the College exists or the memory of those who knew it and loved it lasts, the vision which he gave us will remain and his hopeful, helpful influence will warm our hearts and strengthen our purpose. At this time, I can say nothing more except to repeat the official resolution of the Board of Trustees.

"The Board of Trustees of Earlham College feels profoundly the loss of Professor David Worth Dennis. He was one of the most remarkable personalities ever connected with the College, and he has contributed more than can be expressed toward making the College what it is.

"His amazing fund of knowledge and eloquent gift of speech, his dramatic power of expression, his irresistible humor, his never-failing optimism, and, above all, his matchless capacity as an inspirer of youth, constituted for years one of the priceless assets of the College. He gave his students vision; he widened their horizon and he showed them possibilities and inspired them with courage to go forward. His influence will continue through the years and those who do not see him and hear him will hear of him and will be helped to live larger and gentler but at the same time more courageous lives as his virtues are recounted.

"The Board would extend to the family this expression of its appreciation and sympathy and of its unbounded faith in the ideals of David Worth Dennis."

ENGLISH FRIENDS IN PRISON.—The Friend [London] of Eighth Month 4th, contains the names of sixty-three "Friends and attenders detained by the military or in prison." The majority of these are in a civil prison under sentences varying from fifty-six days to one year. In six instances the death sentence had been imposed, but in each this subsequently was changed to an imprisonment of ten years. These are all being recognized as suffering because of their convictions on the question of war and their refusal to fight.

The Friend states that this table "does not contain the names of those Friends, who having been in detention or imprisonment, have now been released either unconditionally or in order to join the F. A. U. or engage in work of national importance through some other agency."

It is stated that on Seventh Month 28th the total number of men reported as having been arrested and handed over to the military authorities was 1715. Of these 866 have been court-martialed and 110 have been released. Of the total number 164 are members of the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

In a leader the Episcopal Recorder has recently said: "The committee in charge of education in the City of London, England, are facing the problem of a shortage of teachers. This is not a war problem, for the supply has been steadily diminishing. London needs about 1,100 entrants per annum, about one-third of whom should be males. Last year the whole supply was only five hundred, and only twenty-five were males. The chief cause of this great and deplorable shortage is due to the smallness of the salary paid; for while there has been no increase of salary for some years, the cost of living has gone up by leaps and bounds. The sooner the government recognizes this the better it will be. In a measure the same thing could truthfully be said of some of our big cities here. The education of children should be one of the chief concerns of the State or immediately, and those who are in charge of the matter should secure the best service possible. Such a policy would demand the spending of money, or men with any ambition would seek other avenues of service than that of teaching. It is very poor business to "skimp" in the matter of the public schools. There is no nobler profession than that of teaching and none offering greater opportunities for the doing of good, but here, as in other fields, the laborer is worthy of his hire.

AN EFFECTIVE PEACE CIRCULAR.—The Friends' Peace Headquarters, with offices at 111 S. Thirteenth Street, Philadelphia, has recently issued a leaflet in the form of a hand bill printed in two colors, setting forth in brief and telling form a few of the important considerations concerning preparedness from Friends' standpoint.

A few of the striking sentences are as follows:

"The surest defense of any nation is the friendship of other nations."

"Good will is harder to overcome than armaments."

"An ounce of thinking is better than a ton of fighting."

The last sentence reads: "We call Jesus Master and Lord—why not prepare to do as He said!"

THE late William Graham Sumner, of Yale, whose essay, "Peace and War," is to this day a text-book that no pacifist can afford to leave un-read, was perhaps one of the first college professors to endeavor definitely to instill into his students' minds a knowledge of the philosophy and practical aspects of peace. It is to be hoped that as able a teacher may be found for the "Chair of Peace" that is under consideration at Fordham University. An anonymous donor has offered $10,000 towards the establishment of this chair, providing the trustees of the University will arrange for its further endowment. In his letter to the president of the Fordham Alumni Association the donor writes: "Let Fordham establish a 'chair of peace,' and I predict every great university in the world will follow suit, to Fordham's lasting glory. So long as the multitude is satisfied that even university men believe warfare cannot be ended, so long will the popular cry for war go upon the least provocation. On the other hand, let the universities of the world prove that they believe war is preventable, by establishing chairs of peace, and, before long, the people will begin to accept calm counsel from those who are studying the war question free from prejudice and who will have seen its utter folly."—From Advocate of Peace.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—The States of Oregon and North Dakota have recently abolished the death penalty, making nine States where the State may no longer kill. Several other States have substantially abolished it, by allowing the trial jury, when they render their verdict, to declare whether the penalty shall be death or life imprisonment; the verdict is invariably imprisonment, except in very atrocious cases. Bills were introduced to abolish capital punishment in the States of Tennessee, Utah, New York, New Jersey and Michigan. In Tennessee there was a very active propaganda promoted by one citizen. In New York bills were introduced in the Legislatures of both 1915 and 1916. In 1915 a hearing was granted, and a very large delegation attended it and advocated the passage of the bill, but it failed; in 1916 no hearing was granted, although it was requested, and the bill died in committee. In New Jersey the Senate passed the bill, but it finally met with defeat, owing, it is claimed, to the opposition of the Governor. In Arizona the question was put to a vote of the people in a general election. Governor Hunt, whose opposition to capital punishment was well known, was a candidate for re-election; although he was elected, the referendum to abolish capital punishment was lost by about 1,200 in a vote of 30,000. At the time of the election there were eleven sentenced to die and awaiting the day to be set by the Governor. Three men were electrocuted in Sing Sing Prison a few months ago; before their death they signed a remarkable letter, appealing for the abolishment of the death penalty. Warren Osborne gave it to the press and it has appeared in many papers.

The following letter which appeared in a recent issue of The Friend (London) has a wide application and may well fit some of us on this side the Atlantic. It appears under date Seventh Month 27th.

SERVICE AND SACRIFICE.

Dear Friend.—In these days when the eyes of the world are so closely upon us, it is surely more than ever essential that we keep a firm hold of the first principles of our faith, and do not allow the desire—very laudable in its place—to give due deference to the opinions of others who may be better than ourselves, to weaken our advocacy of the message that God Himself gives us. The very fact that we have largely outgrown the individualistic viewpoint which was so marked a characteristic of the early Friends, the very fact that we realize that the word of the Lord often comes to us by way of our fellow-men, is apt to lure us gently and insensibly into the opposite error of forgetting that all the Lord's people are, in one way or another, called to be prophets. As George Fox put it (I quote roughly from memory) "it is not 'what did Peter or Paul or John say,' but 'what can't thou say?'"

In considering such very thorny and complicated questions as alternative service or the use of some special advantage in claiming exemption before the tribunals, must we not be particularly careful to ask ourselves, What am I standing for? am I here primarily to get exemption or to witness for the truth? to get security for some special class of worker, or to win the liberty for all men to follow out unhindered the guidance of the Spirit of God concerning their lives? Are those of us, for instance, who are doing what is often talked of as "religious work" keeping firm hold of the principle that all work done under the guidance of the Spirit of God is religious work; that Friends make no distinction between "secular" and "sacred," just because all life must be made sacred, and all work that it is right for us to do must be a vocation. Again, it seems now to be widely assumed in the country that because

"every man ought to make some sacrifice," every conscientious objector at least ought therefore to change his job for another in which, presumably, he is less experienced. But is it not, if anything, a sign of grace rather than of depravity for a man to have found already the work to which God has called him? What meaning has sacrifice in this crisis if not its old, old meaning "consecration"? What sacrifice is morally worth anything that is not voluntary service? "Compulsory sacrifice" is a contradiction in terms and in fact. If, therefore, a man, having honestly examined his own heart, and having thoughtfully and prayerfully considered the suggestions of others, believes that God calls him to continue doing his present work, with all simplicity of living and consecration of energy, is it not his duty to continue to witness for the liberty to do this? And may it not be that, while persuasion should always be tried to its fullest extent, the only way at times to show that one really cares for this fundamental tenet of the Quaker faith is to suffer for it.

Conscience is not negative, only, but positive. It says not only "don't do this, but also you must do that." It is above all things a missionary force. We Friends are certainly called to be missionaries of a new religious awakening, but if we are to be fit for this momentous service, we must seek to realize the full implications of our position, and stand by them without flinching, or being too anxious even in view of the probable discontinuance of useful work, if we "are out." God will look after His own work in His own way, if we are true to Him. While saying the above I want to urge myself and all of us to be very sympathetic with and appreciative of those who see things differently from ourselves. We are all quite comically fallible, and we are all embedded in acres of glass houses. Only let us be more than ever strenuous, now-a-days, in our endeavor so to live and breathe in the Divine communion, that amid all these baffling complexities our eye may remain single and our whole body full of light.

Sincerely,

MAURICE L. ROWNTREE.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Announcements showing that Haverford College is tightening its entrance requirements were made when the Main Line institution reopened for the year; Dr. Isaac Sharpless, the President, addressed the sixty Freshmen (the largest class in the history of the college), and 135 upper classmen. Announcement was also made that a bequest of $10,000 has been given to the College by the late Charles S. Hinchman, of Philadelphia, for astronomical purposes.

It was stated by heads of the various departments of the University of Pennsylvania that the largest enrollment for many years was made. The total enrollment is about 8700, which is almost 600 more than last term. The new Freshman class numbers 2300 youths, or about 300 more than the incoming class of a year ago.

When the schools of Philadelphia open there will be just enough additional accommodations over last year to take care of the normal increase in enrollment, according to Associate Superintendent Albert Raub. "The number of part-time pupils will remain very near the same as last year, when there were 26,000 such pupils enrolled," said Doctor Raub. "During the year a number of new schools and additions will be opened, and it is expected before the school term closes that the majority of the part-time pupils will have been taken care of." The normal increase in enrollment is usually about 4000 children.

GENERAL.—Americans' gifts to the 60 principal war relief societies are estimated at $28,896,277.36 by the next year book of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Seven million dollars of this amount went into the $80,000,000 raised from all sources for the commission of relief in Belgium. In addition, the Belgian Relief Fund raised $3,085,000, other societies added $184,000, making a grand total for Belgium of $10,269,000, or over one-third of America's total contributions.

A despatch from Washington contains the following: "Japan's purpose to renew after the European war her contention for the right of her people to emigrate to and own land in the United States, suggested in New York by Baron Yoshio Sakatani, former Finance Minister in the Tokio Cabinet, was frankly admitted at the Japanese Embassy. Negotiations over these questions, which came to a deadlock two years ago, are not regarded by Japan as concluded, it was explained, but merely postponed while the larger issues of the war are being dealt with."

FOREIGN.—This is from the News Summary in The Ledger: "Greece decides for war on the side of the Entente Powers. Agreement reached by King and Council of Ministers. Greek battleship joins Allied fleet."

Citizens of the French city of Vendome sent an emissary to Philadelphia, asking for the return of Dr. F. C. Abbott, of Germantown, whose surgical skill and character have endeared him to all.

It is reported that Kavala, the walled Aegean seaport for Seres, the commercial center of northeast Macedonia, has been seized by the Bulgars. In Roman days Kavala was known as Neapolis; and it was here that St. Paul landed on his way from Samothrace to Philippi, where there was a thriving colony of Christians, to whom the Epistle of the Philip-pians was addressed.

It is said that Mexico has 13,000 miles of railroad and over 12,000 miles of the trackage normal conditions exist.

OUR THRESHING-FLOOR.

There is a beautiful story enshrined in sacred literature how King David discovered the site of the temple and the place of the altar of burnt-offering. He was guided to the threshing-floor of Aranna the Jebusite.

The owner gladly relinquished the plot of land to the king for the purpose desired, even though it was his means of livelihood, and the king in return richly compensated Aranna for his loyal surrender.

And herein is an allegory, teaching the profound lesson of the sacrament of life; that is, of heaven breaking into glory through the prism of earthly things.

We, too, have a threshing-floor, and our heavenly Lord and King wants to build His altar and rear His temple on the foundation thereof. Life on the plane of the visible is meant to be a seminary for life on the plane of the unseen and eternal. Our daily occupations, however humble, are to become forms of Divine worship. They have higher ends in view than the earning of our living and the securing of the means of an honorable independence or of the obtaining of such lawful pleasures harmonizing with our particular tastes. In the last analysis this mysterious earth-life of ours is sacramental. By the quiet performance of our allotted tasks, however menial, whether we work with brain or brawn; by temptations from within or without, if rightly met; by the difficulties incidental to our path, if bravely borne; by the cross, which meets us so unexpectedly and in numberless ways, both at home and abroad, if it be cheerfully taken up; by the reflex effect of our intercourse with others, whether congenial or otherwise, the Divine would communicate itself to us, so that heavenly qualities might be formed in our souls. And this deep work most generally proceeds without our being aware of it, below the threshold of our consciousness. Our humble circumstances, arrayed by the unseen hand of Divine providence, are meant to be a mystic ladder on which angels unseen continually ascend and descend between us and the heavenly world.

As King David built his altar on the threshing-floor of Aranna, so our Divine King would set up His altar in every bank, factory, business house, store, office, market, occupation and home. His Kingdom must come there as well as in the secret hearts of men.

Alas! how readily people listen to the sophistries of the carnal mind at enmity with the cross of Christ! Because the times are evil, corruption in high places frequent, honesty has a hard fight in its competition with dishonesty. Christ's ideals are good enough to be talked about in sermons, but quite impracticable in the hurly-burly of life! But we believe that to let the other man be honest first before we are honest is a fundamentally false maxim.

And even common honesty, however praiseworthy, is not the highest ground. For man, made in the image of God who is a Spirit, is essentially a spiritual being, and from this standpoint must life in all its parts be taken up. That men prone to be hypnotized with the passing and the material, and to ignore the spiritual universe, need to be renewed in the spirit of their minds in order to face life in this life, is evident. Unless our inward eyes are opened to behold the beauty, glory, harmony and love of the spiritual world from which we derive our being, we will not readily allow our threshing-floor to become a temple site, the material clod will continue to dominate us and heaven will be as if closed to our vision. It is not an arbitrary decree, but it lies in the very nature of things, that "except a man be born from above he cannot see the kingdom of God."

In Christ Jesus we have the Truth that sets us free to taste the glorious liberty of the children of God. His light shines in the hearts of all to give them the knowledge of the glory of God, if they will but heed it. Prophets have looked forward to the day when the knowledge of the glory of God shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. But one by one must men come to it, and to "mind the Light" is the sure and certain way.

But when this Divine teaching shall have overspread the world of human thought, then will men live, as they are meant to live, under "opened heavens." Then shall not only the more obvious evils such as slavery, war, intemperance and vice disappear, but class antagonisms and race-prejudices also. Then shall the deserts of life rejoice and blossom as the rose. The smile of heaven can make all things new, even in society with its problems and open sores.

There are Nathaniel-souls who are living under "opened heavens" already. We have met such again and again. They carry about in their hearts the harmonies of a brighter world amidst the discords of earth. Their threshing-floor has become the basis of a sanctuary. Such are our Lord's fellow-workers. They co-operate with Him in the building of the city of God, not in some far-off sphere, but here amidst human activities and interests, not by the shores of Genesareth merely, but by the banks of the Thames and the Delaware. For all things above and below must yet be gathered into one, even in Christ.

FRIENDS IN PUBLIC LIFE.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS FROM AMERICAN HISTORY.

[This address was read at the Annual Meeting of the Friends' Historical Society, held in London, Fifth Month 25, 1916. It is published in the last number (No. 3) of the Journal of that Society and in that way has reached a few of the subscribers of THE FRIEND who will, we feel assured, offer no objection to our using some space in THE FRIEND in a few successive issues in re-publishing it.—Eds.]

A very rough classification might divide ethical standards into two groups. One is based on results, the other on principles. The first is the favorite method of the politician, the man on the street and on the farm. If a thing produces good, it is good in itself; if evil, evil. A method of action, a piece of legislation is to be justified or condemned by the consequences which follow it. In ordinary affairs not involving moral considerations this sort of judgment is universal. Business decisions are wise or unwise according as they prosper. Fiscal legislation is ordinarily decided, not by external principles of political science, but by results as shown by history and experience which followed similar legislation in the past and are likely to follow it in the future. Perhaps ninety-nine per cent. of the acts of legislatures are determined by such considerations.

Philosophers codify these methods and variously call themselves hedonists, utilitarians, pragmatists and so on, as they vary the theories to suit the conditions of the age or country.

If one could see all the results nothing could be better. But the wisest of philosophers can only see a little way ahead and the shrewdest of politicians and business men have a limited horizon. What is manifestly useful to a few people immediately affected may not be for a more distant future or a wider circle. The primary results may seem highly beneficial, but those which result from these, unseen by the performers, may be disastrous.

The other sort of standard is based on something supposedly more fundamental. According to this when it comes to decisions involving the moral idea there is no room for a consideration of consequences. Things are inherently right or wrong. One must be guided by what is called the moral law. If we can ascertain this as applied to the case human duty is determined. It may lead apparently into all sorts of pitfalls and failures but in the long run it will prove a safe guide. In the eternal plans of a Divine Ruler of the universe that which seems inexpedient to us may be of the highest expediency; our very failures may be the means to the greatest success. The real good is the permanent, abiding, satisfactory result which comes by the operation of all the many factors and forces producing it, too various and too hidden for human ascertainment, but which are all parts of one great plan. It is the duty of the individual not to mar this plan. If he knows what his part is, small or great, resulting to himself as it will in loss or gain, resulting to others apparently for material good or ill, he performs it faithfully, and concerns not himself greatly with what follows. His conscience determines his course and that is all that there is to it.

But how is the man who takes this attitude to find what this moral law is? How is his conscience to be enlightened? There are quite as many philosophic views on this question as in the field of utility. Men base the standards of rectitude on reason, or intuition, or revelation, or on authority human or Divine, and deduce a code of conduct which satisfies the argument. Sometimes it is expressed in the sacred books of their religion, sometimes it comes to them directly as the revealed will of their Deity felt in their consciences, sometimes as the logical result of their rational processes.

The standard Friends of the past have belonged to this second class. When their duty was made known to them from their Bible or from direct revelation they were not disturbed by results. So they went to jail or to death for a conviction which often seemed trivial or foolish to others rather than abate an item of it. If one argued with them that their liberty might do more for their cause than the small testimony, the argument fell on deaf ears. That testimony was their present duty and all the rewards of disobedience, all the plausible considerations of results, had no bearing on the case. One and all the Friends of the first generations and the typical Friends who followed them were never utilitarian.

But the interesting fact remains that though they thus ignored results they got them. Their policy or, as it often seemed, lack of policy, secured consequences. They received religious liberty earlier and more fully than the temporizing sects. They had their marriage regulations made legal; they were allowed to affirm rather than to swear; much respect was paid to their anti-martial views; they reformed the jails and asylums of England and America, and their treatment of aborigines and its consequences have become historic.

There are many reasons for saying that fidelity to right in the face of seeming disaster works better than any one expects. There are many facts of history which show that men and nations do get along, when they follow the right, in a way which no one could have foreseen. There is some inherent vitality in the truth which makes its own way, or has a way made for it.

Let us consider the subject with which Friends have most often come in conflict with the problems of government—the subject of military attack and defense. Is it at all as sure as most men suppose that a military force is the effective means of sustaining the national life and preserving the national ideals? We look on defenseless China with pity, perhaps contempt, a prey to every designing enemy. Yet for 5000 years China has lived at least as securely as other nations, and preserved her civilization. She has seen the death of Assyria, Greece, Rome and Carthage, the decay of the Ottomans, and may outlast the militarism of Europe. Her boundaries are largely intact, and she finds friends in time of need.

Poor Finland is in the hands of an unscrupulous despotic power. Had she resisted with arms her liberties would have long since perished. But she through her schools and churches kept alive the national spirit and ideals, and through the resistance of this spirit and these ideals has maintained a liberty which cannot be quenched.

The province of Pennsylvania, without forts, arms, martial spirit or equipment, for seventy years lived and prospered as no other Atlantic Colony, and though threatened by Indian attack by land, the inroad of pirates by water and the many enemies of England, preserved her peace with her liberty and her integrity alone among the English Colonies.

The good following wars is often adduced. It is not possible to deny it. Manifest good things have been the consequence, often the effect, of many cataclysms, war, fire, flood and pestilence. The independence of America followed the Revolutionary War, the freedom of slaves the Civil War, settled government in California the Mexican War, and the rights of Cuba the Spanish War. But before we can logically credit war with all these benefactions, it is right to inquire whether the results could have been obtained by means which would not have caused the cruelties and crimes of the battle line or left the inheritance of bitter feelings which usually follows war. We can probably answer this in all cases in the affirmative.

We have only time for one illustration. The Mexican War is usually considered our most indefensible conflict, for the extension of slavery was its ulterior motive. But as we look at the prosperity of the great States bordering the frontier as compared with the anarchy and suffering across the line, was not the Mexican War justified by results?

Undoubtedly, the condition of the population has been improved. But records now in existence show that the war was unnecessary to produce this result. For the people of California were just ready to ask admittance to the United States, and the annexation would have come peacefully and left no inheritance of suspicion and hatred.

But we are not much concerned about such arguments nor should they be used too much as a basis for action. They are mentioned only to show that reasoning from results has two sides and is an uncertain support of theory. It is often more easy to ascertain the right than to ascertain the expedient, and it has been the custom of Friends in their attitude to public life to work in this direction, and to trust the consequences.

This little dissertation seems necessary to explain their abstinence, in many cases in the past, from the activities of politics and of government. Their thoughts have been so pervaded with the idea that immoral acts cannot be made moral by the beneficent consequences which seem likely to result, that they become inefficient in the work of practical politics as it usually exists in America. When they swallow their scruples they cease to be in harmony with the Friends' position and lose their standing in the Church. Hence we have frequently found that those members who have become active in political life have been on the fringe of the Meeting rather than as they were in early Pennsylvania, the trusted ministers and officials, whose state duties bore on their consciences no less rigorously than their ecclesiastical duties, but who would sacrifice either rather than violate an apprehended moral obligation.

For good seems to come from the chicanery of politics no less certainly than from war. Out of the selfishness, the venality, the immoral strategy of the presidential nominating conventions has come the greatest line of rulers any country has ever seen in any age. From the days when Hamilton traded off with Jefferson the location of the capital city for the funding of the state bonds in the first Congress down to the days of the last Congress, many measures yielding valuable results have come as the result of bargains not always honorable or moral. Every legislator knows that in order to have a good measure passed it often seems necessary to support others who want bad measures passed, and the perfectly independent man who yields nothing in this way is hardly efficacious in the councils or acceptable to his constituents. To do evil that selfish projects may succeed and to do evil that good may come are the lines that frequently distinguish the evil from the good man.

A PLEA FOR FREE FRIENDS' SCHOOLS.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters and it shall return after many days."

We believe that in no line of human endeavor open to us would there be greater return than in the maintenance of good free schools under the care of our society.

Aaron S. Watkins, Prohibition candidate for Vice-president in 1908, said that the Society of Friends had stood at the front in all the great reforms of the last two hundred years.

Many of our early members were cast into prison and a number gave up their lives as leaders in the movement which has given liberty of conscience to worship God in their own way to a large part of the human race.

The spirituality of the Christian religion and the immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit to the souls of men preached by early Friends has come to be recognized by thoughtful men of many lands.

The Society freed its own borders from the curse of slavery many years before Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation lifted the shackles from four million slaves, and many of its members risked their liberty to help the poor fugitive along on the so-called Underground Railroad in their flight to Canada, the land of freedom.

The unnecessary use of spirituous liquors was practically banished from the homes of Friends before there had been much agitation of the subject amongst the people generally.

We believe that their testimony against war will hasten the day when "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more;" although just now, to our finite vision, that glorious day may appear to be a long way off.

Thus we see that Friends have been leaders in many lines of human progress, but are they leaders in the educational field?

They may have been in the early days of the Society when public schools did not exist or were not conducted as they are at the present time.

Friends have maintained schools in most places where a sufficient number resided who would patronize them and pay their expense, but their progress has been retarded and in some places they have been discontinued on account of still adhering to the ancient method of supporting them, which was discarded by the public more than fifty years ago.

Most of the States give every child the privilege of a common school education free, and in our own at least all who wish to can avail themselves of a high school education at public expense. Should not the Society of Friends use its children as well as the State does?

Our method of taxing the pupils for the expense incurred is likely to place too large a share of the burden upon the heads of young families, who perhaps may already be hard pressed to meet expenses and pay for a home.

We believe it would be better to apportion the expense of the primary schools at least amongst our members, for many that have no children of school age are well able to help financially.

For all to help would renew the interest of many in the work, as we are all interested in those things for which we contribute. If undertaken unitedly it would be a connecting link between the old and the young, giving them a common interest.

If all will remember it is for the general good, most will be free to help even if they have paid their own children's tuition. It might seem to work a little hardship in some cases, but it would be no more unfair than it was when the law was passed to tax all for the support of schools, and would anyone wish the public schools to go back to the old method?

With our assessment raised to include support of schools, our Meeting expenses would still fall below that of most religious societies.

There is usually a way found to meet the tuition of those who are unable to pay, from some fund perhaps, but some upon whom the expense is quite a burden may feel a delicacy about asking for aid. If all helped such would be relieved, only having to pay according to their ability, and the fund could be turned in directly toward school expenses.

I am sure that the teachers would vote for free schools, as it would relieve them from making out bills and collecting the same.

It would remove the excuse some Friends make for sending to public schools to avoid expense, and if they helped the school financially they would be likely to patronize it. Some have censured our members for sending their children to public schools, which I think they have no right to do, unless the Society furnishes them with a free school and as good a one as the State does.

Some have suggested that Friends might be given their share of the public money, which at first thought seems fair, but if that were done other denominations might claim the same and the next step might be government support of a leading church.

The Yearly Meeting or Monthly Meetings might direct the raising of funds. Perhaps it would seem to possess a higher degree of authority if it came from the Yearly Meeting and some of the Meetings might help the less favored ones financially, under that plan. On the other hand, if the members of the Monthly Meetings contributed directly to the support of their own schools they might take more interest in the work.

We consider this community one of the most thrifty and progressive in the land; can we not start a new movement for the upbuilding of our schools which will free them from the incubus of this antiquated method of support?

Although our schools generally are conducted with a fair degree of efficiency, they are not all up to the high standard that would be attainable if we could unitedly work for their advancement and make their financial standing such that the committee can employ teachers possessing a liberal education, a talent and love for the work and for the most part having experience in the same.

Solomon said, "Bring up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart therefrom."

If we can keep our children under good influence until they are about through their teens, their characters will be in a good degree established and they will not be likely to go astray. Although they may not all remain in membership with our Society, if they have been educated under its environment they will ever after be influenced by the high ideals and principles which they have perhaps unconsciously absorbed.

The future of our Society depends on the rising generation and the generations yet to come, and if a little sacrifice on our part in their behalf will be as bread cast upon the waters to return after many days, let us freely make that sacrifice.

—Written by WILLIAM P. YOUNG and read at an Educational Meeting at Whittier, Ia.

FELLOWSHIP WITH GOD.

What then a man is called on to do when the summons reaches him to cultivate a spiritual communion with God is, in plain language, to put himself in such attitudes toward the things of religion that God may work in him, more and more often and ever more deeply, those convictions which lift him above the fluctuating motives that debase life and the wavering questions that agitate it.

And this, being further translated into terms of habit and practice, means that a man should open every door in his life by which he believes God can enter into him.

To read the Bible often and thoughtfully, to pray "without ceasing" both stately and on impulse, to attend upon church worship and the preaching of God's word at every opportunity, to seek the society of those like-minded in the purpose to experience Divine reality, to claim and secure for one's self the frequent opportunity of soul-searching meditation, to expose one's life in every possible way to the manifestation of the Creator's presence in nature, and especially to cultivate acquaintance with Christ in those works of human helpfulness which were His joy in the days of His flesh—these and such like means are an honest soul's invitation for the Father and the Son to dwell in his house.

And what the answer will be is written in Christ's own words: "If a man love me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him."

"Practicing the presence of God" is then not trying to work up a state of unearthly transport or to develop high-tension raptures but simply to live day by day in the realization that spiritualities are the true realities.

Perfectly has George Croly put the right Christian desire:

"I ask no dream, no prophet ecstasies,
No sudden rending of the veil of clay,
No angel visitant, no opening skies;
But take the dimness of my soul away."

From the Continent.

GOLDEN ROD.

A vagrant breeze comes stealing down across the northern hill
And drops into the sunny day a hint of autumn chill;
It stirs the lazy streams, asleep beneath the August skies,
And over daisy-spangled fields a gentle warning cries.

It passes, and where lately massed the summer blossoms frail,
There stands a band of sturdy flowers, enaced in gilded mail;
With spears upraised and plumes a-toss they swarm across the lea,
The rear-guard of a fragrant host departed hastily.

All down the lonely forest ways the daring raiders stream;
Above the dusty roadside grass their brilliant banners gleam;
And still, when frost has fired the wood and seared the autumn sod,
For summer's waning glory strives the gallant golden rod.

AT SUNRISE.

How often she has slipped out, silently,
To watch the sunrise from the little mound
She called a hill! How often you have found
Her warm nest empty—no soft, waking sigh
To stir the ruffles of the robe flung by
For brighter garb to meet the day, new-crowned!
So dawn has summoned her, and without sound
She fled, all gladness, as the white doves fly.

This time no footprints on the dewy lawn
To mark her going. Light bath lent her wings,
And this white shape of her that lies so still
Is but night's garment. How the glad day flings
Its arms, and glad birds twitter, "She has gone
To watch new glories from a higher hill!"

MATERIAL EFFECT OF THE WAR ON ENGLAND.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Unquestionably, England has not been hit as hard during this terrible war as have the other belligerent countries, but the following may indicate some of the material damage that has resulted in England within the past two years.

When you get into English country life you see more of the effects of the war than in London. The railway carriages are not only crammed with the innumerable parcels that the traveling Englishman loves to trouble himself with, but with hordes of soldiers. The officers often ride first class, and some of them are no doubt for the first time spending their money for this unusual experience. Queer tales I have heard; thus—a little lady with her child entered a first-class carriage and found sprawled out on the seats a huge young officer, who condescendingly said to her, "Madam, this is a first-class carriage." She quickly replied, "Yes, thank you, I know it; I am accustomed to first-class carriages." He bolted and was seen no more. Notices are posted all around the compartments warning the public to avoid conversation regarding the war because spies are everywhere, and thereby information may be conveyed to the enemy. Other labels also under "The Defense of the Realm Act" ask the public to draw all blinds or curtains after dark lest German bombs attack a moving train. The ticket collectors on trains and platforms are often women. Young girls pull about the tea stands at the stations and dispense tea and cake to the thirsty and hungry public. Sometimes from the rushing trains you catch glimpses of training camps with long lines of men training for the war. The platforms of the stations of the larger towns are often khaki color owing to the innumerable soldiers in view. When you drive through the beautiful rural districts, you at times hear the sharp voice of the drill-master across peaceful meadow or lovely sward. Occasionally you see long rows of stuffed bags suspended about the height of a man from the ground. These are for bayonet practice—the young soldier jabs at them so as to know how to thrust an enemy. Meanwhile he is taught anatomy, so that he may learn the vital places in the stomach of a man, so as to stick his foe. Frankly, I think it is a hideous national education.

The country-side is drained of men; the fields areilly tilled in many places. Feeble old men and women and children are at work, where hardy yokels used to toil in the days of peace. Well do we remember a certain midland station where some forty men with evidently unwilling step followed a young sergeant as he lead them like so many sheep to the slaughter. They had not yet donned their khaki uniform. They looked crest-fallen and scared, except one poor fellow, who sheepishly tried to laugh. A frightened woman clung piteously to one of them, whilst waiting for the train to carry them away.

What were their thoughts? What did king and country mean to them. Why should they thus be led off to kill other poor, limp, scared peasantry from other lands who never did them wrong? Did such thoughts as these claim them? They looked like the dregs of the country-side, yet they have souls. They were simply following the better canon fodder that already had been offered on the altar of Mars.

The shortage of men is everywhere apparent. The big hotels employ many women in almost every capacity except that of porters. These feminine workers do not receive much pay. I asked a bright young "lift" woman one day what she got per week. "Ten shillings," she responded, "and it is very little for I do a man's work." In truth, she did; one day I saw her lifting some big heavy traveling bags for a tall young officer and offering to carry them to his room for him. He took it all as a matter of course. The great banking houses are employing many girl clerks, for frequently fifty per cent. or more of the regular staffs are at the front. One day I went into the Appeal Tribunal in the House of Parliament, to which men came up to offer excuse as to why they should not leave their business and join the colors under the Military Conscription Act. Among the cases that came under review whilst I was present, was that of a young man, twenty-eight years of age, whose employer was offering testimony as to his importance in the business. Finally it came out that in his particular department of the firm there had been fourteen men employed, but now only lads or children were doing their work except the applicant for exemption, who was overseer. The other thirteen men had gone into the army. Upon hearing this, the military representative declared he would not demand the last man, and he was accordingly exempted. All other applicants whilst I was watching the proceedings were refused exemption.

Several times while I was in London I was in the office of one of the great banking companies that cash letters of credit for American travelers. Often in days gone by I have seen that room so filled with tourists that it was difficult to get around it or be waited on. This year not once did I see any Americans excepting ourselves. All was as still and subdued as a sleepy country bank. Not once in Ireland or England did we meet an American tourist, where in ante-war days both town and country had swarmed with them.

The dear food problem in England, whilst probably not as bad as in Germany, is a frightfully serious one. Recently the Women's Co-operative Guild published evidence of the disastrous reduction in the standard of living in the families of artisans, clerks, and others, due to the rise in the price of food. The increase in the cost of food since the war began has been over 50 per cent.; bread has gone up forty-five per cent.; tea fifty per cent.; granulated sugar one hundred and sixty per cent.; eggs fifty-three per cent.; potatoes eighty-six per cent.; meats sixty to one hundred and fifteen per cent.; household flour forty-eight per cent.; even fish, owing to few men now being engaged in fishing, have gone up eighty-one per cent.; coals in many places have advanced over one hundred per cent.

Truly the poor of England have a sorry prospect ahead for the coming winter. Not long ago the purchasing power of a pound was officially declared to be but twelve shillings six pence, as compared with its regular value of twenty shillings at the outbreak of the war. The workers bitterly resent these conditions. Their babies do not have milk; their children live on bread; the mothers and children in many instances almost starve in order that the working members of the family may have sufficient food to keep up their efficiency. It is true that the big wages of munition workers and the large "separation allowances" granted to families of soldiers will in many cases neutralize these conditions, but the fact remains that millions of others are suffering terribly as a result of the war. Their wages have not advanced in proportion to the rise in the cost of living. Meanwhile, the Government can do little for these unfortunate people, who see huge profits going into the coffers of contractors, shipowners and armament manufacturers, many of whom are allied by business, social or other ties to members of Parliament and the Government. It is the old story in every country in the time of war. There is the usual transfer of assets from the pockets of one set of people to those of another—mostly from the tax-payers to the contractors and war bankers, the Government practically in its capacity of tax-gatherer acting as agent through whom this transfer of assets is made.

The loss to national vitality, as well as to national wealth, is exceeding great. To illustrate: I was one day talking with a nurse in a private hospital for wounded soldiers, when she incidentally remarked, "We have a great many men without legs here." Her tone was quite matter-of-fact. I also remember what a nurse from Cairo, Egypt, said of the Australian boys, who, going to that city from the Antipodes, indulged in the excesses of the East, which made them "rotten" in body and mind. The vile conditions growing out of the unhallowed system of war as discovered in the Colonial troops bound for Gallipoli were both hinted at and occasionally publicly alluded to one year ago when I was in Australia.

Frequently when in London this year I would see the crowds at Charing Cross or other stations waiting to watch the thousands of wounded soldiers arriving on stretchers direct from France. The London daily newspapers constantly print with smallest type the long lists of dead and wounded. Each day sees the British Empire alone losing on an average from 4,000 to 5,000 men.

One day in a London hotel I met a fine Canadian officer just from the front. I was the first man he had talked to since leaving France one day before. He said to me, "Night before last I heard 4,000 of the Canadian boys marching by, and going to their death. Our losses since Saturday week have been 17,000. I do not know what is going to become of Canada." Here he stopped speaking from emotion. Finally he went on, "We are losing the best blood of Canada. Our people at home do not know what it means. Boys of eighteen years and upward, who ought to be near their mothers, have come out, thinking that they were on a holiday, and are being sent to the front and slaughtered, I do not know what is going to become of Canada."

On reaching home the writer is indeed sorry to see his own fair America at the beginning of all this sort of distress, which is the direct result of the mutual international fears built up through "preparedness." Conditions with us are becoming just as they have been in Europe. I now see here, as it used to be in Europe, pictures of our rich people in the newspapers who pose as the patrons of national defense, or contributors to military enterprises, knowing full well that if trouble comes from such preparation for war the monied class will reap the profits created by opportunities to loan money at high rates, or that are found in the advance of values that inevitably accompany war.

God has His best things for the few

That dare to stand the test;
God has His second choice for those Who will not have His best.

It is not always open ill
That risks the Promised Rest;
The better, often, is the foe
That keeps us from the best.

There's scarcely one but vaguely wants
In some way to be blest;
'Tis not Thy blessing, Lord, I seek,
I want Thy very best.

And others make the highest choice,
But, when by trials pressed,
They shrink, they yield, they shun the cross,
And so they lose the best.

—A. B. SIMPSON.

BEFORE THE TRIBUNALS.

AT LIVERPOOL APPEAL.—Robert Coope (A) (Liverpool), a medical student, in his fifth year, appealed against the decision of the Local Tribunal, which had granted him exemption from combatant service only. R. C. pointed out that by merely attesting or joining an O. T. C., finishing his course and taking a Commission in the R. A. M. C., he could have non-combatant service at £500 a year. He had offered to go to France with the F. W. V. R. C., if the Tribunal would not let him finish his course, and subject to confirmation from France would be accepted. He explained the type of work carried on there.

Chairman: "Have you any objection to treating wounded soldiers?"

Appellant: "I'm willing to treat anybody—as individual to individual."

Chairman: "Then I see no reason why you should not join the R. A. M. C. Don't you think the healing side of it is a great and noble thing?"

Appellant: "I do certainly, but the Government won't let me treat wounded soldiers as an individual. It says, 'You must in so doing become part of the army, acquiesce in the ideals and inner meaning of an organization which is part of the whole scheme of carrying on war.' I refuse to do that for it seems to me a compromise."

Chairman: "Well, the war is here now and we have got to go through with it."

Appellant: "Prostitution and drunkenness and other evils are here now, but that doesn't mean that I am to acquiesce in them."

Chairman: "You conscientious objectors think that no one has a right to object to war except yourselves. We all object to war."

Appellant: "I acknowledge that you do, but I think that your methods of dealing with it are altogether on wrong lines. You are only laying the causes of infinitely more war and trouble in the future and I say that your methods of ending war are ineffective and futile."

M. R.: "Then how do you suggest you are going to stop war?"

Appellant: "I don't think that there is any easy and dramatic solution; I'm out for the establishment of the Kingdom of God in the world and that involves conscientious objections to six or seven other things on this earth besides war."

M. R.: "But that will take hundreds of years!"

Appellant: "That doesn't matter."

[Appel refused and also leave to appeal to the Central Tribunal.]

AT BERKSHIRE APPEAL.—The replies given by A. E. W. Taverner to the authorized questions were read out. They included the following.

1. State precisely on what grounds you base your objections to combatant service.

My objection arises from the conviction that all war is absolutely opposed to the will of God as expressed in the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ. I cannot conceive of Him behind a machine gun or heading a bayonet charge, nor do I believe He would command His followers to do that which He would not do Himself. I regard human life as sacred, inasmuch as there is something of God in every man, and I hold that only He who creates and sustains has the indisputable right to terminate that life. The appeal to force is an animal instinct, savage and revengeful in operation, crushing the higher and developing the lower nature.

2. If you object also to non-combatant service, state precisely your reasons.

My protest is against war and the spirit that breeds war not merely against the destruction of life. Therefore I cannot distinguish between the man who actually fires the rifle and the man engaged in the maintenance of supplies. The two forms of service are inseparably connected and equally abhorrent to me, and I must resolutely decline to accept either.

3. Do you object to participating in the use of arms in any dispute, whatever the circumstances and however just, in your opinion, the cause?

Most emphatically. A cause is rarely (if ever) so free from complexity as to be wholly just, and even if it were, the use of arms does not emphasize its justice or necessarily ensure the triumph of right. No plea of necessity can excuse either the individual or the nation from the observance of Divine law.

4. Would you be willing to join some branch of military service engaged not in the destruction but in the saving of life? If not, state precisely your reasons.

I am not ready to join in any form of military service whatsoever. The saving of life referred to is not an act of mercy performed by the individual, but is essentially a military duty caused by the war and organized for the purposes of war. The result of my undertaking such duty would be to release another for more active service, which I refuse to do. Further, I would point out that a man serving in the R. A. M. C. is liable to be transferred to another unit.

9 (d). What sacrifice are you prepared to make to show your willingness without violating your conscience to help your country at the present time?

I am willing to listen to suggestions, but it seems to me that the whole spirit of sacrifice is destroyed and deprived of its virtue by the underlying element of compulsion. It has the appearance of a penalty for the avoidance of a duty, or of providing a means of purchasing exemption.

10 (a) If you are not willing to undertake any kind of work of national importance as a condition of being exempted from military service, state precisely your reasons.

It is obvious that a change of occupation at this juncture can only be designed either as a punishment or for the better organization of labor with a view to the more efficient prosecution of the war. I do not see how it is possible for me to assent to this without a sacrifice of principle which I am not prepared to concede. Principle to me is infinitely more important than expediency.

10 (b). How do you reconcile your enjoying the privileges of British citizenship with this refusal?

I reject the implication. I hold that the greatest service one can render to his country is to faithfully perform his daily duties and to endeavor to live in unswerving fidelity to the highest ideals.

THOMAS CARLYLE.

Our small village of Winona already has one or two newsboys and perhaps half a dozen aspiring for similar work. One of the latter came across a large package of old numbers of THE FRIEND in the family attic. The find brought with it the suggestion that it was his chance to become a newsboy, so the town was soon supplied with copies of THE FRIEND published in the seventies. We chanced to receive the issue of Second Month 8, 1879, which contains the following:

In the letters of Thomas Erskine of Linlathen, a Scotch theologian and philosopher, lately published, there is the following interesting letter from Carlyle, between whom and Erskine an intimate friendship had long subsisted.

CHELSEA, February 12, 1869.

DEAR MR. ERSKINE:—I was most agreeably surprised by the sight of your handwriting again, so kind, so welcome. The letters are as firm and honestly distinct as ever; the mind, too, in spite of its frail environments, as clear, plumb up, calmly expectant, as in the best days; right so; so be it with us all, till we quit this dim sojourn, now grown so lonely with us and our change come! 'Our Father which art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy will be done,'—what else can we say? The other night, in my sleepless tossings about, which were growing more and more miserable, these words, that brief and grand prayer, came strangely into my mind with an altogether new emphasis, as if written and shining for me in mild, pure splendor, on the bosom of the night there, when I, as it were, read them word by word—with a sudden check to my imperfect wanderings, with a sudden softness of composure which was much unexpected. Not for perhaps thirty or forty years had I once formally repeated that prayer; nay, I never before felt how intensely the voice of man's soul it is, the inmost aspiration of all that is high and pious in poor human nature; right worthy to be recommended with an "After this manner pray ye."

I am still able to walk, though I do it on compulsion merely, and without pleasure, except as in work done. It is a great sorrow that you now get fatigued so soon, and have not your old privilege in this respect; I only hope you perhaps do not quite so indispensably need it as I; with me it is the key to sleep, and in fact the one medicine (often ineffectual, and now gradually oftener), that I ever could discover for this poor clay tabernacle of mine. I still keep working after a weak sort; but I can now do little, often almost nothing; all my little "work" is henceforth private (as I calculate), a setting of my poor house in order; which I would fain finish in time, and occasionally fear I shan't."

It is refreshing to again meet with the tenderness of spirit that Carlyle manifested in speaking of sacred things.

The editorial and selection of articles in this issue reminded us of childish memories of John S. Stokes, the publisher. The writer was present during many interesting conversations between him and our older friends. My mother, Hannah H. Stratton, was an unusually sensitive person, but perhaps no more so than he, so she appreciated his novel suggestion that the thickness of the skin of the rhinoceros would be a convenient covering for them.

We wish to commend the suggested program of peace in your last issue, the one of Eighth Month 17th. We like its constructive attitude and believe our part is to stand in advance public opinion as our work is more effective in the early stages of nation-wide problems than after a stand has been taken by the press and the people.

WINONA, O.

DILLWYN STRATTON.

HIS TESTS.

In a modest home in a quiet neighborhood in a great city not far from New York there lives a merchant who has amassed a fortune by treating his customers and employees with consideration and justice. But, not satisfied with being an exemplary business man and a generous employer, he has recently turned the management of his concern over to his employees and admitted them into its ownership upon a co-operative basis. He is thus enabled to devote practically all his time, talents and money to the public service.

He was in New York last week attending a committee meeting where the principal business was the selection for employment of a group of men to carry on a very important public work. This is what he said as to the tests he has applied to men in the past and proposed to apply in the future:

When a merchant from a distant city comes to request me to open an account with him, I first ask him whether he is a member of his local chamber of commerce or board of trade. If he says "No," then I hesitate before proceeding further. I find that the man who exhibits no more public spirit than that is sure somehow and some way to fail when the crisis comes.

When this war is over, however, I am going to apply another test, not only to business men, but to others. If I am asked to pass upon the qualifications of a man, my first inquiry shall be how he has conducted himself, his household and his business during the war. If he has made no readjustments or sacrifices, but has continued to live his normal life, callous to the death of his brothers across the sea and the destruction of civilization, he shall never pass muster with me.

These are novel tests, but we wonder if there are many better ones.—Independent.

[The following very suggestive article should be of value to both parents and teachers. The author is well known to some of our readers. He easily takes a first rank amongst those from the younger generation to join the teaching profession. We have taken the article from the Journal of Education. It is included in one of the two numbers devoted to gleanings from the meeting of the National Education Association, held in New York early in last Seventh Month. These gleanings represent the "irreducible minimum" of present-day theory and practice in our schools as disclosed in the discussions of that meeting, and all members of school committees should, we think, make themselves familiar at least with this minimum.—EDS.]

READING CLUBS INSTEAD OF LITERATURE CLASSES.

Friends of mine frequently say: "Oh, yes, I hear you just turn your boys loose in the library." Unfortunately that would eliminate the teacher. The chief difference between our reading clubs, which take the place of our literature classes, except in the final year, and turning boys loose in the library is that we give the teacher a part to play, of stimulating and suggesting, while the class-room becomes a sort of forum for the exchange of information and ideas. But we do have this similarity to the library scheme: No books are prescribed and no two boys read the same book unless they want to or unless the class, with the advice and approval of the teacher, elects a particular book for class discussion. No boy, in other words, is condemned to read a book at the same time as other boys and at the same rate of speed—any more than you or I, in forming our reading habits, confine ourselves to a standard routine as to quality, quantity and speed.

There is nothing new in the idea I am bringing forward; but we have carried it farther than most schools—carried it, I hope, to a more logical conclusion. The first thing to do is to throw the college list of books incontinently out the window, instead of pretending to dignify what can be done in one year by spreading it thin over four years. The point is to meet each pupil at his own level and to lead him gradually by the right literary steps for him to a higher level. Such work assumes, of course, that mental discipline is not the object of literature classes and that a set body of literary information is far less important than the habit of reading good books.

The main method employed by us is as follows: Each boy reports on a book from time to time to the class, which discusses the book from whatever angle seems profitable. The teacher is there to prevent irrelevant and haphazard comment, but he is not there to dictate devitalized or meticulous discussion. The fact that he is never quite prepared is one of the most educative parts of the scheme. Such work, moreover, at once liberates the pupil, the teacher and the subject from the superstition that English is a sort of Latin made easy, while it makes possible and desirable discussions which, though really vital, struck with dreadful discord into the solemn dullness of the old-style literature class. No longer required to make all trees grow at the same speed and in the same kind of soil, we find it reasonable to encourage each under its best conditions.

So far, after three years' trial, the results have been gratifying. We find that our boys read about two and a half times as much as they did under the old system of literature classes and required outside reading, and that they read most of the books we used to prescribe, only in different order. Naturally, a good deal of trash is read—as it used to be, incidentally—but it is now possible to handle it frankly and to show, with some measure of success, its real relation to good literature. Since there is no compulsion, there are, of course, a few shirkers, but the number is surprisingly small, far smaller than the number of those at the top who profit by the new liberty. After all, our obligation is to the best as well as to the worst; and the worst are hardly worse off reading nothing than when they took the "classics" as medicine. With the larger background acquired from the reading club, boys find specific preparation for college simple in the last year; in many instances they have already satisfied the group requirements without knowing it. Finally—and this is the important thing—their reading is rationalized till it seems to bear some vital relation to their lives. We hope they are developing the book habit.—W. S. HINCHMAN, Groton School, Groton, Mass.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.—Those who are seeking gifts must recognize one power. They must recognize the power of prayer. The enterprises of the Church that have failed can, in most cases, be marked either by the lack of prayer or by the lack of faith in prayer. From the hour that Christ said on the mountain-side: "Ask and it shall be given unto you," there has been the necessity for the Church to believe this.

The practice of prayer is an absolute requisite to the securing of large gifts. Prayer must permeate the individual messenger. Prayer must permeate the giver, and the whole Church must be in prayer for any enterprise that is to succeed for God.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

The wicked men against the Truth
 May fight, the fight in vain;
 A little while they seem to win,
 But Truth is sure to gain.

Truly in vain shall Earth and Hell
 The march of Truth oppose;
 For Truth shall live, forever live,
 And conquer all her foes.

THE PEOPLE OF THE WEST.—A staff correspondent of The Outlook, Frederick M. Davenport, writing his impressions as to political tendencies west of the Mississippi, has this to say in the issue of Ninth Month 20th regarding prohibition present and prospective:

Suddenly, to the wonderment of many of the younger newspaper men of the Hughes party, we ran into the Western prohibition wave. Instead of receding, it is rising higher and higher. In Wyoming it shares, with the struggle over the senatorship, the chief attention of the people. In Utah both parties have declared for it, and there is no question about the passing of the law or its enforcement. The Mormon Church will be behind it. "You know," said a leading Mormon to me, "there weren't any saloons in Utah until the non-Mormons began to move in. We are naturally a temperate people."

The friends and foes of prohibition are to try conclusions again this Fall in California. Every great vineyard in California has a sign warning against prohibition. But my best information is that there is a very strong probability that the first amendment proposed will win this time, and that saloons will be driven from the State of California. In Washington and Colorado attempts are being made at the coming election to modify the existing law. But nothing could be more futile than the effort. In Washington even the extremely conservative Blethen, of the Seattle Times, who fought prohibition bitterly, was out just before we came into the State with a declaration that all the power of his papers would be turned against any step backward. Like William H. Cowles, the very progressive owner of the Spokane papers in the Eastern part of the State, he holds that the economic results as well as the moral results of one year of prohibition are beyond price. And the same thing is true in Colorado. Every witness of whom I made inquiry, including Governor Carlson, who is prohibition's most valiant champion in the State, told me the same story. The majority for it, if it were voted upon again, would be doubled and more. Said a prosperous and excellent citizen who took me about Denver in his car, "My cellar is still well stocked and I voted wet. But"—pointing to a corner where one of the leading saloons used to be—"all these places are filled up and good business has covered every loss and more. Why, the Brown Palace Hotel never did so well. And I don't know," he said, "it's a more clean and wholesome town. If this thing comes up again in any form, I vote dry."

A reporter for the Kansas City Star, whom I met on our train, and who had been spending a week in Denver interviewing for his paper, and in the interest of the prohibition movement in Missouri, many leading bankers and merchants who had voted wet last time, told me the same story. It is dry for all of them if the matter comes up again.

It is in the air of the West—anything that injures man, woman or child, whether it is political or economic tyranny, or liquor, or whatever it is, has got to go. How is Eastern Republican conservatism going to stand against it? If conservatism tries it again, it means another revolution and destruction. The best conservatism can do is to guide this liberal sentiment and balance it for the good of the whole Nation.

RUM FOR AFRICA.—The Christian Herald not long ago printed a letter from J. Newton, Secretary of the Native Races and Liquor Traffic United Committee, Palace Chambers, London, relative to the rum traffic in Africa. J. Newton tells the story of a riot that occurred at a yam festival at a village in the Gold Coast region, caused by the natives getting drunk on American rum. After thirty persons were killed in this riot the government had to close down the liquor shops for a time in order to restore peace in this African village. Hervey Wood, to whom J. Newton addressed the letter, says:

"The distillers and brewers of the United States are sending every year not less than 20,000,000 gallons of rum, whiskey and beer into lands where our missionaries are at work."

The Christian Herald pleads for the enactment of Federal legislation to prevent the exportation of liquor to Africa.

Yes, by all means, let our Government prohibit the exportation of this poison which is working such havoc among the natives. Uncle Sam religiously guards the native American, the red man, against the greed and avarice of the liquor interests. The same motives which prompt him to protect them should cause him to save, so far as within his power, the natives of the dark continent from the ruin wrought by liquor under the protection of the Stars and Stripes.

Frequent comment has been made upon the fact that since the great European War has been in progress the breweries and distilleries of the United States have greatly increased their liquor exportations to Africa, because of England's inability to supply the demand.

The one best way to prevent this exportation is to annihilate the whole liquor business in our own country.—The American Issue.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN.—Suddenly the child looms up as a proper object of Government concern. Infantile paralysis attacks him, here in New York, and the whole country is interested. Dozens of children die in a day of the new scourge; and city authorities are alarmed. In a few weeks a few hundred of children are carried to their graves; and the alarm spreads. In a month or so a quarantine is established to hem in the disease.

The Federal Government shares in the concern and legislation is invoked, and the National power, to stop the spread of infection and protect the child who may otherwise become infected. The State, the city and the nation are alert in defense of home and health—for the common good.

AND IT IS RIGHT THAT THIS SHOULD BE.

But more children are born every day with a worse endowment than infantile paralysis, than die of it any day in the entire country. They are born with paralyzed brain, or defective organs of locomotion, as such objects of pity as any child who becomes crippled by the paralysis now so greatly feared. They may be found in the institutions for defectives, which tax-payers build and which liquor sellers fill.

The cause of them is well known to scientists. For their support our tax-payers pay. What they cost is charged up to national profit and loss.

This cause the voters maintain. The revenue system of the nation perpetuates it. The folly of the citizen permits it.

Congress betrays no spasmodic alarm over it. The great metropolises do not seek to stamp it out. Neighborhoods near by in other States do not quarantine against it.

The alcohol habit and the alcohol traffic have the encouragement of Government, and when good citizenship would end them both a shout goes up from the liquor seller behind the bar and the politician in front of it that "You can't prohibit!"

Infantile paralysis is a strong argument. If the children should be protected from a scourge which attacks them through some germ not yet determined or known, why should they not be protected from the poison of alcohol, which cripples them from birth?

They should be. It is the duty of every man who may now be or may hope to be a parent to say that such protection shall follow from the child's birth—yea, even shall be assured before the child is born.—The National Advocate.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE GOLDEN CLEW, OR WHY WE CHILDREN ARE FRIENDS. (Chapter VI.)—Kenneth was sitting on the grass by a pond in the garden, watching the water from a tiny fountain trickle off the leaves of the ferns beneath it. He had been silent for some time and his mother wondered what was passing in his mind, till he looked up and asked: "Mother, have I ever been baptized?"

His mother thought a moment and said, "I can hardly tell, my darling."

"Why, mother," said Kenneth, "don't thou know whether I have or not?"

"I can tell, of course," said mother, "whether thy little body has been baptized; but I cannot look into thy heart and see whether that has had the beautiful baptism that our Lord has promised to all who love Him. What made thee ask the question?"

"Nurse's little niece was christened to-day and I thought how nice it would be if it could have been done here, in this pretty pond, instead of in a dark church. Nurse said that would not do at all. Then I said I should like to be christened here; and nurse said she expected I was christened when I was a baby, but she did not know."

"Nurse's sister," said mother, "likes to have her baby christened, as a sign that it belongs to the church. But the water cannot touch its little heart; and thousands of people who have been baptized never belong to any church really, for their lives show they do not care for religion at all. I long for thee, my boy, that thou may really belong to the Lord's Church, and really have the precious gift of His Baptism."

Kenneth did not answer. He had rolled up his sleeve a little way and was dipping his hand in and out of the bright, cold water.

"What is the Lord's Church?" he asked.

"It is everybody," said mother, "all over the world, who believes on the Lord Jesus as His Saviour, and wants to obey Him—all the people who have ever lived, or who ever will live, who belong to Him."

"All the black people, do they belong?" said Kenneth.

"Why, of course," said mother, "Chinese and Africans and Hindus and everybody who believes on the Lord Jesus. Is it not a beautiful thought that the Lord has a grand, strong army all over the world fighting for Him. Don't we want to belong to it?"

"Yes. Is nurse's little niece going to belong to-day?"

"What does thou think, dear? Is water on thy hand doing any good to thy heart inside?"

"Why of course, mother, it cannot get to my heart."

"No, neither can the water poured on her forehead really help the little girl to belong to the Lord. But most religious people have, in all times, thought it right to show others they belonged to a religion and wished their children to belong to it, too, by being baptized and having their children baptized. It is certainly not for us to judge them about this, and I have no doubt it is a great help to many; but the sad part of it has been, it has often ended there; and some people have thought if they had the water baptism it did not matter how little goodness they had in their lives. When the Lord came, He brought into the world a new Baptism that would really change their hearts. But before He can give us this, we must belong to Him. How can we belong to Him?"

Kenneth said nothing, and his mother went on: "The Lord asks us to belong to Him. He wants us to be His. But we are not obliged to. What must we do?"

"Choose," said Kenneth.

"Choose to belong and then choose to obey," said mother.

"The Church is an army, and the Lord is the Head of it. Everything He bids we have to do at once. Is it easy, dear? Is it easy to be good?"

Kenneth shook his head. "It is much more easy to be naughty," he said.

"But that is not as it ought to be; because the Lord said: 'My yoke,' that means, the life I want you to lead with Me, 'is easy.' It ought to be easy."

"Then why isn't it?" asked Kenneth.

"When Aunt Agnes went to the Centennial Exhibition, she saw in the Great Hall ever so many machines, doing ever so many different things. Some made carpets and some made envelopes; some were great and some were little. But they were all worked by a great engine in the middle of the room. Here and there, however, was a machine quite still, doing nothing."

"It was not connected, I expect," said Kenneth, who was very fond of engines.

"No, it was not connected," said mother. "Well, suppose the machine could talk, and some one would say, 'Why don't you work?' What would the machine say? 'I can't work, it's very difficult to work; it's much easier to be quiet.' But what would one of the machines say that was connected with the great engine?"

"I cannot help working," said Kenneth.

"Now, said mother, "suppose for a moment we think of ourselves as the machines and the Lord Jesus Christ as the great engine of strength in the middle. Does thou not see that, the moment we join ourselves to Him, He gives us just the power we want to keep our lives going? What wonderful things those machines do, the moment the strap is passed around the wheel and they are connected with the engine; and what wonderful things men do and little boys, too, when they really belong to the Lord, and He lets His power come and live in them. They don't do the work. He does it all, really. There is a verse that just expresses it in the Bible: 'And the life which I now live. . . I live by the faith of the Son of God.'

"Now that holy life, which comes to us when we are joined to Christ is really that Holy Spirit we have just been speaking of, which He has promised to every one who belongs to Him. The Holy Spirit is the living Power of God. He wants to come into the hearts of all those who have given themselves to the Lord Jesus, to fill their hearts and teach them and guide them and make them strong, and loving and happy. So that when we have this new Life it is just the sign, the proof, that we do belong to the Lord. And now how is it I want thee to have this true help in thy life? If the beautiful strong, loving Presence of the Holy Spirit is in thy heart, it will be a much more real sign than any outward washing can be, that thou belongs to the Church of Jesus Christ."

Kenneth was silent for some minutes, looking steadily at the lovely water flashing among the green leaves. This seemed to carry his mind back to the beginning of the conversation and he asked at last:

"But why, mother, is that Life called a Baptism?"

"Because the Lord wanted us to think of this Power as something that was to change our lives, and to make them new and fresh and pure; and up to that time, if people wanted to change their religion, they often dipped themselves in water, as a sign that they had changed it. Now, when Christ gives His new life, it changes them all through and the Spirit that He gives is the sign that they have joined His religion and begun a new life, just as dipping in water was a sign that they had joined a new religion in old time. And, indeed, when this grand, holy Power first came to the world, it came quite suddenly on a number of good people and quite changed their lives."—G. CROSFIELD.

"I HAVE never found any who prayed so well as those who had never been taught how. They who have no master in man, have one in the Holy Spirit."

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND.

The undersigned, appointed by the Yearly Meeting in 1914 to cooperate with the Committee on Education in perfecting a plan for Teachers' Retiring Allowances, then presented in preliminary outline, and in its general scope and purpose fully approved by the Yearly Meeting, now take this means of informing the membership of the Meeting that the plan has been matured to the point where it can in our judgment be put in operation with excellent prospects of success and of large usefulness to our educational system.

The sub-committee of the Committee on Education, charged with developing the plan, has, during the past three years, devoted a very large amount of conscientious labor to this intricate subject. They have considered in minute detail the varied requirements of all of our schools. They have been advised by competent insurance experts and they have carefully studied similar plans which have been in operation in other school and college systems and have informed themselves in regard to their points of success and failure.

A gratifying endorsement of the thorough way in which this work has been done is furnished by a recent bulletin of the Carnegie Foundation, which reviews its own experience, and frankly points out some of the shortcomings of its original scheme. It indicates the probability of changes which will make its future plan closely parallel in some important particulars the one worked out by our committee.

Our proposed methods of operation have been submitted in outline to the Actuary of the Carnegie Foundation and have had his approval.

Friends who have been in touch with the subject for some years will remember that the possibility of retiring allowance plans for some of our larger schools, such as Westtown and Germantown, had been considered, and apparently with fair chances of success, but nothing was done on account of the manifest unfairness of providing for the teachers of these schools without doing anything for those who teach in our smaller struggling Yearly Meeting schools. It will always be to the credit of the Principals of the larger schools that they saw the need of making the movement broad enough to cover all our schools.

In addition to elaborating an excellent plan for retiring allowances, the Committee on Education has made arrangements for its administration, which seem to us adequate, and has provided possibilities for such future changes as experience may dictate. The funds for putting it in operation are now all that is required in order to add this very substantial improvement to our educational system. It is calculated that $125,000 will be needed. Some generous gifts have been promised. A committee is about to ask for contributions and we commend the subject to the liberal consideration of Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The Forty-second Convention of the Pennsylvania Woman's Christian Temperance Union opened in Wilkes-Barre on the 6th. President George, in her address, said: "Thirty years ago, when the convention was here, the membership was 1249; now it is more than 43,000." In the course of her address she also said: "Already the European conflict has cost more than $35,000,000,000 and millions of lives have been destroyed, yet the belligerent nations are making preparations to continue the conflict on a vaster scale than ever. Preparation for war invites war. The zealous of preparedness are urging military training in our public schools. This is all wrong and we should oppose it with all the strength we have."

Five fieldmen of the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture have started a survey to find the districts in which white pine blister rust is prevalent and to take steps to check it.

So fine an example of civic virtue as the following should not go unnoticed. It is in a despatch from Lansdale, Pa. Former County Controller John N. Jacobs, broken in health at the age of seventy-seven years, made the following announcement to-day: "I am through with public life. I have given my best years to civic duties and now I am through. If I live, I will be known hereafter simply as 'Jacobs.'" He was the first Controller of Montgomery County and refused to take pay, at the rate of $4000 a year, for his four years of service.

Samuel Mufson, class of 1916 Passaic High School, has won the Harvard prize scholarship of $250, for having passed with the highest credit of those entering from New Jersey, the Harvard entrance examinations.

GENERAL.—The Federal Farm Loan Board, which has just visited 28 States in New England and the West, finds that interest rates on farm mortgage loans vary from 5 per cent. to 60 per cent., that exorbitant commissions for obtaining loans are frequently charged and that in every one of the States there are small farmers, industrious and able to offer unquestionable security, who are unable to obtain loans at all.

If all the blind people in the world were brought together they could form a city as large as Chicago, or, possibly, Paris. No one knows just how many blind people there are, for in many of the countries worse afflicted, China, Arabia, Turkey in Asia and North Africa, they do not care enough about the blind even to count them. Our Census Bureau, on the basis of ascertained figures covering about half the world's population, estimates the total number as more than 2,400,000.

South Carolina taught 1,000 adults to read and write in night school in 1915-1916, the State appropriating $5,000 therefor.

Statistics collected by the Bureau of Crops of the Agriculture Department show that the 1915 record for wheat yield in the United States exceeds that of fifty-two bushels an acre reported from Edmonton, Alberta. One hundred and seventeen bushels an acre on a field of eighteen acres was reported from Ireland County, Washington, and there are many instances of where the yield exceeded fifty-two bushels on farms of 500 to 600 acres.

It is said that a discovery now on trial in France makes it possible in broad daylight to obtain detailed pictures of any organ of the body—brain, liver, kidneys or spleen—and see at a glance by what gross lesions they are affected. Thus it is possible to see the blood-vessels of the brain, observe a blood clot in that organ or detect abscesses in the liver. In one case a secretion in the appendix was seen clearly when the picture was complete.

Theodore Steinmann, a fourteen-year-old boy, of San Diego, Cal., has been admitted to the University of California. He is the youngest pupil ever to gain admittance to the institution. He will study medicine.

THE PATIENCE OF FAITH.—Faith is able to wait with patience. Being itself a "substance" and an "evidence," to use Paul's great words, it does not need to fret or chafe under delay. John Wesley said to himself that he was "always in haste, but never in a hurry." This is because he was a man of prodigious faith. He believed in God. He believed in man. He believed in himself. It is the man who really does not believe in himself or others or God—he, who can never "possess his soul in patience." He has such small faith in nature's constancy; he must, forsooth, watch the pot boil. He doubts the validity of kindness; hence he continually cross-examines it. He is never quite willing to let God "keep" that which He has "committed unto Him." His counterpart is the man who "believes," and who, "believing," does not need to "make haste." Of course, there is no time to lose; but there is still less time to worry.—GEORGE CLARKE PECK.

REST.

"There remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God." The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews in the fourth chapter explains in what this rest consists and how it can be attained, and then he exhorts his brethren to labor that they may enter into it.

Turning to the Old Testament we find a parallel passage in the 23rd Psalm:

"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters."

No one, I think, questions the authorship of these words. They have survived all the happenings of the more than 3,000 years since they were penned, and contain the same solace and refreshment for the weary pilgrim to-day that they did when the shepherd king wrote them down.

They portray his soul's experience, and they will portray ours if we live to merit them. They reflect the country that produced them. Had the thought found expression in a region either to the north or to the south of Palestine, the figure would have been different. There are other lands than Palestine, and many of them, where the shepherd life prevails, but there is something distinctly local in this picture, so much so as to make it belong to no other region on the globe.

References to the shepherd and to his manner of life occur many times in both the Old and the New Testaments and when great lessons were to be taught it was a natural figure to choose, it appealed to the people in the hill country and to those in the cities and the towns also, for the shepherd was a well-known figure all over Palestine. King David used it and so did our Lord with much the same freedom.

Spiritual rest, the rest of the soul, was made more impressive, if not more clear to the dwellers in Judea and Galilee than possibly it can be to us, by the figurative language which was employed. As the flock was brought together at nightfall, if there was any disturbance from without, however slight, it would alarm the sheep, and not even sheer exhaustion under such circumstances would put them to sleep. They would know no rest until the disturbing cause was removed or they were satisfied that no harm would come from it. The first essential that rest should prevail within the sheepfold was that the sheep should themselves feel that they were safe from harm. This granted them, it would be difficult to find a truer picture of contentment than a flock of sheep asleep.

The human soul is like a flock of sheep in this regard. Men may assume a show of indifference, and may claim that they have no regard for their soul's destiny, but in the secret chamber of their thoughts what man is there who does not entertain at times serious reflections concerning his soul's welfare, and to such full peace of mind is dependent on safety.

"The green pastures" "beside the still waters" typified to the Jew the place of safety. Here he could know perfect rest, because he was under the protecting power of Jehovah. To some it meant an outward habitation, hallowed by certain rites and made sacred to holy purposes; to others it signified a mental state, not perplexed with vexing questions, but casting all difficulties upon Him who had promised to bear them, thus in childlike faith trusting to His leadership.

To the Christian a broader vision and a brighter hope are presented than ever King David could have had. Our Lord's first and chief purpose in coming to earth, He often told His followers, was to bring safety to the lost. With this safety came the rest that the soul craves. He came that we might have life and that we might have it in fulness. "My sheep," He declared, "shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of My Hand."

It is the knowing that we are of His sheepfold that brings the feeling of peace. It is not head knowledge. It eludes the fine analysis of our logic, but it is a reality to us quite as much as though we had gained it by the process of reasoning.

This must have been the "rest" which the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews had in mind when he wrote, "There remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God."

All our simplest daily transactions with one another are based upon the confidence we repose in them; as this confidence dwindles and our relations become strained our life is harder to live and we grow farther and farther away from the condition of rest which we naturally crave; the same is true in even greater degree when we pass to the higher relations of life and consider those things that affect the spiritual well-being.

There can be no perfect love without perfect faith. Even in our temporal relations the ties of kinship and of friendship may be ever so tender, yet we know that they cannot be perfect and full if there is lacking on the part of one toward the other the element of trust; so in regard to our highest interests, those that concern our soul's welfare and know no limits of time or of space, we do well often to revert to the words in this same Epistle, that they be not applicable to us, "For indeed we have had good tidings preached unto us, even as also they; but the word of hearing did not profit them, because it was not united by faith with them that heard."

FRIENDS IN PUBLIC LIFE.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS FROM AMERICAN HISTORY.

So I think that the principles which have been the keynote of Quaker morality and those which define the average morality of the politician even of the better sort are widely apart. The one is idealistic, the other utilitarian. The one has never been able to convert the other to the theory that idealism in the long run is of the highest utility, and the other has had no faith in any principle whose utility he cannot grasp as likely to ripen in the very near future.

To this extent we can sympathize with the abstention of Friends from politics. If a state is dominated by an unholy machine which allows no one in office except obedient henchmen, who must be without scruple or independent character, then "the post of honor is the private station." There may be a place for them in the ranks of the militant reformers, but hardly in official life. It is not to the discredit of moral people that they are not governors or senators or judges in certain parts of our Union, where such offices are filled by men whose qualifications are meagre and methods dishonorable.

Colonial Pennsylvania and Rhode Island are the only communities in which for any considerable length of time Friends had enough responsibility to make the government somewhat a reflection of their principles. In Rhode Island it was rather the influence of a few public-spirited and willing men, than the exertion of control by the whole body which gave them their prominence. We shall therefore turn to Pennsylvania for our illustrations.

Here Friends from 1682 to 1756 had practically unopposed control of the legislature. While for the most of these years they were a minority of the population, they were elected as a result of a combination of popular respect for their character and principles on the one hand, and shrewd political management on the other. Indeed, it may be said that up to the outbreak of the Revolutionary War in 1775 they controlled, except in the matter of martial preparation, the political destinies of the Province. For while after 1756 they did not hold office to any large extent, "the Quaker Party" was always an influence to be reckoned with.

During the first fifty years after the settlement, while the Executive was not always a Friend, he was under the practical control either of the Penn family or the Quaker legislature. Hence we have here conditions which give us the best opportunity to determine how a Friendly government would succeed in adjusting the oftentimes conflicting claims of conviction and expediency.

In the matters of oaths there was no wavering. From the teaching of the fathers and from their own conscience they came with apparent unanimity to the conclusion that the taking or administration of an oath was wrong, and concerning this there could be no compromise. Whether it was the Biblical command or a sense of the nobility of simple truth that determined their position, they definitely and always refused to yield it to any consideration of political necessity. For about two years the Colony went almost without organized government because the English Crown would not permit official action without oaths and in many places all fit for official positions were Friends. The meetings rigorously "dealt with" any for the least violation, and many members objected to a form of affirmation which included the expression "in the presence of Almighty God" because it looked like an oath, and finally caused it to be abandoned.

But they could not prevent non-Friends from demanding and administering oaths, and so certain judicial and magisterial positions, the duties of which might require their administration, were closed to Friends by their own self-abnegation or the action of their meetings for discipline. Even complicity to the extent of accepting a clerkship under an official who administered oaths was prohibited. A Friend might, however, serve on a board of judges as a minority member if his position did not make him responsible for the acts of the board. Practically the agreement adopted in 1718 is still in operation over the country with a strong tendency towards the complete substitution of affirmations for oaths. Indeed, the form of so-called "oaths" in many places now amounts to an affirmation.

When we turn from this consistent uncompromising idealistic position on the subject of oaths to other matters the record is not so clear. The taking of human life was not apparently a matter on which Friends felt that such a plain stand could be made. This was apparently in the realm of expediency to be decided by political considerations. William Penn himself reduced capital punishment to make it apply to treason and first degree murder only, not an inconsiderable step in advance. But it is an interesting fact that in the year of his death, 1718, the bill granting relief to Friends in the matter of oaths, also contained a provision to adopt the English penal code, which included capital punishment for some dozen of crimes. This measure was a political bargain. The Friends gave up any convictions they may have had against capital punishment in order to obtain their liberty as to oaths. The bill containing both provisions was suggested by the non-Quaker Deputy Governor, Sir William Keith, a shrewd politician, was drawn up by a Quaker lawyer, David Lloyd, equally shrewd, adopted by a legislature almost if not unanimously composed of Friends, and received with acclamation by the Quaker population, which proceeded to raise through their meetings a sum of money to defray the expense of having it ratified in England. The only explanation possible is that the life of a criminal was less sacred in their eyes than the protest against swearing.

But the sternest conflict between the claims of conviction and utility was on the question of war. While nearly all Friends of the first half century would subscribe to the statement that war was unchristian and wrong under all circumstances it was hard to draw the lines. Under the leadership of David Lloyd an appropriation for war was voted to the Queen and put into the hands of trustees till they could assure themselves that "it would not be dipt in blood." Under the influence of Penn's best friends another similar appropriation was voted unconditionally, how it should be spent being, as Isaac Norris expressed it, "not our business but hers." Frequently after 1740 the Quaker legislature would appropriate money "for the King's use," knowing well the use to which it would be put. Their favorite preamble to such a resolution was "As the world is now situated we do not condemn the use of arms by others but are principled against it ourselves." This was possibly a defensible position for it meant that things were right or wrong for individuals according as their consciences approved or disapproved. On the other hand, if there were any such thing as a standard of rectitude they must have recognized that it was bad not only for the individual but for the state to violate it, and that all violations brought their inevitable penalties.

The opponents of Friends' views urged that there was no essential difference between resisting outside enemies and resisting criminals within. "You hang," said they, "a burglar who breaks into your house, yet you will not take any steps to resist, an organized mass of men who plunder your houses wholesale, and destroy your families." To this Friends replied, in the great peace controversy carried on between Governor Thomas and John Kinsey, the speaker of the Assembly, about 1740, that the burglar was consciously doing wrong, violating all laws human and Divine, and deserved what he got, while the soldier was innocent of intentional wrong doing or was even acting up to the highest conception of duty. Hence there was a difference in motive which justified different judgments as to culpability. With their views as to capital punishment this was probably as good an answer as they could have made, but was hardly basing their actions on an eternal principle.

If given to exact definitions they might have taken something like this position: "We are not absolute non-resistants but we stop resistance where it becomes in itself criminal according to the moral law as our consciences see it. We do not define the exact line where criminality begins, but war and its practices are for us manifestly over the line and therefore we cannot accept any responsibility for it."

William Penn himself was a combination of an idealist and a practical man of affairs. In early life the former prevailed in his writings, but when the details of a most complicated and most insistent problem came upon him in the management of his Colony and in his own unfortunate financial conditions, he went very close to the line. It was with a most abounding enthusiasm that he entered upon his task of government. Religious liberty, democracy, peace, plain speaking and honest dealing, justice to natives, these were the principles that he announced with evident sincerity and an apparently inextinguishable optimism. They were to be applied to Quaker and non-Quaker, to white man and red, to individual and nation. There is nothing in history much sadder than the way in which this optimism was worn away by petty opposition, by well-meant but unfortunate financial management, by an apparent necessity for political compromises, by the breakdown of some of his cherished hopes. The cheering fact remains that during the last two years of his normal life his difficulties, personal and political, largely disappeared, his Colony returned to him in love and respect, and peace and prosperity began to cover his long and discouraging struggle. His idealistic plans had not all for a realized, but neither had they all failed, and his hopes for a full fruition were strong.

SOME PEACE BOOKS.

Perhaps no phenomenon of the present great war is more fraught with teaching than the fact that the contagion of the war spirit has become world-wide in its effect. For a little while our own country seemed to be in a degree immune from the poison, but finally it was swept along with the current until upon more than one occasion it has seemed that war would be very easy even for us. Some of those who have been victims of the contagion have not failed since to point out somewhat derisively that the so-called "peace sentiment" had been greatly over-capitalized, and that in fact it had proved itself "a negligible quantity," before the "on-rush of real patriotism." So hasty and so shallow at times are the judgments of public opinion! After months of military propaganda, great bills in Congress and loud declarations even for "universal military service," some who have an ear to the ground, at least for political purposes, perceive that there has been all the time a great undercurrent against war and even against the preparations for war. So some of the military bills have peace alternatives in them, and so such expressions as "Nothing permanent is ever accomplished by force" is pitted against plans for universal military training in a political campaign.

All the time the phenomenon mentioned above has been at work, another significant phenomenon, little observed, has made an impression that we believe is altogether noteworthy. A veritable flood of peace books has been rolling off of the press in response to a definite demand that has made their publication reasonable ventures for publishers. This body of literature is wholly apart in significance from the multitudinous tracts and protests and pleas of Peace Societies. The war in Europe has evidently quickened as well as deepened the world pulsation against war. The liberal purchase of books on the subject is a sure indication of this.

Friends should keep themselves in touch with these books, even though the number of them is very considerable. The traditional position of our Society in regard to peace has by no means exhausted the subject. The truth is that few of us have exhausted our own position. These books expand it, and illuminate it, perhaps altogether beyond our expectation. Our notice of some of them will perforce be short. The most we can expect to do is to introduce individual books to our readers.—[Ets.]

I.

"The Last Weapon," by Theodora Wilson Wilson, is a shilling book, in paper from C. W. Daniel, Ltd., London. The copy in our hands is of the third edition. The first edition was published in Second Month. The third was called for by the Fifth Month. We are not informed whether this popularity has been maintained. The subject is treated in a vision and in form and substance one is at once reminded of "Pilgrim's Progress." Each chapter is based on Scripture quotations and the exalted style of such writing is maintained. The Christ Child goes forth from the Courts of Heaven into the Halls of Fear to offer the Last Weapon to the suffering world. The encounter with Sir Joshua Power, the mystery in regard to "hellite," the picture of the effect upon the organized Church of the competition between the last two weapons, and especially the incident of the howling mob in the market place before the five Pilgrims of Peace will be remembered as vividly portrayed. They bring home lessons to the readers that are not likely soon to be forgotten. One hardly knows whether to marvel most at the boldness of the author or of the reading public in England in demanding repeated editions of this little work. By this time the censor may have suppressed it, but the three editions cannot be wholly lost in good effect.

II.

"Forks of the Road," Washington Gladden, The Macmillan Co., New York City, $50. This is the peace essay that won the $1000 prize offered by the "Church Peace Union" for the "best essay on War and Peace." It is a ringing indictment of the folly and wickedness of the "gospel of force." But it is much more than this. It is a piece of keen analysis in which the system of warfare or of war preparation is shown to be at variance with the "organic law of human Society." This organic law is clearly demonstrated to be fundamental in the teaching of Christ. No point in the book is more ably presented than this. A somewhat lengthy quotation may indicate what we mean and will give a clue to the argument of the author:

"We often hear orthodox teachers sneering at the law of love as a mere sentimentality—'gelatinous' is the term by which they are apt to characterize it. It is sentimental in just the same sense that the laws of hydro-statics or electro-dynamics are sentimental; it is derived from a book in the same way that the law of gravitation is derived from a book; it is an induction from the facts of life; and its sanctions no more depend on any positive injunction than do the sanctions of the law of dietetics. If you eat poisonous or indigestible food, the retribution is not deferred until after death and the judgment, nor is there any scheme of substitution by which you may evade the penalty; it follows the transgression instantly and inevitably. Not less swift and certain are the consequences of every violation of the moral law. The reaction of the evil deed upon the mind, the heart, the will of the evildoer is utterly inescapable. Transgressions of the law of love register themselves instantly in the character of the transgressor. They darken his judgment; they inflame his passions, they mar his relations with those from whom he has withholden the good will which is their due. We hate those whom we have injured, so long as the injury is unrepented of and unforgiven. We cannot help it, we are made that way. Not only is every selfish act a manifestation of an unsocial nature, it tends to make the man who does it more unsocial. Selfishness breeds hate, and hate, as Jesus has told us, is incipient murder. Such is the penalty of the law of love in its reaction upon the individual. Upon Society its effects are no less deleterious. Every violation of the law of love sets up irritations, resentments, suspicions, jealousies, which disturb all human relationships, which tend to break out in quarrels and collisions of will, and to make helpful human relationships difficult or impossible. The enmities and fightings which keep human society in turmoil are thus perfectly explicable; there is nothing occult or mysterious about them; if they should cease we should know exactly how to go to work to reproduce them, if we should conclude they are undesirable we know how to get rid of them." [Pages 30, 31, 32.]

This quite clearly puts the whole business of warfare at variance with the organic law of Society, and makes the Christian testimony for Peace something more than a cult or a principle of religious belief. In so doing it by no means indicates that the religious aspect of the case is slighted; rather it is reinforced and made practically impregnable. One is tempted to further quotations. One sentence more must suffice; it is taken by our author from Frederick Nietzsche: "The tree of military glory can only be destroyed at one swoop, with one stroke of lightning. But, as you know, lightning comes from the cloud and from above." The 138 pages of this handy volume might well become a pocket companion of present-day peace advocates.

(To be concluded.)

THE BLESSEDNESS OF LIFE.

Ah, what a long and loitering way
And ever-lovely way, in truth,
We travel on from day to day
Out of the realms of youth.

How eagerly we onward press
The lovely path that lures us still
With ever-changing loveliness
Of grassy vale and hill.

On, on through all the gathering years
Still gleams the loveliness, though seen
Through dusks of loss and mists of tears
That vainly intervene.

Time stints us not of lovely things,
Old Age hath still a treasure-store—
The loveliness of songs and wings—
And voices on before.

And—loveliness beyond all grace
Of lovely words to say and sing—
The loveliness of Hope's fair face
Forever brightening.

THE great secret of making the labor of life easy is to do each duty every day.—MARSDEN.

JOHN W. BIDDLE.

Our friend, John W. Biddle, mention of whose death appeared in these columns a few weeks ago, was a Christian gentleman of the old school.

His fine distinction in appearance and character was not so much an acquisition as an innate quality. Those who had only a speaking acquaintance or knew him but slightly were attracted by his courtly bearing and refinement of manner. Dignified at all times, he became gracious and full of charm in conversation with congenial spirits; while his mere smile and passing word had a winning quality all their own. Not only his Friendly dress but everything about him showed a certain delicacy of touch, a certain precision of arrangement which expressed the man. He loved to have whatever he possessed neat and in its place. As he ordered his possessions so also he ordered his days. Hour by hour his duties and pleasures followed one another by a careful schedule. He was never in a hurry, never late. Such perfection of detail is occasionally possible to those who carry few of the burdens of life, but throughout an active career John W. Biddle was more than usually laden with cares and responsibilities.

Sensitive, like every true gentleman, he was keenly awake to the joys and sorrows of others. Not so much of others in the mass—for he grew up before the days of social service and the problems of our industrial order—but of individuals. Few in need were suffered to pass his door unaided. To family, friends and dependents—to a large number whose wants and needs were brought to his attention, he was truly generous. Not only of money but of time and energy he gave cheerfully to others. Of the Pennsylvania Hospital Board he was, for many years, a keenly interested member, having succeeded his honored father, William Biddle. For years also he served on the Committee in charge of Westtown School, giving his services as treasurer and carrying a heavy load of labor and responsibility. As treasurer of the Yearly Meeting, as a member of the Representative Meeting, and in connection with other "Meeting" appointments, including the Committee responsible for Friends' Select School, he gave devotedly of his best service.

One of the distinguishing qualities of the old-fashioned gentleman was devotion to the people and things of his choice. In a rare degree this was true of John W. Biddle. He loved a few books, a few habits of thought and action, a few people with an almost passionate loyalty. Losing his wife when his children were still young he cherished her memory devotedly to the end. Little things belonging to her were kept with pathetic tenderness and no anniversary of her birth, her death or of their marriage, passed unnoticed during the forty-two years that separated them.

He had his share of life's trials; but the fruit of them was evidenced to those who knew him well in a ripened Christian character. It has been truly said of him that he had a full measure of most sterling Christian traits. In his responsible business connections his absolute integrity was a noble witness for the highest ideals of the followers of Christ. As an Overseer and later an Elder in the church his tender encouragement cheered many a bewildered soul. Not a few pigeon-holes contain cherished letters from him in which these refined, almost delicate perceptions found sympathetic utterance. For almost a decade our friend was largely confined by failing health to his home circle. The elements of refined tenderness in his character ripened there and it was a benediction to be admitted to his company and to have converse upon the high plane on which he lived. In the midst of suffering he was remarkably cheerful and patient. Through trying months of slow decline his quiet acceptance of diminishing strength was a lesson to those about him. An infrequent comment tinged with humor was the only sign that he was acutely conscious of the infirmities of the flesh. "I'm not quite up to par; but I guess I'll have to change my par," he said to one of the family only a short time before his death. Thus in quietness and confidence he awaited an entrance into the life that is eternal.

One of the last of the older generation of "plain Friends" he was also one of the last of an earlier type of Philadelphia gentlemen. Modern education and ways of thinking have their advantages, but men such as this they do not produce. The lesson and the inspiration of his life are the more significant.

A.

 THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

To play through life a perfect part,
 Unnoticed and unknown;
 To seek no rest in any heart
 Save only God's alone;
 In little things to own no will,
 To have no share in great,
 To find the labor ready still,
 And for the crown to wait;

Upon the brow to bear no trace
 Of more than common care;
 To write no secret in the face
 For men to read it there;
 The daily cross to clasp and bless
 With such familiar zeal
 As hides from all that not the less
 Its daily weight you feel;

In toils that praise will never pay
 To see your life go past;
 To meet in every coming day
 Twin sister of the last;
 To hear of high, heroic things,
 And yield them reverence due,
 But feel life's daily offerings
 Are far more fit for you;

To woo no secret, soft disguise,
 To which self-love is prone;
 Unnoticed by all other eyes,
 Unworthy in your own;
 To yield with such a happy art
 That no one thinks you care,
 Yet say to your poor bleeding heart,
 How little you can bear;—

Oh! 'tis a pathway rough to choose,
 A struggle hard to share,
 For human pride would still refuse
 The nameless trials there;
 But since we know the gate is low
 That leads to heavenly bliss,
 What higher grace could God bestow
 Than such a life as this.

 FOR "THE FRIEND."

The following extract from a letter written by a young woman (now deceased), not a member of the Society of Friends, dated "December 25, 1864," is an evidence there was no desire for a "Greater Navy" at that time:

"I was to visit the Navy Yard last week while I was in the city, and to describe my feelings of mingled pride and contempt for and in man would be impossible. I felt proud that mind could devise and hands complete those monsters of the deep, and while standing in one of them I felt how fearful it was to use the noble powers which are so God-like for the destruction of our fellows and man seemed contemptible then, for he has worked with energy and will to make tools of his brothers that he may sway them as he does the machinery of those vessels. Those vessels were to me emblems of our Republic, for while the planks seemed to form the vessel's strength, the little bars of iron were the real bands that braced and held it together. So we, the masses, are called the nation, but it is the few strong intellects that govern, sway, and hold us together—to be one of the great ones to-day would be worth living for."

NINTH MONTH 9, 1916.

THE GENTLEMAN AND THE GENTLESTATE.

CHARLES FRANKLIN THWING.

The strength of the peace sentiment in America is revealed by the current discussions. The strength is greater than at times one would believe. The seeds sown in the last seventy-five years are bearing fruit. This fruit we wish were more abundant and hardier. On the whole, however, the advocates of peace should have reason to take heart.

The chief result, it is to be hoped, which will eventuate from the present world-struggle is the dominance of the desire for peace as a permanent human condition. Militarism as a force should be cast out. This result may be slow in coming, but it is sure to come. The tides and the stars fight with us in this endeavor. Education is the great force in the process of securing this result.

From the savage to the barbarian, from the barbarian to the semi-civilized man, from such a man to the gentleman, has been the progress of civilization. A similar progress should be made in Commonwealths. The word gentleman has come to be one of the greatest of all words. The word gentlestate should also come to represent one of the noblest of all human conditions. In respect to the gentlestate I venture to repeat what I have said in the last number of the Hibbert Journal:

The gentlestate should exist for all of its citizens, and all of its citizens should exist for it. Reciprocity of rights and duties should be the rule. The gentlestate may be the center and the source of power, but if it possesses the giant strength, it is too great to use it like a giant. It seeks to do justice, to love mercy, and it walks humbly. If it has enemies, it treats them as if they were to become its friends. It has too much good sense to be responsive to insults and too much generosity to bear malice. It is too eager about great things to be annoyed by small irritations, and too much concerned about the good of all to be keen about any lack of respect to itself. It seeks to see the large as large, the small as small, the ephemeral as of the day, and the lasting as permanent, being ever guided by a sense of proportion. It respects the rights of other States with that same honesty and integrity which it merits from others. It makes few or no demands. It has no occasion for self-defense. It is tolerant of others' weaknesses, patient toward their limitations, never finding in either weakness or limitation any excuse for its own aggrandizement. It seeks to enrich as well as to be enriched, to enlarge as well as to be enlarged, and it vastly prefers to be the victim than the agent of any misinterpretation or wrong-doing. Its protective policy is to shield the weak, and its free-trade theory is to give every other State more than it demands. This gentlestate is considerate in thought and feeling, without either hardness or mysticism, cordial without effusiveness, forceful and direct without harshness, firm in conviction without obstinacy, of the highest idealism, ever exercising a good will without giving any impression of weakness. This gentlestate has no armies and no battleships for attacking on either land or sea. Its chief fortresses are the cardinal virtues and the cardinal graces of faith and hope for humanity's future and love for humanity itself.

 MORAL DAMAGE OF THE WAR TO ENGLAND.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

We were one day sitting in a crowded Oxford Street motor-bus, when there entered a strapping young soldier in Highland costume, with kilts and bare knees, accompanied by a slender young woman. The girl quickly found space, while the young man stood. Suddenly a rather delicate-looking elderly gentleman arose and offered the soldier his seat; the latter blushing declined, but the elder man insisted, exclaiming, "I consider it an honor." Thereupon, with a decidedly foolish expression, the big soldier boy took his elder's place, while the latter stood. Some would think that a beautiful expression of appreciation of the soldier, but it certainly indicated, as do so many things in England to-day, that the military man has got on top. I confess that whilst he is new in his position of supremacy, the military assertiveness which so generally develops with wearing a uniform is in many respects not much different from that of Germany. Thoughtful men are asking what will be the ultimate position of the military man after England has been so long under his influence and sway. Some declare that England is destined either to militarism or revolution after the war, and many seem to think that of the two evils revolution will be the least dangerous. I know of an English army officer who in conversation expressed his hope that democracy will be crushed out as a result of the strife; in his opinion, that will be the one great good growing out of it. Was he right, and what will be crushed and cowed democracy have to say on the subject?

The drink evil has occasioned painful anxiety in spite of Governmental efforts to control the traffic. There was an increased consumption of intoxicants amounting to over seventeen million pounds during the year 1915. Part of this increase was caused by the large taxation on beer, but most of it by the increased consumption of spirits, particularly among the poor. With millions of men fighting abroad, the home consumption of beer and spirits has enormously increased among women. Restrictions as to hours of sale and in other respects have to some extent neutralized the above conditions, but, without doubt, many poor, distressed creatures are to an unprecedented degree indulging in the use of intoxicants.

The situation of the young women munition workers in the great industrial centres is creating cause for profound sorrow among those who are engaged in social betterment. Many of these humble workers have left the morally sheltered occupations that formerly engaged them and have entered into a new life amid temptations that are inevitably connected with untried associations. They are employed with thousands of other women in a business based on the destruction of human life. Such a business, so founded, reverses the normal instinct of the sex. These psychological and moral temptations are accompanied by that of earning more money than they have ever before received. I am told by cautious women, who are conversant with the facts, that the above conditions "most terribly lower the moral standard of these workers and that the moral downfall of large numbers of young girls has followed."

I know of one great munition factory being opened with a wild orgy of free drinks to celebrate the occasion.

A spirit of fear is developed by the beastly conflict in which England is engaged. The English and Irish are brave peoples, but scares and terrors from the earth beneath and the sky above are a sure penalty associated with modern warfare. The next generation will not only suffer in depleted nervous force, but in spiritual steadfastness, because of the sufferings of the women of to-day.

Sometimes the effects of fright are ludicrous. I know of a case on the Southern coast of Ireland where a policeman—one of that splendid body who are the great reliance of England in that country—found washed ashore what he thought was a bomb or some equally dangerous weapon. With probable visions of promotion for well-earned fidelity and courage, he reported to his principal. The suspicious article was pronounced to be "a large hairy cocoon."

Aside from such an incident, the fact stands that the moral tone of a people is not developed by the excitement and strain of war. Only Christian ethics and obedience to New Testament teaching can do this. A writer in "The Challenge," the well-known church paper of England, remonstrates against the universal prayer for victory that is being offered in the churches at the present time. He says, "When I think of asking God for victory, I think of it as asking Him that through the medium of huge shells fired from guns of enormous calibre, poisoned gas and bayonet attacks by men rendered insensible to war's horrors by rum, the number of dead and mutilated fathers, brothers, husbands and lovers among the German ranks may be greater than ours; that sorrowing and bitter mothers, sisters and sweethearts may be more numerous than here." This writer speaks the truth. Unquestionably, a nation almost wholly committed to such a line of thought becomes impaired in its morals, ethics and spiritual conceptions.

A disregard of the sanctity of human life is very apparent in England to-day. You cannot help being affected by this spirit. The continual newspaper references to losses on either side and to the methods as to how these losses have been brought about lower the national conscience and the more generous emotions. There is detestation of the Germans for discharging deadly gas on the battlefield, but there is joy when gas has been successfully used against the Germans. There is hatred of their enemies for bombarding England from Zeppelins, but there are Victoria Crosses for the lads who destroy life and property in German cities. Comments on statements in the newspapers that the Russians have at times taken no prisoners to the rear after capturing them are accepted as being after all not a very bad proposition. Such is the morally numbing effect of war on a people who profess the name of the unresisting Christ. May I illustrate further: When the Zeppelin was brought down in the raid on London, a few days before we left that city, there was great rejoicing. As the watchers saw the blazing vessel tumble to the earth the streets in some places echoed with cheers and with the National anthem. The lad, twenty-one years of age, who sent the huge air ship to destruction immediately received the Victoria Cross. It is true that a military funeral was accorded the sixteen killed Germans, and that the flying corps to which the young man belonged saluted the cortege as it passed. All of these things make fuel for the newspaper reading public, but we are not told whether the lad who killed those Germans participated in the salute accorded by his comrades in arms.

Such activities as the following are publicly lauded in England to-day. We are told that Lieutenant Rankema "led the way into the enemy's trenches and shot several of the enemy, he then rushed a dugout and killed seven and captured fourteen men inside." Of course, this is war, and the Victoria Cross is the suitable reward for killing as many of your foes as you can, but is it possible for men to indulge in such things and afterward be morally the same? Can the community, and even the children, exalt such occasions and not be morally depressed thereby? A young soldier—a friend of a friend of mine—in the agony of witnessing the beastliness of the trenches, of which he was compelled to partake, writes, "We have given in long ago, and now drug our souls with talk of knightly deeds, I feel myself sinking into the darkness . . . I simply cannot think what would happen if I die."

Men can learn in times of war to joke and laugh over the killing of their enemies, just as they might about so many flies. One day the past summer the question as to how much prize money should be awarded Lieutenant Holbrook came up. He was commander of the British submarine that sunk the Turkish battleship Mesudieh in the Dardanelles. The newspapers with much gusto told of how the Lieutenant gave evidence about torpedoing the Mesudieh. There was considerable discussion regarding the number of men drowned, for the size of the bounty was dependent upon the number of Turks destroyed. Had six hundred or seven hundred men been destroyed? Finally, Sir Charles Evans, Judge of the Court, declared, "I do not think this is a case where I ought to encourage any splitting of hairs . . . I declare the number on board to be seven hundred; nobody can say I am wrong, and I hope I am right (laughter). The prize bounty awarded will be £3,500." Any Christian community that becomes calloused to human agony and can thus forget the precepts of the Gospel to the extent of laughing over discussions regarding rewards for killing its enemies, cannot but be terribly damaged in its social and religious life.

Private conversations, declarations of Conferences and Chambers of Commerce and newspaper editorials all prove that inordinate greed is tremendously accentuated as the war progresses. The primary commandment, "Thou shalt not covet" becomes more than ever a dead letter. Even the supertax on war—created incomes—is sometimes very tenderly applied by the Government. Munition workers want the war to last because of the big pay; shareholders in armament concerns have a similar desire. The cry goes up from all over England, grab everything in sight; recoup ourselves for our losses by trade combinations to hurt all the world, if necessary, provided we gain wealth. The sober Christians look aghast at the situation and say, "Where is the Lord Jesus; has He left us?"

Premier Hughes of Australia is reported as saying, "This war has saved us from moral—aye! and physical—decay for we were slipping down with increasing velocity into the very abyss of degeneration." He speaks foolishly; the boys' conscription that cursed Australia for a number of years before the war, and produced deplorable fruits in the young manhood of that country, as well as the record of young men turned back to Australia suffering from diseases contracted amid the vices of the Orient the past few years are sufficient refutation of his bombastic utterances. Moral and physical decay are the fruits of the unholy system that political exigencies induced him to extol. The temporary exaltation that followed the outbreak of the war has been far more than wiped out by the sins and by the lowering of Christian ideals that have followed.

WHAT AN AMERICAN SAW IN ASIA.

BY WILLARD PRICE.

- I saw a million handkerchiefless children.
- I saw hundreds of villages in which the community handkerchief [modern sanitation] was absolutely unknown.
- I saw glittering Oriental cities, the pride of the East, and under the shining lacquer and gold paint I saw suffering and filth and want such as no man can describe.
- I saw rotting bodies, empty minds, naked souls.
- I saw Disease, stalking up alleys, wading ankle-deep through garbage to enter the doors of the people.
- I saw, in one land, the stains of parental vice on the skin of two out of five of the children.
- I saw a mother selling her babies that their older brothers might not die of starvation.
- I saw pallid factory girls of twelve and even ten years of age, who worked thirteen hours a day, seven days a week, standing constantly while at work, and receiving a pittance of a third of a cent per hour. This, moreover, in a mill advertised as the "model factory of the Orient!"
- I saw things which I have not the heart to set down and you would not have the heart to read.
- I saw life in its lowest terms.

AND YET—

- I saw love in its highest terms.
- I saw Christ yearning over Asia.
- I saw the response of Korea to that yearning. A nation turning to Christianity at the rate of three thousand a week!
- I saw the dawning of a new China, not in a political kaleidoscope, but in the spiritual changes which have led to the abolishment of opium, have brought six thousand of China's strongest leaders to accept Christ, and induced idol-makers to turn to the making of busts for show windows because their old business has proved unprofitable.
- I saw a three-hundred-year-old statue of Buddha, and almost in its lap an impertinent three-year-old automatic telephone booth. The ancient religions of the East are being found wanting and cast aside.
- I saw the mission schools from which the Chinese Government has selected the first ten girls to be sent to American colleges under the Boxer Indemnity Fund. They were the best-equipped ten that could be found in China. All were graduates of mission schools; all were Christians.
- I saw hundreds of shops closed on the Sabbath. Neighboring them I saw hundreds of open shops, consuming all the business. Every closed store was owned by a Christian—not a "rice Christian," but a real Christian, whose pocket had no rule over his conscience.

I saw a beaten man board our ship at Wuhu and heard him tell of the crushing overburden of medical work that had killed his predecessor and was killing him.

I saw everywhere undermanned hospitals, undermanned schools, undermanned churches; a missionary force powerful in quality, petty in quantity.

I saw Asia, sore, ragged and dull, with her foot on the threshold of the house of Christ, hoping for an invitation to enter.

I saw, upon returning to America, a rich and happy nation, eager and generous to a fault, but unthinking, storming the movie theatre, swallowing the lump in their throat for pity of the ragged child in the play.—While Asia Waits.

MY MONARCH.

A PARABLE FROM NATURE.

Some of us have had "Parables from Nature" on our bookshelves for years, and enjoyed the wholesome lessons, so beautifully told, of "Daily Bread," "Not Lost but Gone Before," "Purring When You're Pleased," and the others. But our eyes are not always open to the "parables" all about us in the outdoor world.

Since my childhood I have seen the tawny orange "Monarch" butterflies, with their black-edged wings, hovering over the Asclepias (milk-weed plants), but never until this summer did I learn to know the zebra-striped caterpillars or see how they change.

Soon after reading a magazine article which described them one was brought to me, and, placed in a cardboard box, ventilated by holes in the cover, was kept supplied with fresh leaves, and watched day by day.

One morning, on opening the box, no caterpillar was to be seen, but presently we noticed, hanging from the lid by a short thread, a curious smooth, pale green case, something like an acorn in shape, and studded with golden spots, which gleamed in the sun, like the true metal. Having heard that the Monarch's chrysalis is "the most beautiful in Nature," we were sure this must be it.

Each morning as we gathered on the cottage porch to breakfast, the box was opened and the resting-place of our little striped pet was turned about in the sun and air while we admired it.

For ten days or more there was no change. Then one morning a spot was noticed where the thick green skin was clearing and almost transparent. In another day or two a glimpse of the butterfly's wings could be seen as through a tiny clear window. So, bit by bit, the bright new body showed, and the folded antennæ or feather-like horns which spring from each side of the head.

At last, one morning, when the perfect form of the Monarch could be seen, though still closely folded in the case, we gathered about the box to look at it, and then some one forgot to cover it again, and when we looked in the evening the little envelope was empty; the Monarch had flown!

We should have liked to see just how he crept out, and how soon he could stretch his wings and soar away. But now when, on a sunny autumn day, I see a pair of tawny wings joyfully waving about the milkweed, I think "That one may be ours!"

And I remember (as we can all remember) some one we have loved, who was shut out by pain or weakness from an active life, and had to lie as quietly as in a chrysalis, apart from the work or play of others.

And how, as day by day went by, gleams of patience, of cheerful trust, began to show through the suffering and weakness, like the colors of the butterfly's wings, and were, in just the same way, a promise of the new life which was coming, when the chrysalis should be opened.

And at last the day came when we saw only the empty case, looking so empty with the spirit gone. And while we could not watch its joyous flight, as that of the butterfly, we knew that it was far above pain and loss and sadness.

And should it not give us patience with one another when, even through the thick skin of our earthly nature, we can sometimes catch a glimpse of the spirit's wings? F. T. R.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

TALKS WITH CHILDREN.—SCATTERBRAINS.—PROVERBS xvii: 24: "Wisdom is before the face of him that hath understanding; but the eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth."

Scatterbrains's mother is very much worried about him; she doesn't know just what is the matter with her boy, but sometimes she thinks there are leaks in his head. Things she tells him again and again slip out of his mind. She took him to a doctor a few days ago and he felt Scatterbrains's head all over, but could find no holes or cracks in it. Yet there is certainly some thing seriously wrong with his brain; things either never get inside, or, if they do, they trickle out.

Scatterbrains takes the longest time to study his lessons, and then he doesn't know them. You would feel very sorry for him if you saw him. He opens his book on the desk and then sits and sits and sits staring at it. You would think that he must know every word in it by heart; but I don't believe he could tell you what is on a single page of it. We sometimes say of a weak-minded person that he is not "all there." Scatterbrains is not in the least bit crazy, but he is not "all there" when he sits down to study. Some of his thoughts are out in the street where other boys are playing, more of them are floating about in the room. His mother says these thoughts are "wool-gathering." Only a few of his thoughts are left to do his studying, and his teacher tells him that he has not put his mind on his lesson. She is quite right; he only put a tenth of his mind on it.

When his father goes off to business in the morning, he sometimes asks Scatterbrains to attend to something for him at home. "Now, my boy," he says, "keep your wits about you and listen while I explain what I want you to do." But those wits of his cannot stand still and pay attention; one wit runs off to a look at a picture in the corner of the room, another dashes out into the hall where Scatterbrains's little brother is rolling a ball, a third plays with the dog on the floor; and even after his father has gone over at least twice what he wants him to do Scatterbrains gets everything crooked.

Scatterbrains often forgets where he is going, and turns down the wrong block; and when he is riding on the street cars he frequently is carried a long way past the corner where he meant to get off. People call him "absent-minded," but one wonders where the absent part of his mind goes to, and what it does; it never brings back anything from its excursions.

Scatterbrains is a good boy, and he kneels down every morning when he leaves his bed, and again at night before he lies down. I was going to say that he knelt down to pray; but I'm afraid he does not do much praying. Praying, you know, is talking to God; and one has to think of the person to whom one is speaking. But when Scatterbrains is down on his knees his thoughts are flying off in all directions. He may be saying with his lips, "Our Father, which art in heaven," but he is thinking of the game he was playing in the afternoon, or wondering whether he brought his baseball bat into the house. God cannot feel that Scatterbrains cares very much for Him, so very little of Scatterbrains's mind and heart ever go up to meet Him.

Indeed, Scatterbrains does not succeed very well in anything. You see, it takes a complete boy to study a lesson or to play a game of ball or to pray to God; a quarter, or a half or even three-quarters of a boy will not do. The Bible tells us that a wise man puts his entire attention on the one thing that he is doing, and that the man who lets his thoughts go a-roving is a fool. "Wisdom is before the face of him that hath understanding; but the eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth."—HENRY S. COFFIN, in The Outlook.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Constitution of the West China Union University provides that the Annual Meetings of the Board of Governors shall be held in rotation in the United States, Great Britain and Canada. Two years ago London should have been the meeting place, but the uncertainty of conditions arising from the war have necessitated the holding of all the recent meetings in North America. The sessions just closed this year were held in Toronto.

Although no one came out from England, all four of the constituent missionary bodies which organized the University were represented. These are American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, Friends' Foreign Mission Association of Great Britain and Ireland, Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Church of Canada, Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, U. S. A.

The report of the Senate and of the President of the University to the Board of Governors showed that since 1910 when the University was opened, there have been erected on its campus, containing about one hundred acres just outside the walls of the city of Chengtu, twenty-six permanent and thirteen temporary buildings. These include those of the constituent denominational colleges. Two or three buildings are yet under construction. The teaching staff includes fifty-six, outside the voluntary instructors in the night school. The total net attendance of students the past year was two hundred and sixty-seven. Of this number two hundred and fourteen have been in residence in the four mission colleges, and of these one hundred and sixty-nine are Christian whilst only forty-five are non-Christian.

During the year the first class was graduated, two men receiving the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Eight men have also been graduated from the Junior Division. Both of the full term graduates and five of the others are engaged in missionary or educational work, whilst two others are continuing their studies.

The complicated political situation now existing in China has not been without its effect on the University. No less than five different Governments have risen and fallen during the year. This does not appear to have interfered with the work as much as might be expected, notwithstanding the fact that the General Educational Secretary was seized by bandits and held for ransom, though afterwards released unharmed.

With China in its present ferment and the general educational system of the all-important western provinces in the forming, the University has a unique opportunity to so mould Chinese opinion and practice that the best of Christian organization and teaching shall be taken as the standards towards which the local authorities may turn their endeavors. This is the hope and aim of those who are shaping the policy of the University. They are making themselves felt and the cordial relations established and maintained with Chinese officials show that the realization of this hope may be confidently anticipated. It is more substantial than a dream.

Those of us who were privileged to participate in the deliberations of the Board of Governors felt an assurance for the future which was in measure accentuated by the conditions in Toronto. Everywhere were the marks of war—the sidewalks crowded with men in uniform, often accompanied by sad-faced women and clinging children; the streets fenced off as drill grounds; the anxious crowds watching the bulletins giving the names of the killed and wounded as eabled from the seat of war; and over all the calm determination of both men and women to do and to bear whatever might be required of them. However much war and all its horrors are to be condemned, we could not but sympathize with the streaming eyes and the aching hearts.

GEORGE VAUX, JR.

At the recent London Yearly Meeting the following minute was recorded: "A suggestion has been made that a Conference be held of all those who bear the name of Friend, with the object of giving full consideration to the deeply important subject of how to secure a general and lasting peace. In connection with this we have been reminded of the loving expressions of sympathy contained in the American Epistles, and particularly of the offer of co-operation in the Epistle from New York Yearly Meeting, held at Glens Falls, in Fifth Month, 1915.

"The proposal has met with a good deal of support, and we decide to refer it to the Meeting for Sufferings, asking it to consider how far it is desirable and practicable, and giving it power, if thought well, to take steps to carry it out."

Henry T. Hodgkin in a personal letter to Dr. Benjamin F. Battin, dated Eighth Month 10, and which has been widely circulated, says:

1. If the Conference is held, it is all-important that we should gather together the very best minds in the Quaker community. I hope that it will be a very carefully chosen gathering, that every person chosen will be enabled to attend. Colleges, Friends' firms, etc., should liberate their members and funds should be provided where needed, to secure substitutes. This may be the largest service Friends have ever been called on to render and we are lacking in constructive statesmanship. We need to summon all we have. We need, further, to meet in a deep spirit of expectancy and in humble waiting upon God; for without His manifest guidance we cannot make any contribution in the least degree adequate to the situation.

2. We need very thorough preparation, and for this we cannot begin too soon. Small groups of Friends should at once begin to prepare memoranda on certain broad principles that we should agree upon. We ought to think out the particular line along which our special contribution can be made, and what we cannot do as a religious Society. We ought to get clear on such questions as disarmament as a national policy, the international use of force, relation of a Christian nation to the less civilized peoples, especially in the British Empire, etc., etc. There are many questions on which I do not think this generation of Friends have done any really constructive thinking. I want to see very careful preparation in the form of memoranda that would be read and studied by all before the Conference.

[Many of our readers are personally acquainted with Jane C. Balderston and others who are not feel a warm interest in her work in West China. A letter addressed by the infant Friends' Meeting at Chengtu to J. C. B.'s home meeting at West Grove, Pa., and dated last Fifth Month 25th, has come into our hands and we have the consent of her friends to reproduce it in translation.—Eds.]

FRIENDS' MISSION,
Chengtu, Szechwan, West China.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

We all are delighted at the safe arrival of the member of your Monthly Meeting, Jane C. Balderston, who came to Szechwan to teach our girls, and she was heartily welcomed by all the members of our Monthly Meeting.

We had never dreamt before that a member of your Monthly Meeting will come to join us in our work. It shows not only your love for the members of our meeting and the Szechwanese, but it will unite our two meetings together and we can co-operate in work for the Lord. Since we are strengthened by your meeting we should go straightforward with vigor and preach the teaching of Jesus Christ in order to lead people to be saved and so satisfy your expectation.

Jane C. Balderston's coming is just China's need to-day. It is not only very good to our meeting, but more helpful to the women of Szechwan. As heretofore China does not care for the women's education, the Chinese women are ignored; the mothers have no knowledge; the result is no good citizens. Both the nation and society are injured, therefore there is no progress of the nation. Though we have several girls' schools, but made little progress owing to the poor teachers. Now we have J. C. Balderston to teach the girls and train them to be good teachers to teach the younger ones, our expectations for China are thus very great and our hope is Chinese women will be well trained. Beside the gratitude in our hearts we write a few lines to show our thankfulness.

We are yours very sincerely,

LU YAO CHENG,
Clerk.
SHU TSEN-CHANG,
Assistant Clerk.

THE Simplified Spelling Board of New York urges college faculties to take action of two kinds: first, to give their students a chance to choose the better of two authorized spellings; and, second, to set them a good example. For the first it is sufficient to allow the students in their written work to use any forms found in the vocabulary of such dictionaries as the Standard, Webster's or Century such as center, color, rime, and surprise instead of centre, colour, rhyme and surpris. For the second it is recommended that the institution adopt in its official publications and correspondence the twelve words adopted by the National Educational Association, program, catalog, decadal, prolog, tho, altho, therefore, thro, throout. This very moderate program of reform has been adopted by 138 universities, colleges and normal schools comprising about 120,000 students. The movement is also making encouraging progress in the press. There are now in the United States 92 dailies and 58 periodicals with a combined circulation of 12,000,000 which have followed the example of The New York Independent in using simplified spellings.

JAPAN AND THE UNITED STATES.—Japan has a population of 60,000,000 souls. The United States has over 100,000,000.

Japan is about the size of California. Her arable land is a trifle larger than Maryland.

Japan is still an agricultural country. Her manufacturers are a generation behind ours.

The annual value of Japan's farm products is one-twelfth that of the United States, her mineral products one-fortieth, her forestry products one-twentieth and her exports of raw materials and manufactures one-eighth.

The value of Japan's farm lands is one-twentieth that of the United States, and the value of her bank deposits is one-one-hundred-and-forty.

Though the Japanese army is somewhat larger than ours, our navy is a third larger than Japan's.

Before the war broke out Japan was the most heavily taxed nation on earth. As a result of the Russo-Japanese War out of every hundred dollars of wealth produced thirty dollars is said to have gone to the government directly or indirectly in the form of taxes. The general poverty of Japan is very great.

Will it be evident, therefore, to our preparedness-at-any-cost friends that Japan is amply able to embark on a great war of aggression against us with every expectation of success?

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL LIFE IN THE PHILIPPINES.—Cook-fighting and the First-day school go on almost side by side in the Philippines, and at San Leonardo it happened that the owner and his rooster actually went to church during a First-day school and evangelical institute. The man felt condemned, forthwith gave his rooster away, and was found at First-day school the next morning at 8.30.

At one of the First-day meetings at that institute a little girl in a red dress wanted to join. The pastor thought her too young. Her parents were opposed to the Evangelicals, but a few evenings later the red dress was there beside her father and mother, and all three joined together. "A little child" still leads, the world over.

From Horace E. Coleman, representing the World's First-day School Association in Japan as Field Secretary, comes an account of a Buddhist First-day school, which is imitating as nearly as possible the Christian First-day schools of Japan.

"Two weeks ago I visited a Buddhist First-day school in Tsukiji and found it quite interesting. They were teaching the children, sentence by sentence, some of the old Buddhist scriptures, of which I do not think they understood much. They had but two songs and these were very poorly practiced.

"There were about 250 children in a large room, and they were kept there for two hours with only five or ten minutes' intermission. The man who gave the first talk to the children spoke for at least forty-five minutes, giving them an historical talk about the Russo-Japanese war and the bravery of a few of the soldiers of that war. The children were good, but of course did not pay very close attention. This was supposed to be a talk on loyalty, but there was no religion in it. They then asked me to speak, and I told them of the largeness of the First-day school work in America and of the importance of following up through the week what they learned there on First-day. They have this school only twice a month."

In the Moslem First-day school field, strong preparations are being made to meet the challenge of the new day that is surely dawning. At the heart of the Moslem educational world in Cairo, with its university of 10,000 students, a First-day-school missionary, Stephen Trowbridge, and his wife are manufacturing the munitions for the peaceful conquest of Islam by reaching Moslem childhood through the First-day school. Thousands of parable stories in Arabic and of the lives of Livingstone and Hogg, eagerly read by Moslem children, are being distributed through the First-day school, and the attendance is doubling at many points.

Teacher-training books in Arabic and pamphlets for workers are being printed and distributed. The First-day school Committee is planning to issue a Boys' Own Magazine in Arabic to offset the stories of crime and other demoralizing literature for boys which are being sold.

Stephen Trowbridge says: "Last week I visited a school of the very poorest of the Coptic and Moslem people in the Boulac quarter of Cairo. The fifty or more who gathered were among the dirtiest people I have ever seen in my life. It made one's heart yearn to help them. This school has been open only four weeks. There are three classes—for boys, girls and women. I am so glad to be able to express myself somewhat in Arabic, for it brings me so much closer to the people. All the Copts in Egypt use the Arabic language and are thus accessible with the First-day school literature we are using."

TRENCH digging in Thessalonica may be very hard and necessary work, but in addition to being part of the preparedness plan of the Allies, such work is incidentally furthering our archaeological knowledge and furnishing us with most valuable relics of the past. What science and religion have been unable to effect, grim war, with pick and shovel, has been and still is doing. "Archaeologists have long known that Salonica—the ancient Thessalonica, which Cassander founded twenty-two centuries ago and named for his wife, the sister of Alexander the Great—is a rich field for study, but they have lacked money to make the necessary excavations. Now the war is doing the work for them. From the trenches the soldiers dig, the antiquarians have rescued enough objects of art, inscribed tablets and other valuable relics to fill a museum." One account says that the archaeologists "follow after the soldiers like crows after a ploughman." We are deeply interested in archaeology, and particularly that branch of it which bears its testimony to early apostolic history. We are hoping that when the war is over this science may have every facility and support for its extensive prosecution.—Episcopal Recorder.

THIRTY-FIVE years after the founding of Mt. Hermon Schools by Dwight Lyman Moody, Northfield is as crowded and effective as ever. The anniversary of the school has just been celebrated. It was founded with the idea that by the wise use of three periods for work, play and rest, the boys could do practically all the work of the school, thus securing without large means the very best tuition. The school, under Principal Cutler, has scored a marked success and ranks among the best schools in the land. The number of students is now six hundred. Mt. Hermon will always have historic interest, not alone because of the remarkable work done by the founder, but also because here was born the Student Volunteer Movement. The Northfield Conferences were about as well attended this year as formerly, but the student body is only a little more than half the size. This is in part due to the fever of militarism and to the fact that many have gone to help their student brothers in Europe.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Eight-cent milk, after a fifteen-year continuous sales period in this city, has become an impossibility, according to the leading local dealers, in view of the steady increase of every item in the cost of production and distribution. The added cost to the dairy concerns, they say, ranges from twenty to 100 per cent. and includes the raw product, freight, hauling from terminal to dairy, handling and preparation and final distribution. Figures furnished to the Public Ledger by officials of the local dairy companies show that wages have advanced, that bottles, cans, paper caps and feed have increased in price, while horses, hundreds of which are used for the city and suburban distribution, have almost doubled in price in the last few years.

After traveling thousands of miles from the ice fields of the Arctic Circle, a valuable collection of Siberian relics arrived at the University of Pennsylvania Museum. The relics were purchased from Tungus, Samoyel, Yurak, Delgan and Yakut Indians in the land of the midnight sun by H. U. Hall, leader of the Museum's Siberian expedition.

GENERAL.—As a result of the extension of the suffrage to women, Josephine Marshall Fernand, of California, Jeannette Rankin of Missoula, Mont., Frances C. Axtell, of Washington, Dr. Eva Harding, of Topeka, are running for Congress.

A wholesale German raid on foreign shipping south of Nantucket lightship on the 8th was the work of one submarine, according to reports of American naval officers. Six or seven vessels were sent to the bottom, but so far as reported no lives were lost.

Thomas Mott Osborne has left Sing Sing again, this time voluntarily, and there is much reason to regret that the reforms which he instituted are not to have a thorough and extended trial under his direction. The cause of his resignation was the ill-concealed hostility of his superiors to reform, finding expression in orders and regulations which interfered with principles which he considered essential.

As a correction of a previous notice of highest yield of wheat per acre the following is of interest: C. S. Noble, of Noble Ford, Alberta, has a 1000-acre field, the wheat crop of which, threshed, gave a yield of 52 bushels to the acre, the highest ever known in any part of the world, according to estimates made in Edmonton, Alberta, last week. The world's record for wheat was formerly held by Whitman County, Wash., with 51 bushels.

FOREIGN.—The fears of a section of the Japanese public, which have found an echo in the United States and China, that the coming into power of the new ministry may be tantamount to war, were discussed frankly by Premier Count Seiki Terauchi, in giving to the Associated Press the first statement he has made in regard to the foreign policy of his administration. The premier gave expression in a sentence to the spirit which he declared would animate his dealings with other nations. It was the assertion that Japan would not take any aggressive step toward the United States or any other country "so long as Japan's vital interests and dignity are not infringed. Any idea that I shall 'wave the sword,' while I am prime minister of Japan is based on a false comprehension of my career and a complete misconception of the Japanese Empire, its past and its hopes and ideals for the future," he said.

Japanese immigration has been flowing in a growing stream to South America. The Kiyo Maru recently sailed from Yokohama with 931 steerage passengers, most of whom were booked for South America. The steamer also carried forty-five Japanese girls on their way to South America to become the brides of farmers who have settled there. Brazil is the favored country of the Japanese.

Women laborers working among the top rafters of half-constructed buildings are an ordinary sight in many parts of Germany just now. German employers of labor have availed themselves of the temporary suspension of the law forbidding the employment of female labor in the building industries with great readiness.

QUAKERISM AND THE NEW AGE.

The years through which we are passing mark the beginning of a new age. We are facing a new era not simply by reason of the changes wrought by terrific events but by the fresh revelations which we are receiving of the present world order. We can no longer include in our philosophy a comfortable complacency toward what we have been pleased to call Christian civilization. Many voices are now telling us plainly what manner of men we really are. For over two years the guns of almost all Europe have been calling the world to witness the spectacle of Christian principles ruthlessly violated and the moral order overturned. Other voices have spoken to us of the spirit abroad in our own land. The recent danger of war with Mexico; the passage of the largest naval and next to the largest military appropriations ever made by any country in time of peace; the popular catch-words of national self-interest, "Preparedness" and "America First" have proved our kinship with that European family of nations which must now admit Prussia to be its legitimate offspring. From other than international quarters disturbing messages are breaking in. Social, industrial and commercial life give utterance to them. Seven-eighths of the families in our country owning but one-eighth of the national wealth; fully one-half of our male workers earning less than $626 a year; 10,000,000 persons in the United States in poverty during reasonably prosperous years; the existence of an involuntary "army of unemployed" in every industrial community; methods of industry which drive men as machines during long hours of labor, make work a dreary burden instead of a means for happy self-expression, and leave neither sufficient time nor energy for healthy refreshment of body, mind or soul—these are some of the conditions which surround our comfortable Christian homes. They are facts which cannot be squared with Jesus' ideals for human society.

They mean that for thousands of our fellow-citizens we have nailed "No Admittance" across the door of opportunity. We are denying them the chance to secure not simply a fair measure of food, clothing and housing, but the recreational, educational and religious activities which are necessary for normal bodily and spiritual growth. It is not strange to find ugly animosities asserting themselves in such a world. The blind self-interest which is responsible for social injustice is driving groups of men into open clashes with opposing groups. The frequent strikes of present times, often accompanied with violence, even with bloodshed, are outbreaks of flame from the ever-smouldering hostilities between capital and labor. The present great war has shed new light upon the antagonism which is frequently, if not inevitably, involved in commercial competition. Social injustice, class bitterness, competitive strife and international war are the natural offspring of a civilization more intent upon the acquisition of material wealth than upon the creation of personality and the maintenance of right human relationships.

Christianity cannot tolerate a civilization so imperfect. Such evils it must ever seek to transform. But if it is to accomplish this transformation, if unequal conditions of life are to be replaced with equal opportunities for healthy growth of body and soul, if the antagonisms between individuals and classes are to be transmuted into brotherhood there is need for all Christians to press forward into new endeavors. Here is a task for every individual. The ultimate solution of these world problems lies not with the statesmen, the captains of industry, the economists or the sociologists, but with the rank and file of Christians. If Christian principles are to become the foundation of society they will have to be built into it by the hands of many workmen.

The events of the present day are, however, a sufficient demonstration that we cannot build a new world by the old methods. Faced by the existing world situation and the spirit which now seems dominant, Christendom must bow its head in shame over its failure. And the reason it has failed is that it has never fully trusted and tried its own Gospel. Against the evil in the world we have pitted, not the pure Christianity of Jesus, but a diluted Christianity of our own creation. We have pronounced the world unready for the Sermon on the Mount, when in truth it has been we ourselves who have been unready to rely upon its efficacy, or to suffer the consequences of practicing it. We have adjusted ourselves to accepted standards; we have acquiesced in prevailing customs, we have compromised. But the world is now giving us to understand that it can never be transformed in this way. It is not inclined to adopt principles which those who profess them do not fully trust. It is not likely to be greatly impressed with the ideals of those whose practice is modified to suit the occasion. The conquest of evil requires a purer Christianity than is generally exhibited. The world's needs are calling individual Christians in all lands to new and unflinching endeavors to infuse into every relationship of life the transforming love revealed by Jesus Christ.

To which of our institutions shall we look, if not to the Church, to give us the men and women for these tasks? The Church exists not simply to fit men for the Hereafter, but to equip them for a full Christian life here and now. She fulfils her true purpose not by creating recluse saints or learned theologians, but by sending disciples into this present world to grapple with its modern problems in the wisdom and power of their Master. Jesus taught men how to live here on earth. He gave them principles to act by, truth to translate into conduct, and that is the function of His Church. Moral and religious leadership with regard to the practical issues of her day is her responsibility. If she is truly to exercise that leadership she must be more than the guardian of tradition or the prophet of a far-off ideal. She must help her members to read and understand their world. She must guide them in continual endeavors to make fresh interpretations and new applications of the unchanging Gospel.

Quakerism shares these responsibilities with the rest of the Church. It must be to Friends something more vital than the maintenance of Disciplines and Testimonies. Our sacred heritage of truth must mean to us not a body of cold precepts for the preservation of ancient practices but a message of life and power for humanity's present needs. Facing the critical issues of to-day there is a greater work for our Society to do than merely to encourage its members to apply our principles in the traditional ways. If it would render the highest service it will not simply bid them abstain from war. It will arouse them to aid actively and constructively in creating friendship and good-will among nations. It will cause them to query whether many things in the economic system in which they have acquiesced do not violate the Christian principle of love. It will help them to go forward in discovering and practicing the full implications of Christianity for commercial, industrial and all social life.

The service to which the whole Church is called to-day is to inspire men with more complete devotion to Christ's way of love, with more earnest determination to live it out to the full, with more adventurous faith in its efficacy, with greater readiness to sacrifice for it. Let her see to it that she does not neglect her opportunity. "The Church must either condemn the world and seek to change it, or tolerate the world and conform to it. In the latter case it surrenders its holiness and its mission. The other possibility has never yet been tried with full faith on a large scale. All the leadings of God in contemporary history and all the promptings of Christ's spirit in our hearts urge us to make the trial."* E. W. E.

FRIENDS IN PUBLIC LIFE.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS FROM AMERICAN HISTORY.

From 1710 to 1739 was the Golden Age of Quaker government. No wars loomed up, the oath question received a settlement; the Quaker political machine was developed into a high stage of efficiency; the German vote was satisfied; the oncoming migration of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians had not grown into large proportions; political expediency ruled the councils because there were no moral issues on which men would seriously differ; the Governors found it to their interest to act in harmony with the Assembly. The widow and sons of William Penn seemed to be better judges of Deputy Governors than was the Founder. Material prosperity added to the general satisfaction, and the foundations of Quaker fortunes in commerce and agriculture were laid. Coincidentally with this prosperity and control, a generation of Friends grew up who were less certain than their predecessors that it was necessary to suffer seriously for convictions, or who argued that the good things brought about by peace and good fortune were worth more than the idealistic devotion to principles which would seem to work out doubtful results. In short, they changed from a priori devotes of uncompromising standards of rectitude to utilitarians.

This did not, however, affect the whole body but became most noticeable among the more wealthy old families, for already there were "old" families in Philadelphia.

Then troubles began to come. Thomas Penn treated the Indians badly, and they fell into the temptations which the French laid for them. England went to war first with Spain, and then with France, and demanded colonial aid. The Penn family gave secret instructions to the Deputies which, because they were secret and only brought out as needed, incensed the Assembly. These Deputies could not understand Quaker scruples, and the Friends probably displayed "a little more warmth than is consistent with the moderation we profess," as Dr. Fothergill expressed it, in opposing what they deemed unrighteous measures of defense and taxation. Till 1756 there was a constant series of disputes and occasions of ill-feeling which were injurious to harmony in the state and had reflex influence on the Church. James Logan, William Penn's secretary and agent, then an old and respected citizen, sent a paper to the Yearly Meeting advocating defensive war, and urging that those who could not join should give up their places in government, which paper was not read. On the other hand, the more rigid of the Friends of the old school gave the same advice because they thought that truth was being compromised by the unholy measures and injurious arguments used to support the political Friends in their contentions with the Executive.

The matter became critical in 1764 when a body of border ruffians marched in motly ranks from the Susquehanna and threatened to kill a band of friendly Indians encamped in Philadelphia. Many citizens, including about 200 young Friends, took up arms and the "Great Meeting House was opened to shield the defenders on a stormy February day." Nothing came of the attack because Benjamin Franklin persuaded the frontiersmen to go home without damage, but the Monthly Meeting took up the case of the militant Quakers. Some repented and apologized; some were labored with with doubtful results, while some defiantly defended their action and were not disowned.

As we have seen, the Friends in the Assembly quibbled considerably in the days which followed 1740. Bad treatment for which the Friends were not responsible made the Indians hostile on the frontiers, and finally in 1756 the Governor declared war. When during these years they appropriated money quite liberally "for the King's use," they knew it would be spent for forts and guns, though they all the time worked and hoped for an early peace. But with the declaration of war, their compromises stopped. Acting on the advice of English Friends they withdrew from the Assembly and declined re-election, and Pennsylvania knew direct Quaker control of politics no more.

It was a strain upon their past habits, for they had managed with striking success the most prosperous Colony along the Atlantic coast, and the people were continually importuning them to reconsider their declaration. Probably they themselves expected to return to political positions after the wars were over but that time did not come. Indian and French excitement and opposition to the English Government extended to the Revolutionary War and that cataclysm ended Quaker influence as well as Quaker official life in the Quaker Colony.

Through all these years there was growing up, basing itself on George Fox's advice to keep clear of the "commotions" involved in government, a feeling that Friends should take no part in public life. Their course in the Revolution, which had involved the disownment of some 400 members for participation in the warlike affairs of the day, mainly on the American side, made them unpopular, and they withdrew into a more mystical life and an uncompromising devotion to principle and testimony, and the Quaker of the nineteenth century of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was evolved.

*Christianity and the Social Crisis, by Walter Rauschenbusch.

This little historical sketch would seem to indicate that the application of a Quaker conscience to state affairs in a non-Quaker community is impossible.

Probably conditions will never be better than in Colonial Pennsylvania, and there it broke down, though at first against the popular will, in the face of apparent political necessity.

But it does not prove that Friends may not accept many posts in government, both executive and legislative, which need not touch on their convictions and in which they may render signal service.

They may also bring the attention of a nation to the moral issues of the day, a task for which Friends with the ancient sort of standards would seem to have great advantages.

It tones up the nation to have its thoughts turned to ethical rather than exclusively economic subjects. One moral question brings another in its train and men get to thinking in terms of right and wrong rather than expedient and opportune. In the decade prior to our Civil War when men were fused together on the subject of the rights of man, and used such phrases as "the higher law," "the irrepressible conflict," "the true grandeur of nations," there was a manifest toning up of standards. Then came the war and the host of questions of currency, tariff, revenue and material issues generally, which divided parties in the succeeding years, and morality took the second place to economics and men thought in dollars rather than in righteousness. We had a great growth in wealth and all its unhealthy accompaniments of monopolies, rebates, corporate interference with government and boss and machine rule in politics. Later the moral sense of the nation reasserted itself and the development of attention to human rights and the social conscience, and to specific matters like temperance and peace and civil service reform, went on apace. It is one of the great evils of war that it draws the interest of men from such movements, to the more pressing but less vital ones of national defense, sources of national income, reduction of national expenditure for social development, and all the lesser breed which designing politicians take advantage of to press upon us their own selfish designs for office and emolument. Some beneficent reforms which need advertising to make people appreciate them are thrust aside by the insistence on the more spectacular national needs, and the wholesome march of moral and political reform in a democracy is impeded. For this march under normal conditions is the very lifeblood of progress. The American nation will not get far astray if its attention can be seriously turned to a great issue and a great need. How quickly when it once grasped the dangers of corporation control of politics, with many blundering and foolish steps, it is true, it brought its downfall! Free discussion and the honest purposes of an intelligent electorate can be depended on to clear away any heresy before it reaches the stage of serious danger to the national soul.

But morality must have the right of way, and while matters in which the economic rather than the moral predominate, should have their large place in national councils and public discussion, it is the duty of every man with influence in public life to press to the front the great abiding projects which have their root in eternal right, and here our Quaker traditions and principles should make a prepossession in favor of such a course of action.

There are a number of reforms which have been our concerns very largely in the past. The substitution of life imprisonment for capital punishment, the development of the reformatory idea in our prisons and kindly treatment in asylums, the one-price system in sales, the limitation of fortunes and expenditures within moderate dimensions, theories of education which are at once practical and spiritual, the rigidly honest management of public funds, all of these, in which good men generally would now join, have some of their roots in legislation, and if not national party issues, not infrequently become the issues in State or local elections or legislation.

Then there is the great question of warlike preparation and policy. This is the rock on which Quaker participation in politics has usually been shipwrecked. It broke its control in Provincial Pennsylvania. It drove the Society back into itself in the Revolutionary War and produced an inwardness from which it has only in the last half century evolved. It forced John Bright from the British Cabinet when Alexandria was bombarded. It caused the breaking of the property of Joshua Rowntree in the Boer War. It has sent many a conscientious sufferer to jail rather than pay military fines or join in military exercises. It is now operating to render the pacifists, with whom all real Friends must join themselves, objects of unpopularity among a great host of men, some unthinking and hysterical, some seriously concerned for the national safety.

Here is the great problem of to-day for the Christian statesman who can maintain himself conscientiously in public life. He needs to show the nation that an aggressive policy of good will, the absence of all design on the integrity or interests of others, the rigid and even generous enforcement of all treaties and conventions, the full comprehension of and respect for the points of view and political and commercial interests of others, are worth more in maintaining peace than dreadnoughts or submarines, coast defenses or standing armies. Had we the greatest armaments in the world, which after the expenditure of billions of dollars and years of time we might have, with all the military spirit and commercial interests necessarily developed by such an aggregation, who could trust the nation not to enter with slight provocation upon a career of conquests or overbearing treatment in the cause of mercenary or political interests. The danger of foreign aggression upon a nation doing its generous part in world diplomacy, upon whose goodwill the commercial prosperity of all others was largely dependent, is far less than the danger, under the guise of preparedness, of creating a spirit of militarism, which will break down our Christian standards and lead on to a cataclysm such as a similar spirit has developed in Europe. We need to teach our people through the mouths of practical politicians, in office and out, the Christian basis of government, none the less so now, when the epidemic of force is being spread through the country with great skill and no little success. It is demanding of us that we reverse the policy of a century and, as Whittier told us in another cause, that we "Run anew the evil race the old lost nations ran,

And die like them of unbelief of God and wrong of man."

Friends will find more allies in our uncompromising positions than ever before. There are many who would say that under any provocation their allegiance to Christianity as they understand it is supreme, that conscience is so educated that the immoralities of war are impossible to them.

The Friend stands for the development of personality. For this he can not go to war, for this involves the subordination of personality to human commands, doing evil that good may come, the merging of the individual conscience into the conscience of the mass. He can not swear for his every word has the sanction of truth behind it. He can not be an unquestioning member of a political group taking on or leaving off principle at the behest of a leader or for utilitarian considerations. He can not grind the poor in business or the criminal in jail, for the respect for his own personality induces respect for that of others. He must go through life more or less isolated, not from lack of sympathy for others, for he has this in the highest degree, but because the machinery of modern methods is too rigid for his open-minded and independent soul. He will take his orders from his own discerning heart rather than from current opinion or popular impulse.

If he can do all this and still be an effective public servant, as an exceptional man in an exceptional place may be, the Quaker in politics may live. If not he will sacrifice place to conscience, expediency to principle.

ANGEL OF PAIN.

Angel of Pain, I think thy face
Will be, in all the heavenly place,
The sweetest face that I shall see,
The swiftest face to smile on me.
All other angels faint and tire;
Joy wearies, and forsakes Desire;
Hope falters, face to face with Fate,
And dies because it cannot wait;
And Love cuts short each loving day,
Because fond hearts cannot obey
That subtle law which measures bliss
By what it is content to miss.
But thou, O loving, faithful Pain,—
Hated, reproached, rejected, slain,—
Dost only closer cling and bless
In sweeter, stronger steadfastness.
Dear, patient angel, to thine own
Thou comest, and art never known
Till late, in some lone twilight place,
The light of thy transfigured face
Shines sudden out, and, speechless, they Know they have walked with God all day.

[MANY who read the following will understand the reference to the Orphanage in Cairo, Egypt, others will not. It may be in place to state that under a sense of duty, John S. and Esther Fowler made a religious visit some twenty or more years ago to certain places in Egypt. At the time of this visit they were members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and traveled with minutes of endorsement issued by their meetings here.

We doubt not that the seed sown by such dedicated servants will bring forth a harvest in the Master's own time and way. As a practical outcome of the visit, however, is the Orphanage alluded to in the following paper. It is a visible fruitage of the visit which these dear Friends made and E. F.'s modest reference to it is characteristic of the service which she and her husband were earnest to render.—Ems.]

As it has been sometime since there has been anything in THE FRIEND relative to the concern of my late husband John S. Fowler for certain classes in Cairo, Egypt, the writer has felt that it might be due to those who were interested, many of whom kindly and liberally contributed to the object for which he labored so devotedly, to have some information of present conditions. As a result of the effort put forth an Orphanage was started in a rented building, of which we have had from time to time, interesting and encouraging accounts, as well as some touching ones, too. Over two years since a letter was received from the individual who has been much interested in this work, and very faithful in promoting it, informing that they were about to purchase a property for the Orphanage, and added, "I was so glad when I heard the good news that I could not keep the tears back." The following is an extract from a recent letter from the same person: "I have been wishing to write to you for a long time, but I am kept so busy that I have very little time for writing. I wish you could see our nice home. The Lord has been so good to us. It is now more than ten years and a-half since this Orphanage was opened, and He has given us day by day what we need, and now has given us this beautiful home in a wonderful way. I was hunting for a house to rent two years ago, when I saw this old hospital building, and felt that this was just what we needed. There is a little more than an acre of ground and we got the place for the price of the ground, about £5,000 (or $25,000). I had been asking for not less than an acre of land, and the Lord gave us more than we asked for. The house is well built, and with some repairs and balconies or porches would be just what we need. When we paid for the place we were expecting a legacy, and on the strength of that money was borrowed, and a part of the house rented to the mission. The rent money was used in part to pay the interest on the money borrowed, but finally the will conferring the legacy on the Orphanage was broken, and we did not get the money but a short time ago money came to pay off the debt. I do not know who the donor is. We are so thankful."

Some expressions are found in which my husband refers to his feeling: "When in that ancient land it seemed to me to be a day of precious divine visitation to the inhabitants thereof, so much so that it is with me when I lie down and when I rise up, and when I walk by the way."

He also alludes to a concern he had felt (which it is believed he faithfully maintained), in regard to those of our beloved Society, that the Master would enable such to exemplify "That He was able to open a way whereby a knowledge of His wondrous love might be made known in lands which have not known His name, and at the same time preserve them from stepping aside from a faithful observance of our precious principles and testimonies." In reflecting on this sacrifice and taking a retrospect of some events in connection with the exercise and journey, now over twenty-one years since, the survivor can thankfully acknowledge that if any good seed was sown, or anything accomplished that adds to the physical comfort, or that is instrumental as a means of placing some of the helpless children in that land under a Christian influence, the praise and the honor belong to Him who it is believed through His goodness and mercy opened the way, and was strength in weakness, and "A very present help in trouble" throughout the undertaking.

It was at a time of pressure that the language presented with comfort, "Because thou hast obeyed My voice." It was in simple faith that the service was entered upon, and we may safely leave the fruitage with Him whose blessing only can give the increase, desiring gratefully to render to all their dues for any helpful part they may have taken in carrying out the concern.

SOME PEACE BOOKS.

111.

"Above the Battle," by Romain Rolland, Open Court Publishing Co., Chicago, $1. This volume contains about 200 pages of very remarkable writing. More than one quotation from it has already been printed in THE FRIEND. The author is doubtless the most famous literary character to associate himself with the cause of peace. It was he who a few years since mystified the world of letters by the famous "Jean Christophe." At the outbreak of the war he retired to Switzerland where his pen has been busily engaged especially in protest against the "insanity" of the intellectual class in the several countries in their efforts to justify the war. His point of view is indicated in the following: "It is a task which seems to me not unworthy of those among us who find themselves outside the struggle, and who through the life of the spirit have wider relations with the universe—a little lay church which, to-day more than the other [the Christian Church], preserves its faith in the unity of human thought and believes that all men are sons of the same Father. In any case, if such a faith merits insult, the insults constitute an honor that we will claim as ours before the tribunal of posterity." [Pages 105 and 106.]

The spirit of his treatment is illustrated in this sentence from the conclusion of the chapter on "War Literature:" "For the present the essential thing is to show that even in Germany there are certain finer minds who are fighting against the spirit which we hate—the spirit of grasping imperialism and inhuman pride, of military cast and the megalomania of pedants.”

This is a volume that many will wish to own not only for its substance but for its literary merit. A few more brief quotations may help to justify this judgment. “No! Love of my country does not demand that I shall hate and slay those noble and faithful souls who also love theirs, but rather that I should honor them and seek to unite with them for our common good.” [Page 47.]

“Can we not sacrifice ourselves without sacrificing our neighbors also?” [Page 48.] “Every nation to a greater or less extent has an imperialism of its own, and whether it be military, financial, feudal, republican, social, or intellectual, it is always the octopus sucking the blood of Europe.” [Page 50.] “Our first duty, then, all over the world, is to insist on the formation of a moral High Court, a tribunal of consciences, to watch and pass impartial judgment on any violation of the laws of nations.” [Pages 51, 52.]

IV.

“We,” by Gerald Stanley Lee, the author of “Crowds,” Doubleday, Page & Co., $1.50. The title is somewhat elucidated by this on the title page, “A Confession of Faith for the American people during and after War. A study of the art of making things happen. A recommendation of the first person plural for men and nations.” There are 700 pages of this compact volume. Its precursor, “Crowds,” has gone through seven editions. This is the same kind of writing—the same point of view. If the American public will read “We” with the same appetite it would be safe to say that this book contains the most effective peace propaganda yet put in circulation. But what are the prospects that the book will have readers?

Even those who have a sympathetic feeling for peace work are apt, it seems, to misjudge the motive of the author which appears on cursory examination serio-comic, with some emphasis on the comic. After pondering with some care the whole of the 700 pages we say without hesitation that this is a misjudgment. Much more near the truth is a critical estimate of “Crowds” as follows: “An agitating and memorable book filled with live formulas and arrowy truths.” “We” is “agitating;” after reading it one perceives that it is “memorable,” and there can be no doubt about the “live formulas and arrowy truths.” The thesis of the book at least commends itself readily to those who think on the subject. Thinking world thoughts in terms of “We,” instead of in terms of “I” or “you,” is the sine qua non of internationalism. The method of this thinking must be that of getting the world’s attention. The author uses a very homely illustration to make this clear. Advertising of the right kind can secure enough attention for so ordinary a matter as a tooth-brush to transform it into a fortune-making commodity. Peace if rightly understood has the advantage of war every way, so it becomes a plain case of getting the world’s attention to the real thing in order to make it universal. No small portion of the book is taken up with discovering real peace. This once done the difficulty of “advertising war off the face of the globe” does not seem really impossible.

A few of the arrowy thoughts are quoted herewith as a further invitation to our readers to become acquainted with the book:

“There are but two understandings I have come to have with myself about fighting. They represent my only difference with fighters as I know them. First, I will not fight people. I will fight for people. I will fight the fever and lies in the people. Second, I will not take sides. I fight for all people. I fight all the lies in all the people.” [Pp. 10-11.]

“We shall conquer our enemies in their own dooryards, by their own firesides, by serving them better than they can serve themselves.” [P. 14.]

“As humble as it is, even a porcelain bathtub or a Gillette razor expresses us better, makes more people understand us and have more use for us than a thousand idiotic submarines or senseless ingenious dreadnoughts or stupidly terrible Krupps could in a thousand years. We want to be terrible by being of some use. We propose to defend ourselves with a terrific indispensableness.” [P. 27.]

“War is the failure of a world’s spiritual billboards to advertise what each nation really has for the others that the others really want.” [P. 253.]

“The fact that is standing in the foreground of the world every day while this war is going on, is that no one set of people this world has produced yet, is or can ever be, good or beautiful enough to use asphyxiating gases to convince or to improve the others.” [P. 204.]

“The appeal to force is already getting to be seen by all—in its spiritual essence, as what it really is. Force or the threat of force in a man, instead of being terrible and magnificent and self-possessed as it is in a lion, is a helplessness in the mouth, a mumbling, a sickness of expression—the final feebleness of self-revelation.” [P. 354.]

“Without recklessness, without vagueness, with shrewdness, quietness and matter-of-factness, we believe we have the brains to trust other nations. We believe we have the brains to make them trust us.” [P. 419.]

“National ‘preparedness’ prepares enemies. National confession prepares friends.” [P. 499.]

“This is my conception of peace. It is an amazing, resistless, whirling all-sidedness. . . . In this sense the peace energy in a mind may be said to be the highest voltage of energy in the mind of the human race.” [Pp. 5-6.]

“I have seen that our souls are awaking, that we are but beginning. To-day, at last, with Columbus, Copernicus, Bell and Marconi, we have all been waked out of our little separate selves. We have rushed to our windows. We look out through the windows of our souls upon the earth. The nations shall yet be to us the voices of happy children playing in The Yard.” [P. 595.]

“And it would be a crime against history and against ourselves for America to-day not to silence her national soul, not to listen reverently, humbly to the cries of the nations to her plains and to her mountains, not to prepare herself in daily thought, make herself ready with solemn faithful daily self-control, with love, shrewdness and faith in others—to be the gentle, relentlessly disinterested, trusted peace-maker—the little Brother of the world. We are not worthy of it, but we will try.”

(To be concluded.)

This is the third of a series of papers growing out of William C. Allen’s recent visit abroad. Four others are to follow:—“Effect of the War on Children,” “The Conscientious Objectors,” “The War and the Church in England,” “The Legacy of the War.”

TRAVELING RESTRICTIONS IN ENGLAND.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Traveling abroad in these days is not the easy matter that it was a few years ago, considered from the viewpoint of Governmental authority and regulations. I am informed that a certain citizen of the United States desired last winter to go to Europe and when filling out the form of request for a passport he assigned as his reason for the trip that it was to be for pleasure. Word quickly came back from Washington that a passport could not be issued—it was no time to go to Europe for pleasure. Our Passport Bureau was exactly right; our Government cannot assume responsibility for the protection of its citizens on the high seas in connection with individual enjoyment—the possibilities are too dangerous and momentous.

When my wife and I requested passports we were obliged to write to Washington, D. C., accompanying our request with several photographs, descriptions of our personal appearance, the affidavit of a prominent citizen of San José, California, our own affirmations, the object of the proposed trip, its probable duration, etc. In due course we received information that the passports would be issued and could be secured at the proper offices in New York prior to sailing. A goodly portion of one day before embarking was devoted to obtaining possession of the precious documents. We were identified by the photographs fastened to them, and after receiving them and signing receipts therefor, we proceeded to the office of the British Consul to have them viséed. Waiting here was a tedious process, but finally we were ready to board the ship. When doing this we successively passed through the hands of several officials on the dock, and heaved sighs of relief when the officials of America and England had decided that we were not suspicious characters and had legitimate intentions associated with our journey.

Upon reaching England we went through a critical examination before being permitted to land, and owing to the rather foolish questioning of a military officer it looked for awhile as if we would be held up. Once in London, the first thing to do was to secure an Identity Book. Then commenced a series of experiences with our friends, the police. This fraternity knew where we were every night that we were in the British Isles. Whenever we changed our lodging-places, be they hotels or private homes, we were compelled to report at once to the police stations our arrival and departure within the part of the district that we happened to be in. Aliens are obliged to fill out and sign a form at every hotel upon arrival and departure, which form indicates, along with other information, where the guests have come from and where they expect to go. Our Identity Books were stamped or viséed in many towns or cities, and so became an authentic history of all our movements. Many hours have we spent in hunting up the proper police station in each new district we entered, or in patiently waiting for the alien officer, or calling upon him again if he happened to be out. It was a great nuisance, but with pleasure I can record that these officials, while sometimes disposed to be supernaturally dignified, were unfailingly polite.

What is an Identity Book? It is a little book full of information and regulations which you carry around with you for the purpose of identification. Any person misusing it, or making any false statements or altering it is liable to six months' imprisonment or a fine of £100. The law demands that there be placed in it the surname and Christian names, date and place of birth, nationality, occupation or trade, name of employer, particulars regarding family, and as to service in army or navy, if ever in any such service, last place of residence and personal description. The photograph of the holder has to be affixed by him. He also has to have put within it the names of father and mother, their nationality and how it was acquired, maiden name of wife, her nationality, and other information supposed to protect the British Empire.

The applicant for an Identity Book makes his passport the basis of his statements. He also must give information as to when he was last in the United Kingdom, where he landed this time, where he sailed from, and as to whether he has any male relatives in arms against Great Britain and the Allies. He must be vouched for by two natural-born British subjects and householders, whose signatures are placed in the Identity Book. The Police Inspector where the Identity Book is issued also certifies as to its accuracy in its pages.

It was a very queer thing that the police in every district attend to alien matters in some way or other differently from all the rest. There was no uniformity regarding action, registration, or the demands made upon us; neither were the Identity Books always viséed in the same way by the different Police Inspectors. In some instances we were told with a lofty look and condescending wave of the hand that our books need not be endorsed at all. Sometimes we were asked to sign our names in big books after our family affairs and honorable intentions as to the British Empire had been duly recorded therein; in other cases, no such formality was required. Occasionally these kindly "muddlers" ("muddle" is a much-used word in England just now) would forget to do something that was necessary in order to put us into proper shape to report at the next police station. In such case I reminded these brethren, without hurting their dignity, of what was essential with respect to the matter in hand. After a few visits to the police station we found that we knew quite as much about the whole procedure as did many of the officials, to say the very least. It appeared to us that this national characteristic of indefiniteness might easily neutralize the intent of the regulations regarding aliens traveling in the United Kingdom. Anyhow, we were thankful when the uncertainties associated with attempting to comply with all sorts of interpretations of the law had been completed, and when we finally surrendered our precious Identity Books on the dock as we embarked for home.

In the midst of the excitement regarding "Preparedness" last spring, I one day saw in one of the great newspapers of Eastern America a whole page with big type, devoted to explaining the necessity of the United States inaugurating an elaborate espionage system in imitation of European countries. The innocent and scared writer exhibited a small knowledge of facts, or of American ideals and principles. But I expect we must reconcile ourselves to seeing our personal liberty, as well as our money and blood swallowed up by the military machine that interested patriots hoped to build for us.

WE PLEAD FOR PEACE.

Full well we know, on fields of martial glory,
Heroes, to cause and country consecrate,
Write fame's immortal and inspiring story,
And seem to save the state,—

But living, this is glorious revelation
Of deathless virtues that have strength to save—
Why heep the flower of an exalted nation
In an untimely grave?

We plead for peace, for power still ascending,
To nations whose rich blessings round our world,
That in good works, their strength renewing, blending,
When battle flags are furled.

Their zeal shall flame again in wasting spaces,
Their genius once again assume its sway,
That they may lead earth's weak and lowly races
Onward, to earth's best day!

—CHARLES W. STEVENSON, in the Springfield Republican.

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

The interest expressed in letters from the Orient a year ago has suggested the publication of the following from Isaac Mason.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

DEAR BROTHER JOSEPH:—

How can I let this day pass entirely without a little imaginary chat with thee, since it is the anniversary of our parting at Seoul in Korea! Moreover I have been reading to (my wife) Esther, thy article in "Our Missions" giving such a good summary of our travels and the outstanding points which impressed thee most. . . . This time, twelve months ago, I was feeling somewhat lonely and sad as the train hurried me towards Manchuria—every minute further away from my beloved companion. But since then I have lived over our experiences many times, and always with gratitude and pleasure. I have mentioned to thee more than once that it was a good thing that we made the trip last year instead of this, as I fancy we simply could not have done the Sze Chwan part of it now. I am enclosing some oddments of letters from Tung Chwan, Sui Ning and Chengtu, showing how disturbed things have been up there of late.

The latest sensation has been the capture of our good friend E. W. Wallace by brigands and demand for ransom. (E. W. W. is Secretary of the Educational Union at Chengtu and lives in the house formerly occupied by Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin. He had come to Shanghai to accompany his wife, who was called home to Canada on account of her mother's illness, and was hurrying back to Chengtu against official advice, to attend a Summer School Conference, when captured by the robbers, who infest Sze Chwan at present.) A telegram to Shanghai tells of his release (after the U. S. Consul in Chungking had gone to his assistance).

I enclose a cutting which I contributed to the paper.

E. W. W. was seized near Yün Chwan not far from Tung Liang, about two days from where we rested at the Methodist Chapel at Pi Shan after changing our route on account of the robbers. Thou wilt now better appreciate the nervousness I had that night at Chin Mu Kwan when we were so near them. I remembered the capture of the French priest years ago, and I also was held up on the small river about the same time and had a narrow escape, so I felt more anxious than I cared to show to thee on that stretch of the journey. The Chinese local slang for this kind of business is "la fei Chü"—holding up the fat hog. They'd have had a fine haul of "hogs" if they had taken us too! (Twenty Chinese men had been captured and held for ransom by these robbers at a certain town only a few hours before we arrived by chairs, carried on the shoulders of four, and we were earnestly entreated by the head men and soldiers of the next village not to pursue our journey in the direction we intended, because the robbers had retired after "a battle" with the local authorities in that direction.) Sze Chwan is having too much political disturbance—due largely to personal ambitions and jealousies—since Yuan died at any rate and "independence" was cancelled there has been nothing to squabble about, as all profess loyalty to Li and the Government. It would be more to the point if they turned their attention to the lawless scallawags who are terrorizing the industrious people and making life a constant anxiety to people in general. Canton seems to be a centre of political unrest still, but otherwise things seem quieter and prospects brighter. A parliament is to assemble on the first of next month.

Sun Yat Sen and thy friend Hwang Hsin have both appeared publicly in Shanghai within the last few days. A few weeks ago there was a great price on their heads. There are much better men available—if they can be induced to take office. I wonder if General Hwang will become popular enough to take part in the Government?

I have recently finished Wm. E. Wilson's "Christ and War." Just now I am translating Dr. George Newman's "Health of the State" and a few selections from "Dymond's Essays on Morality," and am also well on with a translation of Tylor's "Pictures of Church History." We are planning a full and up-to-date Commentary of the whole Bible, which ought to be a fine useful work if we can carry it through. It will mean a great amount of labor divided among many workers, but the results would justify the effort. We hope to get special funds, especially from Boards in America, as C. L. S. funds are suffering very much on account of the war.

I have just been elected Honorable Secretary of the North China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, which post will take up most of my spare time. There are nearly 500 members, about 100 scattered in various countries, the rest throughout China. The Society has been founded some sixty years, and has had among its members most of the famous students of "Things Chinese." The objects are to stimulate interest and research into China and Chinese; monthly lectures are given in winter. We have a good museum and an excellent library of works connected with research in China and neighboring countries. Happily we have Chinese clerical help, so my duties will not interfere with my regular work.

(I. M. is stationed in Shanghai connected with the Christian Literature Society.)

With loving greetings I remain, thine affectionately,

SHANGHAI, Seventh Month 19, 1916,

ISAAC.

Umé Tsuda, who is doing such a noble work for the women of Japan, by conducting the most advanced English-speaking school in that country—with one hundred of her graduates placed as teachers in the Government Schools—writes, under recent date, of her earnest desire to enlarge her school and its curriculum so as to make it a real college.

In order to accomplish this, as I explained in a letter to THE FRIEND a year ago, more ground is necessary, and such a tract, admirably adapted to the purpose, and located quite near her present institution, is now offered for sale. With a payment of $10,000 she would add it to her equipment and carry a mortgage of $20,000. No investment that I can think of will bring greater returns than thus giving three hundred most worthy Japanese young women such an opportunity to acquire a liberal education under Christian influences. Most of these students became Christians before leaving this School and the atmosphere of their Alma Mater was markedly Christian whenever I have had the privilege of visiting it.

Michi Kawai, now just returning again to her native land from America, has been an invaluable helper with Anna C. Hartshorne in building up this leading educational centre for girls. At Hoshino, a Bryn Mawr graduate, and Matsu Okonogi, a Wellesley College and Oxford, England, now student and teacher in the Higher Normal School for girls in Tokyo, have been most devoted and capable helpers. But Umé Tsuda tells her own story thus, after making very appreciative mention of the above teachers.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

"But workers are few and all are kept busy. We need many more. Two of our girls, graduates, are planning to go—one to Canada, through the kind offices of the Y. W. C. A. She is a very dear girl, who goes to Toronto to study Domestic Science. Another girl, Kawai San's protégée, Yuri Watanabe, who has been at Earlham College and is one of our dear graduates, is expecting to come back this summer. So our women are having more and more opportunities and my heart rejoices for them. If ever I go to America again I am going to work for another scholarship, which will be given to the graduates of the Joshi Eigaku Juku, and the choice of the college not to be limited to Bryn Mawr College, but left open. "Ryu Sato from the Friends' School seems to have proved a splendid student. There are plenty of fine minds among our women, and oh! we do need a fine college for them out here. I can do so little, I am powerless, for many things. I can only hope to raise up workers and leaders for the future. This is the best I can do; perhaps others will take up the work as it ought to be done—the desire is perhaps all I can offer to the cause and what the School has been and is doing may pave the way. It is so little, so very little, yet God has blessed it and blessed my dear band of girls. They are so loyal and loving. This spring they had a bazaar for the endowment fund, and oh! how they worked—I had to hold them back and keep them from overdoing, and they cleared 1000 yen in a sale from 12 noon till 6 P. M. only. One thousand people came, in spite of a very rainy, stormy day. The new girls were astonished at the zeal of the older girls and said how the students must love their school." (The Alumni, with herculean effort, raised 6000 yen a few years ago to cancel a debt on this property.)

POCONO LAKE, Ninth Month 28, 1916.

THE war which now shadows the world, and the sacrifices which are willingly made in it, should shame our timidity and our tame trifling with duty, and call us to deal with life as a reality and with the work of Christ in the world as worth more devotion than national honor, or commercial advantage, or racial pride. Every soldier dying for his country on a European battle-field, every home giving up its blood and tears, is a summons and a reproach to us men and women who have accepted the Christ of the cross, but not the cross of Christ. If they have counted their cause above their lives and their every possession, why not we? What they freely yield to their lords of war and death, shall not Christians give with joy to their Lord of life and peace?—ROBERT E. SPEER.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THOMAS ELLWOOD.—(Gleanings from a Sketch by Frances Anne Budge)—About the year 1643, two young children, a boy and a girl, might often be seen in a little "coach" drawn by a footman through

"The walks of Lincoln's Inn Under the Elms,"

then and long afterwards an aristocratic neighborhood. The little Guilelma (who afterwards became the wife of William Penn) was the daughter of Lady Springett, the widow of Sir William Springett, who died in the Parliament service. Her chosen playfellow, Tom Ellwood, was the youngest child of Walter Ellwood, Esq., of Crowell, near Thame.

The Ellwoods made London their home until after the surrender of the City of Oxford. On their return to the country, Thomas's older brother was sent to the free school at Thame, whither Tom also went as soon as his age would allow. He was remarkably quick in mastering his lessons, but being a busy little lad, very active and full of fun, he so often heedlessly broke some of the rigid rules of the school that he came in for a large share of the birch. Yet, notwithstanding this, he writes with regret of his early removal from school where he had made good progress in Latin and had begun to learn Greek.

While still in his teens, he one day accompanied his father to the Petty Sessions at Watlington. As they drew near the town, the coachman took a short cut through a cornfield, where there was a pathway wide enough for carriage-wheels; whereupon a ploughman bade the driver draw up and roundly abused the gentlemen for going over the corn. The elder Ellwood quietly told the man that if any damage were done, full satisfaction should be given him if he would call at the inn to which they were going. It was not until late in the evening that the father and son set out on their homeward way. The night was dark and they told the coachman to keep the high road. After a while the carriage came to a sudden halt, the horses' bridles being seized by two strong men, one of whom was their acquaintance of the morning. Alighting from the carriage, Walter Ellwood, followed by his son, walked up to the men and demanded the reason for this assault. "You are upon the corn," was the false reply, "and we have made up our minds that you shall go no farther, but we'll make you go back again." Walter Ellwood remonstrated with them and warned them of the consequences of such conduct, which hint only called forth their derision. Then he ordered them to give up the great clubs they were carrying, but they laughed and said, "We did not bring them hither for that end!" Meanwhile young Ellwood was standing at his father's elbow, his youthful blood boiling with indignation, eagerly waiting for a word that should warrant him to enter the lists. When the order came, "Tom, disarm them," he went right up to the man who was nearest to him, and laying hold of his staff, said, "Sirrah, deliver your weapon." This was the last thing, however, the assailant contemplated; he raised his club, which was massive enough to have felled an ox, but, before he could strike a blow, his nimble combatant drew out his rapier; the glitter of the bright blade so startled the countryman that he fled as fast as possible, followed by his comrade. So rapid was their running or so skilful their hiding that Thomas Ellwood's pursuit was unavailing. The coachman quietly kept his seat with the plea that he dared not leave his horses, possessing more prudence and possibly less courage than his young master, who soon found that he had lost his way and that it was not easy to regain it in the dark; indeed, he could only do so by calling to his father and the driver and following the guidance of their voices. At that time his mind was quite untroubled with the thought that he had narrowly escaped staining his hands with blood, but in after years, whenever he passed the spot or memory brought back the event, he would thank God for the unseen intervention of His restraining hand.

It was about this time that Thomas Ellwood lost his brother, and not long afterwards his mother, of whom he writes in high terms.

Thomas was one day asked by his father to accompany him on a visit to Isaac Penington, who had married Lady Springett, to whom allusion has already been made. The news had reached Crowell that they had come to live on their own estate at Chalfont, which was not fifteen miles distant. To the astonishment of the Ellwoods, they found on their arrival that their hosts had become Friends. As other guests were present, the father had no opportunity for conversing with Isaac Penington on the change he had made. Meanwhile, his son's mind was occupied with the desire for the companionship of his old friend Guilelma, whom at length he found gathering flowers in the garden. They had sometimes met since childhood, when the Peningtons were in country lodgings. The lovely girl received him courteously, but when he talked to her in his accustomed style, there was something in her deportment, young as she was, that made him apologize for intruding into her private walks, and withdraw.

Walter Ellwood wished to learn more about the Quakers, so after a while one winter's day, he set out with his daughters and son (who was now twenty years of age) for the Grange, the Penington's residence at Chalfont. The visitors were warmly welcomed and remained four days, lengthening their stay in order to attend a Friends' meeting, held in the spacious hall of a farm-house which had once been a gentleman's seat. Edward Burrough was there; he was then only five-and-twenty, but had already for some years been a minister of the glad tidings of salvation through Christ. Young Ellwood sat near him and eagerly drank in the Gospel truths which satisfied his intellect and warmed his heart as no preaching had ever done before.

Soon afterwards, having learned from his father's man that there was to be a meeting at High Wycombe, he went there on horseback, calling his greyhound to follow, so that he might seem to be going out hunting. The town being reached, he ordered the hostler to take care of his dog and repaired to the private house where the meeting was held; as he took the first empty seat he could find, just inside the door, he thought that the sword which he wore attracted the attention of some of the little company. Presently a minister arose with words which were just suited to Thomas Ellwood's state of mind and sealed on his soul the impression which had already been made. He writes that although he had not fallen into the gross sins of the world, its spirit had ruled his life. "I found," he says, "that all sin (even that which had the finest or fairest show, as well as that which was more coarse and foul) brought guilt, and with and for guilt, condemnation on the soul that sinned. Now also did I receive a new law, the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which wrought in me against evil . . . so that I could not any longer go on in my former ways."

NEWS ITEMS.

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL.—The School opened on Tenth Month 3rd, two weeks later than the scheduled time, because of the epidemic of infantile paralysis. There naturally was some apprehension on the part of parents and a large number of the younger children were kept out for indefinite periods. Most of these returned on the 9th and by the 16th the attendance was almost normal.

School opened with unusual earnestness on the part of the pupils. The teachers felt that we have never had a first week of school where so much was accomplished and such satisfactory spirit shown. In the case of absent pupils parents have co-operated most cordially and nearly all of them have secured the necessary text-books and are keeping up the work as well as they can. This is made possible by our system of sending home daily slips to all absent pupils.

All possible precautions in the matter of health have been taken after consultation with two of the leading physicians of Germantown. Boiled water is provided for any pupils who are afraid to drink from the bubblers, and only such fruit is served in the lunch-room as is recommended by the health authorities. The lunch-room has been carefully screened, and bubblers installed at the athletic field, so that the only water now served throughout the school buildings is through bubblers or in glasses in the lunch-room.

The daily medical inspection under the direct supervision of the Board of Health continues as last year. The school doctor inspected every pupil on the first day of school and each day inspects any boys or girls who have just come back.

The school enrollment is the largest in our history. There is always a small readjustment one way or the other during the first week of school. The figures of Tenth Month 10th are as follows: Total number in the school 466; 206 boys and 260 girls. This total is divided among the different departments as follows: High School 148; Intermediate School 124; Primary School 169; Kindergarten 25.

The school is fortunate in having an experienced body of teachers, many of whom have given years of service to the School. There are only two changes in our faculty to take the place of two teachers who have resigned. Dorothy Brooke, of Sandy Spring, Maryland, a successful and experienced teacher, has been appointed a teacher in the Intermediate School and Catherine L. Westling, a graduate of Bryn Mawr College, with two years' experience, as assistant in the Primary and Intermediate Departments. Dorothy Brooke spent the summer at Columbia University preparing for her work in Teachers' College, and Catherine Westling at the University of Pennsylvania.

H. A. Dominovich, D. Lawrence Burgess and Irvin C. Poley spent the summer at Camp Megunticook, Maine, for which they have a large responsibility. Ivan L. Brookmyer was again in residence at Columbia University for the summer working for a higher degree in science. Alfred A. Smith, the physical director, had a responsible position at the well-known Cobbs' Camp, and Emilie C. Bradbury was also a helper at a girls' camp during the summer. Others of the teaching body have had pleasant and helpful experiences in travel.

Marie H. Albertson has returned to the School as Assistant Secretary. She has charge of the new supply office which has been specially fitted up during the summer where all stationery supplies are given out to pupils of the Intermediate and Upper School. The new supply office represents the chief building change during the summer apart from the general painting, repairs, etc. The new locker-room building, however, is now under way, and will be ready for occupancy about Thanksgiving time when it will be needed.

For some years the School has been crowded in its locker facilities. The new building has been made possible by contributions of alumni and friends of the School. The campaign was started in the spring and is still being conducted by a committee of old scholars under the above chairmanship of S. Rowland Morgan. A new building is being erected between the library and gymnasium and the total cost will amount to about $6500. The old locker-rooms for both boys and girls will be thrown together and converted to the use of the girls exclusively. This will give them four shower-baths and the double former space. The new building for the boys will include five shower-baths, stationary washstands, etc., a measuring-room for the director and for the use of visitors, and a small room for the School doctor together with locker-rooms for the older, intermediate and younger boys.

All but two of the class of 1916 will enter college or higher institutions of learning this autumn. One of the boys, S. Logan Kerr, won one of the free city scholarships granted each year by the University of Pennsylvania.

There is no special change to record in the course of study.

The year promises to be a busy one on account of the shortening of the first term and we have a larger responsibility than ever before in the number of boys and girls preparing for college.

The athletics have been entered upon with the usual interest and vigor and we are fortunate in the fine autumn weather.

UNDER date of Ninth Month 25th, Alfred Lowry, Jr., writes on board the S. S. Bergensford:—

Our voyage has been slow, but for the most part pleasant. Only two days of rough weather, Seventh and First. Grace has not been sick at all though it is her first crossing. Hope to reach Kirkwall in the Orkneys by Fourth-day, where all Scandinavian boats are held up thirty-six hours at least—and will hope to mail this, with other letters, there. We go to Bergen, thence by rail across Norway to Christiania and then on to Copenhagen.

ALL the readers of THE FRIEND, we presume, are familiar with the appeal for help in the East that has taken the form of a Presidential Proclamation. We have not printed the Proclamation, because we knew of its wide circulation through various channels, but we give place instead to a long letter from Emily Oliver, recently received at our office.—EDITORS.

PHILADELPHIA, Tenth Month 16, 1916.

DEAR FRIEND:—

In view of the appeal which President Wilson has issued, asking that a day should be set aside on which all who can may contribute to a fund for the relief of suffering Armenians and Syrians, may I tell thy readers something of what I have heard lately from American missionaries of the present state of Syria and the urgent need for help.

They left Beyrout on the twenty-sixth of Sixth Month and arrived here on the ninth of Eighth Month, having traveled across Asia Minor, Turkey, Bulgaria, Austria, Germany and Denmark to Norway, where they took ship for New York. This is now the only way of exit from Syria, as the whole coast is patrolled by battleships of the Allied fleets and no ships are calling at any of its ports.

My friends saw my husband the day they started and say he is well and still being treated with great kindness by all the Turkish officials and is free to go about his work as usual.

Through the help of influential friends in the Government, he is able to buy larger quantities of wheat and other foodstuffs than the ordinary allowance, which is small and very dear, and so can relieve the distress of the many suffering ones around him. Prices of many things are so high as to be almost prohibitive to any but the very rich, and, though the harvest has been good, the Government controls the supply and the people are kept on starvation allowances, and the flour they are supplied with is adulterated and unwholesome.

Even such a little thing as sewing cotton is so scarce that the women unravel their Irish lace, which was such a thriving industry before the war, in order to be able to mend or make their clothes.

The one request my husband makes through our friends is for money to be able to keep up the relief work for which there will be increasing need as time goes on.

I am thankful to report that $812 have already been contributed by kind friends in response to my former letter to thee, part of this amount was sent through the treasurer of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, but the greater part through the Department of State in Washington, which now seems to be the safest way to send.

The accounts we have read from time to time in the papers are unhappily, in the main, true, though Beyrout and other large towns have suffered more than the Lebanon.

Typhus and cholera are prevalent in many places and thousands have died and are still dying from starvation and disease. There are no drugs left with which to fight these epidemics and most of the able-bodied doctors are away with the army, so many of the sick are left without any treatment and often the dead and dying, too weak to crawl back home to die, may be seen lying along the roadside.

Many of the leading citizens of Beyrout, both Christians and Moslems, have been hung in the public square and others have been exiled with their families, or in some cases alone, to different places in the interior of the country.

If help on a large scale does not soon reach these poor sufferers it would seem as though the Syrian population must be decimated by starvation and disease, just as the Armenians have been by more drastic measures.

Let us all remember how much we owe to Syria and Palestine for the blessings of Christianity which we enjoy to-day, and may we in gratitude to God respond to the appeal, for as Paul wrote to the Romans—"if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, they owe it to them also to minister unto them in carnal things."

I am, thine sincerely,

EMILY OLIVER.

UNDER the title "The New Holy Office," or "Why I oppose Conscripting," the New York Evening Post prints in its magazine number of Tenth Month 7th the article by Norman Angell which was reported to have caused his arrest and imprisonment. These reports have not been confirmed, but the fact that they are in circulation indicates the increasing tension of public opinion in Great Britain.

The article in question is one of the most straightforward and calmly reasoned arguments against tyranny that has come to our notice. It shows that where a community is forced to become of "one mind on a given matter [it is in fact] on that matter mindless." Such reasoning as this which conclusions as these would have been accounted in England two years ago as plainly matter of fact. Norman Angell explains the great change that has taken place by saying, "And if we wonder how it is that not only sixty or seventy millions of people in the mass, but great scientists, teachers and theologians, as individuals, can subscribe to doctrines and support conduct which appears to the outside world as monstrous, it is merely because we have forgotten that any case, however monstrous, can be made to appear reasonable and acceptable, if we never hear anything that can be said against it."

On the principle of an ounce of prevention being worth a pound of cure we should hope our Peace agencies would be active in circulating this article in our country, where the sad contagion of "compulsory service" is being industriously injected into the veins of public opinion.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Provost Smith has announced the free public lecture course at Pennsylvania University for 1916-17, to be given in Houston Hall every Seventh-day afternoon at three o'clock. This is the fourth series of these lectures which were inaugurated by Dr. Smith as an experiment in 1912.

Alumni of the University of Pennsylvania are endeavoring to raise a fund of $200,000 as a gift to the University, to be used toward providing a permanent residence for its Provost. Half of this sum will be used toward the purchase price, alterations and equipment, and the income of the other half for maintenance.

The income of one-half of the estate valued at $5,000,000 left by Charles K. Smith, wealthy oil man and art patron of Philadelphia, is to be applied to the erection and support of mission churches in the United States and Mexico after the death of his son by the terms of his will.

GENERAL.—It is reported that the military course at Harvard has not proven popular. Less than 250 students have enrolled. Last year 1,100 men joined the regiment. A similar report comes from other colleges.

The South was rocked by earthquake and swept by storm at the same time on the 18th. While a tropical hurricane flayed the gulf coast, earth tremors overturned chimneys and frightened many people from their homes in Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee. The earthquake did little damage, but a wind that reached a velocity of 114 miles an hour lifted roofs from houses at Pensacola, Fla., and sank a number of vessels in the harbor. One life was lost.

The Lake Mohonk Conference on International Relations has announced conditions for its annual prize contest for the best essay on international arbitration written by an undergraduate of a college or university in the United States or Canada. The donor of the prize is Chester DeWitt Pugsley, of Peekskill, N. Y.

The Elephant Butte Dam, in New Mexico, completed recently at a cost of $5,000,000 and intended to impound the largest artificially retained body of water in the world, was dedicated on the 19th, with A. A. Jones, of New Mexico, personal representative of President Wilson, officiating.

As some indication of the wide-spread interest in dairy farming, a million dollars' worth of the finest dairy cattle on the American continent stood on dress parade in the thousand stalls of the two great stables of Springfield's new Eastern States Exposition last week.

A New England paper has the following: "The fact that 1000 students of the University at Syracuse, N. Y., are to earn their way this year in whole or in part is calculated to awaken the envy of the country colleges, where the opportunities for self-help are limited by the environment."

Japanese will be taught by Columbia for the first time in the current academic year. A course is being organized and the first class was to be held on the 10th.

This item seems to be from a reliable source: "Ambassador Gerard's reassuring statement concerning the reason for his present visit to the United States is most welcome. He denies emphatically that he came home at this time to serve notice on the President of Germany's intention to repudiate her pledges regarding the conduct of submarine warfare, or that Germany was contemplating the resumption of submarine attacks upon all kinds of shipping. He emphasizes his belief that our relations with Germany give promise of being on a friendly basis indefinitely."

FOREIGN.—It is said opinion among surgeons and nurses in England is practically unanimous in favor of the advantages of a new method of dressing large and painful wounds, whereby a thin layer of perforated celluloid is substituted for lint as the first covering for the raw wound. The plan was tried successfully first by Dr. Almoth Wright at St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, and now promises to become generally adopted.

Japan and Russia have entered protests against concessions for railway and canal construction in China which have been granted to Americans, says a dispatch from Peking. Prince Nicholas Koudacheff, the Russian minister to China, lodged a protest at the Chinese Foreign Office against the proposed American railroad from Fengcheng-Shansi Province to Lanchowfu in Kansu Province, alleging that the Chinese minister in Petrograd promised verbally 18 years ago that Russia should have the privilege of building railways in the vicinity of Mongolia.

THE FAMILY POINT OF VIEW.

Perhaps it is no less an authority than the great historian Gibbon who points out the fact that the failure of the home in Roman society was in large measure responsible for the fall of the empire. The cohesion of the parts of the otherwise almost perfect political machine was insufficient to hold it together without a centre of inspiration and hope in each man's family. In modern phrase this idea is often expressed by saying "the home is the unit of society," and much modern sociological work is thus directed to preserve or develop the home. A recent interesting article by Margaret Pennock in THE FRIEND presented ample illustration of the effectiveness of this effort. Much more insistent, however, than the historical and sociological claims for the family as a centre of attraction and radiation of good in human life are the claims of sentiment and religion. "Poet, philosopher and sage" have vied with one another to put these tenderest of all human feelings into appropriate and appealing phrase. One would be ambitious indeed to hope to make a contribution to these efforts at expression that would not seem to be poor reproductions at the best. That at least is not the object of this editorial.

Such intimate and far-reaching relationships as are involved in the family point of view, naturally enough make a model upon which larger units of society than the home are constructed. The theory of the old town meeting was very largely that the community was little more than an expanded family. Very particularly the organization of the Christian Church in apostolic times had the family for a model. Since that day churches and societies in one form and another have attempted to express this family idea. Hardly any Scripture phrase has a wider appeal than that in Eph. 3: 14-15 ["For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named"]. So it seems entirely clear that there is abundant religious background for the historical and sociological estimate of the value of the home.

In dealing with such basic ideas of human relationship as are involved in the family point of view it seems necessary often to remind ourselves that these relationships are subject to serious limitations as they become operative in either the smaller or larger spheres. Homes fail, in many cases even when they appear to be good homes, to save those concerned in them, and the home idea in religious and social circles does not in many instances yield the fruit which naturally belongs to it. Is there any easy analysis that will disclose the cause of this?

The intimate character of association in homes or in society on the home plan yields fruit of two distinct kinds. We become aware on the one hand of the gifts and graces of our circle, and on the other abundantly sensitive to their faults and failings. Much must depend therefore upon the measure of values we adopt as to the final outcome upon ourselves and upon others of our home environment. The dictum so well phrased by Professor William James becomes operative, "Real culture lives by sympathies and admirations not by dislikes and disdain." It is to be feared that much domestic happiness is seriously impaired by our sensitiveness to the faults that we observe in those nearest to us. We make these faults our measure of values. Very especially is this the case where the family circle widens into a society and as members of a group of a few hundred, or at the most a few thousand, we are close enough to one another to have first-hand knowledge of human limitations. The cultivation of brotherhood is of course an effort to realize the second commandment in practice. We encourage the good we discover but properly enough we wish to correct the limitations we observe. One of the robust thinkers of our day, John Ruskin, has these striking words on this subject, "You will find it less easy to uproot faults, than to choke them by gaining virtues. Do not think of your faults; still less of others' faults; in every person who comes near you look for what is good and strong: honor that; rejoice in it; and as you can, try to imitate it; and your faults will drop off, like dead leaves, when their time comes." The strict applicability of this excellent philosophy, even to the smallest family circle, will be found to be difficult, if we are bent on being "one another's helpers in the Lord," but the principle expressed is in line with the burden that has prompted this editorial. We could not possibly give a more valuable rule for self-restraint and self-improvement than this which we have quoted from John Ruskin. How to combine the principle of appreciation with the principle of right criticism in some of the larger family circles is the particular matter to which we would invite consideration.

Our Society of Friends as a whole and the several units of it are conducted on the family idea. We make a studied effort to be members one of another; after two centuries we have succeeded in establishing closest possible relationships. Every unit concerned in the system must therefore meet the strain of this specific understanding of the limitations as well as of the gifts of individuals. There can be no question that many breaks in our system and a considerable leakage of membership come as reactions or protests against such close family intimacy. This may be well illustrated by one unit, the schools of our system. Let us remember, however, that each of our units, every individual meeting, our combined meeting units, our committees, our boards of management have not only the merits but the limitations as well of a very unusual measure of first-hand acquaintance.

Nearly from the beginning of our history as a Society, we have been recognized as particularly gifted and capable in the conduct of our schools. This was no accident or incidental matter, as we may easily perceive. The home idea was practically always basic in these schools. Professor John Dewey is now the recognized voice of this idea and of the ideas associated with it, in what would perhaps be acknowledged as the most advanced pedagogy of our day. One reads his books in connection with the educational history of our Society with growing amazement. What seems to be the final word of educational philosophy at his hand has been in good degree a first word and a continuing word in our system. The value of the child as an individual and as a social unit has never been lost to view in our schools. True it is, as those who have been teachers well know, that in translating these ideas into practice we have made a situation of close relationships that might well rival the inner circle of the most highly perfected home. A very lime-light has beaten upon the Friends' school from every conceivable angle. The teachers are known—often most intimately known by all the patrons; children have grown up together or at least have had many points of association; members of committees have had all the advantages of intimate friendship with one another and with teachers. It were difficult to imagine a situation in which every gift and acquirement and advantage as well as every fault and foible and failing connected with a school could be more openly and more widely exposed. Now it is perfectly plain that success or failure in a case of this kind will depend upon the ability of those who are the leaders, in capitalizing the positive side of their resources. Indeed, it were not difficult to cite instances in which a skilful leadership has reversed an adverse judgment in regard to a school without any other radical change than that of emphasis. In a school, as in a family, faults must be dealt with, but is it not true that effectiveness in dealing with faults under such circumstances will depend in large measure upon a method in which the circle of those who must know of them is just as limited as possible? Let a school staff, or a school committee, or a school community; let a body of overseers or a large meeting committee or a whole meeting undertake to solve questions of personal dereliction and the danger of harm not to the individuals only, but to the body as a whole is very great indeed. One prominent schoolmaster in our city had so much feeling on this matter that he took the extreme position of saying that his teachers must not cultivate acquaintance in the circle of the school's patronage. This in part was a repudiation of the family idea. But we have seen modern educational theory approves the family idea. We need to learn how to cope with its difficulties and perhaps no general principle of doing so is more clear than that the smallest number possible of those concerned should deal with faults, and the largest number possible have a share in attainments and successes. This is by no means a plea thus to deceive ourselves or to deceive others. No family group, large or small, viewed from certain angles, will be free from faults. We know that. But the principle expressed in the quotation from Ruskin is an active, practical principle. Many faults will "drop off as dead leaves" before the growth of stimulated virtues.

The burden of our plea then is two-fold. In recognizing and approving the family point of view as the organizing principle of our Society's life, let us resolve that a right method of dealing with faults shall be more insisted upon, and let us, each one, give ourselves over to a much larger measure of appreciation of the multiplied gifts and virtues that are disclosed by our intimate association with one another. J. H. B.

BE FAITHFUL!

Familiar as these two words are to everyone of us, it is doubtful whether they are always understood in the depth and fullness of their significance and especially open to question if the double value of the word "faithful" is always borne in mind.

What is it to "be faithful?" First of all, of course, it is to be full of faith—filled with trust towards God, having our confidence firmly set in Him that doeth all things well, hard as it may be, sometimes, for us to understand, to see behind the veil of mystery, to know why. If we are "full of faith" we feel no need to question, when this thing happens, or that, which seems so beyond our human comprehension, which seems sometimes so unnecessary, so unreasonable, even. Faith is like a sound ship's cargo—to be filled with it is to ride the more steadily against the buffeting winds of false philosophies, the waves of doubt, the treacherous undercurrents of temptation.

Being faithful, then, is to be trustful, and being trustful leads in turn to faithfulness in its other aspect. What is a "faithful servant?" What does the Scripture mean, when it says: "This is a faithful saying?" A servant worthy of being trusted, a saying which is true—which is "worthy of all acceptance." To be faithful means able to be relied upon, dependable, trustworthy, faithfulness is still the synonym of the old fideltas.

To be faithful thus implies two things—first, something active, a putting of our trust; second, something passive, a worthiness of having trust reposed in us. One is as real as the other and the second is impossible without the first. To be trusted of God we must first have trusted Him. I have just now called this second aspect passive, but it leads to the reallest sort of activity. It has rested with me much of late that one great reason why some, who would rejoice at being given something greater to do for God, feel so helpless in spite of all the need they see around them, lies right here: We must trust God to do things for us, so that He may be able to trust us to do things for Him. Then only can He keep us "in perfect peace," and through our very weakness make perfect His strength. Lord, increase our Faith!

Oh, little child, lie still and sleep!
Jesus is near,
Thou need'st not fear!
No one need fear whom God doth keep,
By day or night;
So lay thee down in slumber deep
Till morning light.

Oh, little child, lie still and rest!
He sweetly sleeps
Whom Jesus keeps;
And in the morning wake so blest,
His child to be.
Love everyone, but love Him best;
He first loved thee.

"ENTER INTO THY CLOSET."

I need not leave the jostling world,
Or wait till daily tasks are o'er,
To fold my palms in secret prayer
Within the close-shut closet door.

There is a viewless, cloistered room,
As high as heaven, as fair as day,
Where, though my feet may join the throng,
My soul can enter in and pray.

And never through those crystal walls
The clash of life can pierce its way,
Nor ever can a human ear
Drink in the spirit-words I say.

One hearkening, even, cannot know
When I have crossed the threshold o'er;
For He alone, who hears my prayer,
Has heard the shutting of the door.

THE STORY OF BALAAM.

"A DRAMA OF THE RUIN OF CONSCIENCE."

Balaam, the son of Beor of Pethor, a native of the country of Aram by the river Euphrates, is one of the most mysterious characters brought before us for our consideration in the Holy Scriptures. Though this far-off Mesopotamian lived thousands of years ago, under social, political, as well as religious conditions so very different to our own, valuable lessons may still be gathered from a study of his life and character. After all, essential human nature has not changed since his day—neither time nor distance has made any difference in its elemental passions, temptations, sorrows or joys. The top soil may have changed, but the bed-rock underneath has remained what it was thousands of years ago.

Balaam was one of the most extraordinary characters that have ever appeared amidst the kaleidoscopic changes of human history. The unique nature of his gifts made him a very eminent man in his age, a fascinating subject for the recorder's pen. Endowed with political sagacity, he was a close observer of contemporary events. He took a keen interest in the future of the neighboring peoples, the great monarchies of central Asia. He even took in the significance of the coming of the navies of the Western powers to contribute their share towards the settlement of the everlasting Eastern question. If Balaam lived to-day—even if he were not a member of any cabinet of state—he would certainly have to be consulted in any matter of grave moment affecting the happiness and, political fortunes of his country.

Another thing we have to consider. Balaam, though not a member of the chosen race of Israel, was in possession of a great fundamental truth. Living in the midst of polytheistic cults he believed in the One God. It is true he held his belief inconsistently. But in spite of the fact that he tried to combine with it the practices of pagan spiritualism, he held to his monotheistic faith as the pivot of all his religious thinking. To-day he would have been a prominent member of the Society for psychical research along with Sir Oliver Lodge and the late Professor William James.

But that which appealed to the mind of Balaam more than anything else was the phenomenon of Israel; and for that reason he has a place in the Hebrew Scriptures. He made no mistake in his reading of the significance of the arising of this young virile nation, which had for its choicest treasure the deposit of the faith and traditions of the patriarchs. Balaam knew of the Divine promises that were to be fulfilled in and through their seed. In his judgment Israel was the nation of destiny.

But not only was Balaam endowed with remarkable insight above many—he was also in possession of the mysterious gift of prophecy. He foresaw the coming of the Messiah, the Star that was to come out of Jacob and the Sceptre that was to arise out of Israel. His eyes filled with light from on high pierced the veil of the unborn future, and he described under figures of poetical elevation the setting up of His spiritual Kingdom. No wonder that the destinies of the nation which was called into existence to give Him to the world should have afforded Balaam such an absorbing theme for investigation.

That God should go outside the fold of Israel for channels of inspiration need not surprise us. Only a narrow theology would confine Him to the institutions of His own creation. The Scriptures abound with instances of the universality of spiritual operations. Melchizedek, chieftain of Jerusalem when it was the stronghold of the Jebusites, stood in priestly relations with the Most High God, and Abram gave him the honor of the tithes, bowing his head under his priestly benediction. Job knew nothing of Israel, and yet there was none like him on the earth for piety towards God, and the deepest questions of religious philosophy are discussed in his book. The doctrine of the Divine sovereignty has been wrongly applied by those who have interpreted it in an exclusive sense. Properly understood it teaches the Divine right to chose whom He will—even Gentiles outside the covenants of promise, as Paul argued in the dispensational parenthesis of Roman ix to xii.

But Balak, the King of Moab, merely regarded Balaam as a very powerful wizard whom he could use as a weapon of offence against Israel, the young nation of which he was genuinely afraid. He shared the common belief of his time that a curse, especially if it come from the lips of one who has great influence with the Deity, possesses a malign power. He had not the view-point of one who regards religion from the inside. Statesmen are apt to make a cynical use of the religious instincts of the people for their own ambitious designs. History furnishes numberless examples of this. Religion—whether true or false—has been made the ally of politics and statecraft. It is the result of looking at it only from the outside. Jeroboam, after the separation from the southern kingdom, made this mistake when he as a matter of political prudence established the calf-worship at Bethel and Dan, to prevent his people going to Jerusalem, to the national sanctuary of the undivided kingdom. Thus the way was opened for worse evils, and he even afterwards had a tag attached to his name as the man "who caused Israel to sin."

Balak was exceedingly anxious to enlist the assistance of a man with the international reputation of Balaam. He endeavored to persuade him to make use of his occult powers against the people which he regarded as a military menace. He sent a deputation to his distant home, with the Oriental bribes of divination in their hands. The effort ended in failure. He tried again, sending a more influential deputation made up of the princes of Moab and Midian, charged to make most flattering proposals. He evidently thought Balaam was only bargaining for a bigger fee. He was sufficient man of the world to hold the cynical doctrine that every man has his price. This time Balaam only consented to accompany the Moabite and Midianite princes back to their land without committing himself to do the bidding of Balak to curse Israel.

The whole transaction opens a window into the real character of this man. It is a subject which has often been the theme of discussion. The early Church devoted a good deal of attention to it and appears to have been divided into two camps of opinion. St. Augustine, for instance, regarded Balaam as a thoroughly bad man, a prophet of the devil, compelled by God to utter truths against his will. St. Jerome, on the other hand, held a somewhat different theory. He believed Balaam to have been at heart a good man, a true prophet, but one who fell through allowing himself to be hypnotized by the temptations of avarice and worldly ambition.

The probability is that the truth lies somewhere between these two extremes. He appears to me to have been all along a man of mixed strands in his inner life. He had a certain knowledge of the true God, and a clear sense of his duty based on this knowledge. He knew enough of God not to wish to trifle with Him. He would not have gone with the ambassadors of Balak without the Divine permission obtained in answer to prayer. But see how he acts. After receiving a plain command not to entertain the tempting offer of his royal client, he goes and prays about it again, as if it were still an open question. And behold the awful result! God answered him according to the secret desire of his heart.

EDITOR FRIEND:—

As a conclusion to the proceedings of the Mohonk Conference, held from eighteenth to twentieth, inclusive, and which was of very great interest, the following was adopted.

E. M. WISTAR.

PLATFORM OF THE THIRTY-FOURTH ANNUAL LAKE MOHONK CONFERENCE ON THE INDIAN AND OTHER DEPENDENT PEOPLES, 1916.

The Thirty-fourth Annual Lake Mohonk Conference on the Indian and Other Dependent Peoples recommends that the number of hospitals for the Indian service be increased and urges improvement of sanitary conditions where they are at present seriously deficient, and further recommends an increase of the annual appropriation by Congress for the educational facilities among the Navajos. The Conference wishes also to set its approval upon the progress made in industrial and vocational education and in health conditions.

We heartily commend the work of the various Christian missionary bodies, which are now more than ever before exhibiting a higher degree of co-operation in meeting the spiritual needs and longings of the Indian.

The Conference deplores the fact that the continued uncertainty as to the legal status of the Indians of the State of New York causes serious injury to their industrial, intellectual and moral advancement and prevents the enforcement of the laws of the State relating to vice and crime, the public health and education. It is a matter of congratulation that an able investigation into this legal status has been recently made by a Deputy Attorney General of the State. We recommend that the results of this investigation be submitted to the Department of Justice of the National Government for its consideration and also that Congress be requested to pass a broad enabling act, under which the State of New York may enact all needful legislation for the improvement of these Indians and the benefit of the State. The Conference makes this specific recommendation because of the exceptional historic and legal situation of those Indians.

The ultimate solution of the perplexing Indian problem will be reached only when the Indians by an academic, industrial and moral education have been prepared to receive all the privileges and assume all the duties of American citizenship. Until that time such Indians as are not so prepared are the wards of the nation. The nation is in duty bound to protect their rights, promote their interests, and provide for their education. Experience has proved that it is fulfilled very imperfectly and under great disadvantages by special legislation enacted to meet special exigencies and administered by a Bureau whose head changes with every change in the national administration. A permanent, stable, and developing policy is essential. We therefore urge the creation of a non-partisan, independent commission, permanent in its character, which should make a careful examination of the mass of Indian legislation on our statute books, much of it local and fragmentary, and from it develop an Indian law, general in its provisions, comprehensive in its policy, forward looking in its purpose. Such law, when enacted by the Congress, should take the place of all existing legislation except permanent treaties, and thereafter the administration of this law and the application of its principles to the varying conditions of the various tribes should be left by the Congress to the commission, to which should be committed the entire charge of the Indian service. We urge this plan, not only to secure greater economy and efficiency, but also to promote a consistent, continuing and developing policy—a need recognized as of the utmost importance by all workers in the Indian service. The ultimate object of this policy should be to bring the present abnormal condition of the Indian to an end as speedily as possible by the incorporation of the Indian in the general citizenship of the nation.

Until the reorganization of the work for the Indian upon the principles above outlined, we deprecate as unwise and dangerous legislation which will remove all authority respecting our Western Indians from the control and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The policy of all Indian administration should include at the earliest possible date the segregation and individualization of Indian tribal property, in order that competent Indians may have available immediately all resources to which they are entitled and that they may be completely severed from the guardianship of the Government.

We urge that immediate steps be taken by the enactment of new legislation or otherwise, further to protect all incompetent Indians, especially the full bloods, in order that their property rights may be conserved and their resources expended for their benefit under proper supervision, looking to the correction of the flagrant abuses now rampant as particularly brought to our attention as existing among the Five Civilized Tribes and the Osages.

During the present year a larger measure of autonomous government has been granted the Filipino people by act of Congress, giving to them greater control over their internal affairs.

It is self-evident that so long as the Philippine Islands remain under the sovereignty of the United States, the government of the United States must continue to be responsible for good government and efficient and economical administration in the islands. It is equally clear that the wise exercise of authority must go hand in hand with such responsibility. The effect of the rapid withdrawal of American administrators, in anticipation of, and coincident with, this legislation, will be watched with unusual interest but not without misgiving. We believe that the policy of dispensing with the services of trained experts and scientists will have a far-reaching and harmful effect upon the sanitary, social and economic life of the islands.

We therefore urge that these necessary aids to the welfare of the people of the islands be not abandoned.

We reaffirm the recommendation of the Conference of last year that an immediate grant of full American citizenship be made to the people of Porto Rico.

PENN. COLLEGE.—Friends will be interested to know that the prospects for Penn College for the coming year are much brighter than it would have been possible to expect a few weeks ago. At the close of last year the burning of the building and the uncertainty of success in our financial campaign caused a great deal of concern. This uncertainty persisted until the campaign was brought to a successful issue, Eighth Month 1st. Since that time, however, a certainty has taken possession of all friends of the institution. Students are planning to return with scarcely an exception and there is an excellent prospect for a large freshman class.

"THERE is a time when our youth of both sexes, need not simply a salutary molding influence, but when they need a mighty power put forth upon them, rousing their souls to great and noble deeds of benevolence.

Let a lady once become settled down at the head of her own family with a narrow soul, and however amiable and lovely she may be, a narrow soul she will carry with her to the grave."—MARY LYON.

THE PSALM OF THE WOODSMAN.

Blessed is the man that loveth nature,
For he shall never be lonely!
Yea, though he loseth himself in the forest
He is still in the midst of friends.

The trees stretch their arms in protection;
They invite him under their shelter.
Their roots take hold of the mountain
Like the stakes of a tent set firmly.

The moss on the bark is a compass
To tell him whither he goeth;
It points his direction as surely
As the guide-board out on the highway.

The winds and the clouds are his servants;
He knoweth their course in the season.
Yea, the tree turns its face from the tempest,
So the burdens of branches is southward.

The beasts and the birds are his comrades;
He knoweth their signs and their habits.
He knoweth their challenge of anger,
And their milder language of mating.

The rivulet calls him with laughter,
And the pool is his only mirror,
He looks, and the beard on his bosom
Is blended with moss on the cedars.

He knoweth the roots that are wholesome,
And the edible barks and the berries—
The camas that holdeth no poison,
The celery and rice of the lakelets.

Yea, blessed the man of the mountains!
And thrice blessed is he if he follows
The trail that leads over the summit
On the highway to regions immortal.

The years hang as light on his shoulders
As the grizzled wings of the eagle,
They are only fanciful burdens,
For they help him to fly away.

His is the calling courageous.
He blazed the trail for his children,
His footprints are waymarks of safety,
And his bones are a guide to the living.

EFFECT OF THE WAR ON CHILDREN AND EDUCATION IN ENGLAND.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

At first sight it would hardly seem that a state of war would directly damage child life or national education. Here are a few considerations upon the subject. But let it be clearly understood that in most respects England is probably the least hit of all the belligerents. These letters are not intended to discredit England—the writer loves that grand old country too much to do that. They do indicate the unhappy transformation in character induced by the spirit of war. Our own beloved America may easily be just as seriously injured if we became involved in war. We may well thank God that we have not entered into its hideous passions and losses.

"The United Board of Sunday School Organizations" has recently issued a remarkable statement regarding children and international relations. This Board is composed of representatives from the Denominational Organizations of the Methodist Bodies, Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, the Society of Friends, and Moravians.

The report shows that there are statistics revealing an increase in juvenile crimes of a serious nature since the outbreak of the war. Thus—Cecil M. Chapman, the Metropolitan Magistrate, when taking the statistics of the Police Court over which he presides, found that during the last few months of 1915 delinquency in children had increased forty per cent. He says: "War had created an excitement in the minds of the children", etc. Sir Edward Troup, Permanent Under-Secretary at the Home Office, in a circular to the magistrates, issued this year, says that he "has under consideration representations respecting the recent increase in the number of offences by children and young persons under sixteen years of age." He declares that "punishable offences have grown in seventeen of the largest towns of England about forty per cent." He adds: "The increase in the number of juvenile offenders is mainly caused by an increase of nearly fifty per cent. in cases of larceny; but there are also more charges of assault, malicious damage, gaming and offences against educational acts." The report of the United Board refers to the "loss of discipline," which the writer also heard about in many places in England during the past summer. This condition is largely owing to the fathers being away, and to lessened educational efficiency, caused by larger classes for each teacher, part time sessions or leaving school at an earlier age. Sir James Yoxall has stated that "between 150,000 and 200,000 children between the ages of eleven and thirteen have been released from school to do wartime work." To quote the same veracious report—"With the older boys and girls particularly, there are evils attendant upon the earning of large wages—impatience of control, unwillingness to learn how to do things in the best possible way, and the rush to amusements which have the same general tendency. There is an unsettled state of mind leading to a desire for adventure, for excitement, with its attendant impatience with ordinary tasks and with discipline, accompanied by a great increase in truancy."

Not the least serious of the difficulties to child life growing out of the war is the fact that children are inevitably learning to rely upon material forces, and not upon the power of love, unselfishness and consideration for others. "The type of patriotism too often presented to the children is narrow and self-satisfied. . . . Religion has become the handmaid of the Allies. To sum briefly: the virtues of economy, generosity, etc., that have been evoked among the pupils have been entirely subordinate to the major military purpose. Militarism has emphatically made a deep impression upon all young minds." The anxiety of this noble group of men, representing the First-day School Organization, on behalf of the children of the nation is most important when taken in connection with the general attitude of the clergy of the country toward the war.

Occasionally when in England I have astonished my friends by telling them of the great strides that education has made in the United States. I can mention my own city of San José, Cal., with its some 40,000 inhabitants, its great system of grammar schools, its high school for 1500 young people, and how many of them can graduate from it into the State University, securing a course in that great institution with but little expense to themselves. It would seem as if England before the war was already so far behind many nations with regard to the education of the great mass of its children that the damage occasioned by the war is especially to be deplored. The London Times stated in a recent editorial that "Of the 2,750,000 English children between twelve and sixteen only 1,100,000 get any education after the age of thirteen." The Challenge states: "As a nation we have not believed in education, and it is one of our most serious national shortcomings that this should have been so. The facts are well enough known, ninety per cent. of our children receive no form of instruction after the age of thirteen." Lord Haldane, in a recent speech in the House of Lords, called attention to the conditions narrated above as one of the main concerns of the country.

The future of the children and of education in England is very dark. Just before leaving England I was conversing with a lady from Oxford. Speaking of the depletion caused to the student life by the war she instanced the college in which she was interested. Before the last vacation only thirteen men were left as students there, they being six Orientals, two Rhodes scholars, one candidate for the ministry, and the status of the other four I cannot recall. About the same time I talked with a young man who is a recent graduate of Cambridge University. He remarked to me, "All the best men have been killed—all of my friends have been killed."

The Government could use conscientious objectors as teachers if so minded, but declines to do so. It seems particularly unfortunate, as so many of the schools are suffering for want of teachers. Even such a man as Professor Bertrand Russell, one of the best-known educators of England, has had many indignities placed upon him and has been refused the privilege of coming to America to lecture, because he not long ago was the author of a leaflet published by the No-conscription Fellowship, in which he pleaded for the cause of civil and religious liberty—the great glory of our English-speaking peoples.

In my next letter I shall try to tell about the "Conscientious Objectors." Owing to strict censorship bearing upon the subject, very little is known about them in other countries.

NEST HUNTING AT POCONO LAKE.

JOHN D. CARTER.

The following was presented at a recent camp-fire at Pocono Lake, with a most picturesque setting.

Many years ago, before there was any Pocono Lake Preserve, a party of campers raised their tents between the pointed spruces near the Club-house. Within a short time they discovered alder fly-catchers among the bushes by the lake-side, white-throated sparrows in the clearings and red crossbills, busily pulling cones to pieces. And so it dawned upon them that here was a rare spot indeed, with an avifauna unlike that of any other part of Pennsylvania, except the North Mountain country beyond Wilkes-Barre. Since that day, the Pocono Lake district has been a fruitful field for bird-study.

The birds themselves may be found rather easily, if one has a trained ear, good eyes and tireless patience. But with their nests it is different. Small wonder, indeed! Imagine the country back of Lowry's Hill. In a thousand acres of brush there may be a little wisp of straw, lined with a bunch of rootlets. Even that may be so hidden that you cannot see it until you go down on your knees and look under a stone. That may be the nest you want. Can you find it?

Of course, all that is needed in finding a nest is to look in the right place. The trouble comes from the fact that the places which are not right are numbered by ten thousand times ten thousand. So the problem resembles the old one of the needle in the haystack.

Suppose you do accept the challenge and start the search. Naturally you should know something before you begin. It is quite useless to hunt for a flicker's nest in a grass-field, although that is where the bird may be found. Kingfishers do not nest on dead twigs, although that is where they are often seen.

Equipped with at least some knowledge, and the more the better, you cut a stick and start out. What's the stick for, do you ask? It helps in going through thick places, and in parting foliage, it lengthens your reach in all directions, it saves your back and legs a deal of labor, and perhaps most important of all, it concentrates your vision.

It is usually best to decide beforehand what you most desire to find and then try for that, hoping to find other things on the way. You may pass along rapidly, covering much ground superficially, or you may go more slowly, examining everything carefully. Each person must find out the best method for his own use.

An attractive feature of bird study afield is that you never know what is going to happen nor when it will begin. As your stick passes over a brushy place, there may be a rustling within. You stop motionless, for if you fail to identify the little mother in the first few seconds after she leaves the nest, you may have a long and weary wait before she returns. You see nothing, so move your body from side to side without shifting your feet. Nothing happens. You stoop down and gently part the leaves. Ah, there it is!—A hop-toad!

Again something goes darting away along the ground. You expect a grouse to rise on whirring wings. Just as it disappears, a flash of white shows that it was a half-grown rabbit. But it is not always thus. Sometimes you find yourself looking into gaping mouths which rise above a mass of pin-feathers. Or if the nestlings are nearly ready to leave, they may suddenly pour out almost into your face and scatter to the four winds, with great excitement on the part of the parents. Or you may see the spotted eggs of a chewink, the clouded ones of a white-throated sparrow, or the beautiful blue-green treasure of a hermit thrush.

Again, after hours of fruitless search, your stick may uncover a few stalks of dry grass, lying side by side, and curved to form the arc of a small circle. The innate forces of nature do not often place things just that way. You look more closely; a tiny bit of green moss can be seen. Yes, it must be a nest. You stoop down and peep under the stick that nearly hides it. There are the four delicate eggs of some warbler. At least you have beaten Nature at her own game of hide and seek. You have found the needle in the haystack and you are happy.

Have you ever noticed that the grackles here do not seem like those at home? There they walk about on the lawns, bother the corn fields and the robins and eat the cherries. Here they are found near the lake and, for the most part, only where there are old stumps standing in the water. At home they nest in the spruce trees. Where are the nests here? Suppose you go to one of the stumpy tracts. Birds are plenty, but no nests are in sight. Looking about among the weather-beaten stubs, you may notice the least bit of yellowish discoloration on the lower rim of a cavity. What does that mean? Probably nothing,—but you take a chance and climb up. Imagine your satisfaction at seeing, away down inside, the blue-gray and streaked eggs of the bronzed grackle.

Again, suppose you are determined to find the nest of the alder flycatcher. It must be somewhere in a bush. You may, as some have done ere this, look for hours and days and not find it, and do the same thing the next season with the same result, until you are tempted to think that it does not have any nest at all, but carries its eggs under its wings. But on a lucky day, you find hidden among the leaves of a viburnum, a few pieces of straw that could not have gotten there by accident. The chestnut-sided warbler might have put them there; but they do not seem like just his kind. You come back next day and find that the thing is growing. No birds appear to have any interest in it whatever. At last, remembering what is said about "the early bird and the worm," you come soon after sunrise and watch. The flycatcher is working at her trade some distance away. Gradually she comes nearer, and at last settles in the nest, twists about for a second, and darts away. The game is won and the alder flycatcher resumes its normal place among birds.

In a certain spot, the location of which is not widely published, the sphagnum moss grows in mounds. You may be searching there, with the shrill song of the Nashville warbler cutting the stillness every few minutes. Suddenly, a little bird darts out from under your feet. Yes, there is the nest, buried in the side of a mound of moss. Surely it must be the nest of the Nashville warbler, for nothing else is about, and it looks all right. The camera is focussed on the nest, and while you are under your cloth the bird comes back. At the click of the shutter she darts away again; you go home, develop the plate, make a beautiful-colored slide, and show it to all the learned bird people in five States as a Nashville warbler on her nest.

Another year you are in the same place again. You notice a little call of two syllables, a sort of double cluck, and a thin little whistle. The yellow-bellied flycatcher makes them both. You watch and see it go to just such a nest as the one you photographed years before. The ghost of a suspicion rises in your mind. At the first opportunity you take out your plate, and sure enough, find that your Nashville warbler was a flycatcher, perfect in every detail, except for the colors which you put where they did not belong.

One more illustration. As you pick your way along a path, wet with spongy moss, you happen to look up and there in the hanging twigs beneath a spruce bough, is a bunch of something. Can it be the kinglet's nest which you have hunted for days together? The field glasses show that it is of different material from its surroundings. You scramble up the tree, and then can't see it at all. The foliage has shut it in completely. Your partner on the ground indicates the branch. With legs wrapped about the tree-trunk and toes hooked under other limbs, you reach as far out as you can and pull. The branch is stubborn, but it does yield. Watching carefully lest the precious little basket should be overturned, you work your hands further and further out along the branch and slowly draw it around. The bunch really is a nest of wonderful workmanship. Inside are the eggs like little white pebbles, so far as you know, you are the first person who ever looked into a kinglet's nest in the whole State of Pennsylvania.

The nests have not all been found yet. The field is open; the woods are free to all. Let us pay the price and enter Nature's treasure-house.

POSITION OF "CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS"

BY AN ENGLISHMAN.

The strict censorship maintained by the English Government, not only over the newspapers and letters which are allowed to leave England, but also over the matter which is allowed to be printed in any newspaper or other publication appearing in that country, has to a large extent prevented the truth with regard to the treatment of conscientious objectors to military service from becoming known in this country, or even to the full extent in England.

When the first Military Service act was passed, it was provided that any man who had a conscientious objection to the undertaking of military service might apply to the tribunals set up under the act for exemption. The tribunals had power to grant total exemption in all genuine cases, and it was their duty so to do. What followed was a painful travesty of justice. The tribunals set up all over the country were composed of local men appointed by the local authority (e. g., the Town Council). Many of them were uneducated men, with no knowledge or experience of judicial proceedings, and often ignorant of the terms of the act they were appointed to administer. Frequently the chairmen of the tribunals were local tradesmen, sometimes the local Mayor.

The tribunals no sooner began to sit than they showed themselves hostile and unfair to all who came before them to claim exemption on the grounds of conscience. There was not even a pretence of impartiality. The claimants were insulted, bullied, and held up to public odium. They were rarely granted total exemption. Sometimes they were granted exemption from combatant duties, and placed in a newly formed "non-combatant" corps to perform such duties as trench digging and military work other than the actual use of arms.

A few typical examples of the treatment of conscientious objectors by the tribunals may be cited. One chairman sat with an open Bible before him.

"Don't you know," he would say to the applicants who appeared before him, "that Christianity means war? The Old Testament is full of fighting."

Another member of a tribunal asked an applicant who based his objection upon religious grounds whether he had never heard of the Divine command, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." Other tribunals frequently asked applicants whether Christ had not declared that He came to bring war into the world, quoting the text, "I came not to send peace but a sword." Ultimately a series of questions were adopted by a great number of the tribunals, which consisted of inquiries as to how claimants would act in certain fantastic situations.

The inevitable result followed. The men who were refused exemption or who were placed in the so-called non-combatant corps refused to accept the judgment of the tribunals. They did not cease being conscientious objectors because the tribunals had flouted them and refused them exemption. Some few did indeed join the non-combatant corps, but the great majority went quietly on with their work and awaited developments. In due course they were arrested. Up to the present time over 2,000 have been arrested and the arrests continue daily. The men are first taken before the magistrates, who invariably fine them and hand them over to a military escort.

When in the hands of the army the conscientious objectors immediately become "passive resisters." In some cases they have been subjected to very abominable cruelties. They were forcibly stripped and scrubbed over the naked body with hard brushes in such a way as to produce extreme agony. They were kicked into position on the parade ground. When they would not march they were dragged along the ground. Other and more cruel methods were sometimes resorted to.

In a few cases, men who were broken in mind and body by this treatment gave up their resistance and consented to obey orders. The great majority stood firm. As the details of their treatment gradually became known there was widespread indignation. In Parliament there were many heated debates, and ultimately it was announced that steps had been taken forbidding any unauthorized physical punishments. The men who continued to resist were court-martialed and sentenced to varying terms of imprisonment with hard labor, usually two years. Some who had been sent to France were condemned to death, the sentence being commuted to ten years' penal servitude.

But these actions by the authorities provoked strong action in the House of Commons. A considerable group of members belonging to the Liberal and Labor parties protested day by day against the treatment of the conscientious objectors. The subject was debated at every opportunity. The better elements in public life also protested, and distinguished conservatives like Lord Hugh Cecil joined in the protest. The Prime Minister was at length forced to act, and announced that the cases of all the men who had been court-martialed would be reviewed by the Central Appeal Tribunal (the final tribunal which had the power to revise the decisions of the local tribunals), and that men who were regarded as conscientious objectors by this tribunal would be given the option of accepting civil work of national importance, subject to certain conditions. This scheme of sifting by the Central Tribunal has since been proceeding, the members of the Tribunal visiting the various jails where the prisoners were confined for the purpose, and a number of the men who were offered their liberty if they would accept work of national importance have been released. They have been sent to civil camps to make roads, to work at agriculture, or to do any other work which the authorities order. It is a kind of forced penal labor, but under civil control, and the scheme has already been attended by a painful tragedy.

A man of gentle and refined character, but of delicate physique, was sent to a camp in a far away country district. No proper arrangements existed. The rain came through the tents, the ground was sodden. There was no medical supervision. The man contracted pneumonia and died before it was possible to obtain any sort of medical aid. At the moment there is an insistent demand for a public inquiry to be held into the facts of the case.

But this scheme of civil labor, even if it could be properly organized and relieved of its degrading conditions, does not meet, and never can meet, the cases of a great number of the conscientious objectors who have refused this alternative service. They cannot compound their consciences and assist in the civil organization of the nation for war as the price of their release from military service. Their position is exactly the same as would have been that of Lloyd-George if conscription had been introduced in England at the time of the Boer War. Of that war he was a bitter opponent, and at one meeting he narrowly escaped losing his life at the hands of the mob. He demanded the stoppage of the war, and his speeches during the war are models of invective against the Government of the day—eloquent, bitter, fiercely uncompromising. He was of military age. If conscription had been adopted, and the policy he now supports in England had been carried out, he would have been arrested and handed over to the military authorities. When they had finished with him, and he had ultimately found his way into prison, he would have been offered conditional release if he were willing to give up his profession as a solicitor, to refrain from speaking in public, and from writing anything for publication or circulation, and to work with a gang of other men as a road-repairer, or an agricultural laborer, or a dustman. For these are the terms offered to the spiritual children of Lloyd-George to-day.

The result is a deplorable tragedy. The men who have refused these terms are to-day in cells, suffering hard labor or penal servitude. They include some of the bravest, most gentle and most noble of men. Two examples may be given:

Before the war Scott Duckers was a well known and greatly respected solicitor in London. He was a man of brilliant attainments and of great public spirit, and devoted much of his time to social work among the poor. He had always preached against the evil of war, and his views were well known. When the Military Service act was passed he became a conscript. He was arrested, brought before the magistrates, and handed over to a military escort. He refused to obey orders, and was court-martialed. He was sentenced to a term of imprisonment. When this was finished, he was liberated from the cells and handed back to the military authorities. The same wretched business was begun over again. He steadfastly refused to become a soldier. He remained gentle and courteous. He was again court-martialed, and sentenced to a further term of imprisonment with hard labor. This he is undergoing at the present moment.

Or take another instance: Clifford Allen was the chairman of the No-Conscription Fellowship—an organization formed before the introduction of conscription, consisting of men of military age, who were opposed on grounds of conscience to forced military service. Clifford Allen is a man of great distinction, a scholar, and a social reformer. In appearance he looks physically delicate, but he is fearless in the cause in which he believes.

He appeared before the tribunal, who, to do them justice, were satisfied that he was a conscientious objector. As, however, he refused to accept alternative service or to cease preaching the principles of international peace, he was ultimately arrested and handed over to the military authorities. A little later he was sentenced by a court-martial to a year's imprisonment, with hard labor, and he is now undergoing that sentence.

These instances could be multiplied indefinitely.

But it must not be supposed that this conduct on the part of the Government and the military authorities has been allowed without protest. Among all the better elements of public life in England there is a growing feeling that the honor of the country is at stake. The expression of this feeling is repressed in every way possible, but it will ultimately compel a change of policy.

Perhaps the most sinister feature of the whole of this tragedy has been the conduct of the clergy of the English Church. They are themselves excepted from the provisions of the Military Service act, but they have preached conscription from their pulpits and have held up the conscientious objectors to ridicule.

"Conscription," said one dean of the Church, "was a step towards the Higher Life."

But the most remarkable utterances were made by the Bishop of London. He opposed giving exemption to conscientious objectors. He said that what mattered was not whether they had consciences or not. Their consciences had got to be educated. This was the claim made by the Holy Inquisition in Spain, and they used the rack and the stake for the work of "education." But the change in public opinion is to some extent seen in the attitude of the people in the streets of London to the Bishop of London. In connection with the (so-called) National Union of Repentance and Hope, the Bishop has made a walking tour through London, addressing the passing crowds at various points. Exhorting his hearers to follow the example of Christ, he declared that the conscientious objectors were "all wrong" and heaped contempt upon them. At the end of his first address he invited and was bombarded with hostile questions. At his later meetings he profited by his experience and declined to allow any questions to be put to him, suggesting that they should be sent "by post," but this device to avoid answering his critics after the pretence of welcoming them was received with cold contempt.

To those who believe in the sanctity of the human conscience and who think that the words of the Prince of Peace in the Sermon on the Mount were intended not as satire, but as a rule of life alike for individuals and for nations, the action of the clergy of the English Church in denouncing the sincere men who with deep humility attempted to apply their faith in their own lives in the face of mob passion remains an inexplicable mystery.

WESTTOWN NOTES.—The delay of four weeks in the opening of the School has resulted in a marked decrease in the enrollment for the year. Although there were about the usual number on the list in Eighth Month we opened on Tenth Month 10th with but 93 boys and 97 girls.

On Eighth Month 1st Wm. B. and Frances E. Harvey withdrew from their positions as Superintendent and Matron after ten years of efficient service. Thomas K. Brown is now the general head of the School, while the executive duties formerly performed by the Superintendent have been assumed by E. Dean Stanton under the title of Business Manager.

Mary R. Williams, with Mary J. Edgerton as her assistant, has returned to Westtown to serve as Matron.

The daily program is in several respects different from that of last year. There are six recitation periods a day instead of seven. The four morning periods are followed by a half hour for consultation between teachers and students. Lunch is served in the middle of the day and dinner in the evening. This shortening of the school day has lengthened the free time for games in the afternoon, and has also necessitated uninterrupted evenings for study. To eliminate distractions during the week as far as possible the Literary Union now holds its meetings on Seventh-day evening. Other literary societies and student organizations are held on Seventh-day evenings or in the half-hour interval between dinner and the evening study hour, while lectures are scheduled for the hour before dinner on Sixth-day.

The boys greatly appreciate the changes that have been made in the Collecting-room through the generosity of the W. O. S. A. The walls have been attractively painted, a maple floor has been laid, and new desks and other furnishings have replaced the old ones.

The work of wiring the teachers' houses down The Lane for electric lights is completed and the four lights along "The Granolithic" seem entirely adequate.

Albert H. Brown, head of the Friends' School in Hobart, Tasmania, recently spent parts of two days at the School. On the second evening of his visit he gave a very interesting and illuminating account of Australian Friends, of their school and of the conditions in which they live.

William C. Allen stirred many hearts when, on the evening of the fifteenth, he told the School of the present struggles and persecution of the Friends in England who refuse to take arms. He appealed for faithfulness on our part to the teachings of Christ when our testing time comes, and warned us that the growth of militarism in this country is bringing that time very close.

On the evening of the 28th the Alumni Association had a supper at the Lake House, the chief entertainment for the evening being an address by Thomas Mott Osborne on "Prison Reform Work." Besides members of the Alumni and the School family, several invited guests availed themselves of the privilege of hearing him.

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND.—Definite reference was made in a recent FRIEND to the Teachers' Retirement Fund. It is no new project, having been before the mind of Friends and others for many months, and having received the cordial endorsement of the Yearly Meeting last spring.

The actual campaign for funds has now been undertaken and we are at liberty to report that promises aggregating $30,000, with a pretty definite promise of $10,000 also in sight have been received.

Friends who have been visited show a warm interest in the undertaking. The calls for help abroad are so many and so insistent that it might seem to argue the present were a poor time to launch this scheme; we believe, however, that our duty to neither of the causes, nor yet to the many others that claim the thought of the generous donor will be neglected.

The Teachers' Retirement Fund is one of the most far-reaching undertakings that Friends have entered upon, it is not a plan simply to make the teachers' calling an easier and therefore a more attractive one; at the root of it will be found the thought that young men and women of rare natural endowments will feel that the profession offers what it has never been able to offer before.

We hope from time to time to keep our readers informed of the work of the committee and commend them and their cause to the generous consideration of all.—[EDITORS.]

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING.—The thirty-ninth session of Western Yearly Meeting of Friends since the separation, convened at Sugar Grove, near Plainfield, Ind., on Seventh-day, Ninth Month 30th. At the time of the separation it was predicted the conservative element would run its course in ten years. The meeting is now under the management of another generation, there being but few living who were old enough to take an active part in the affairs of the meeting at that time.

The meeting is composed of three Quarterly Meetings: White Lick, Plainfield and Laura, all of which were represented. There was a better attendance throughout than usual, and a good degree of interest manifested.

The meeting gathered in joint session, and after a time of solemn devotion, in which a number of lively testimonies were offered, the shutters were closed, and the Clerks read the opening minutes. The Representatives being called all were present but two, who were absent on account of sickness. Minutes were then read for ministers present from other Yearly Meetings: Ida Bins, Ohio; Job S. Gidley, New England; Henry T. Outland and Benjamin P. Brown, North Carolina. These dear Friends were made welcome and encouraged to attend to the work for which they were sent.

Epistles were read from the Yearly Meetings with which this meeting is in correspondence, also one from Philadelphia, inviting the co-operation of all Friends in the cause of Peace, one from the Fritchley General Meeting of Friends, England, and one from London, addressed to all who bear the name of Friends. Two large meetings were held on First-day, in which the Gospel was preached with much clearness to very appreciative audiences. The ministry was tender, instructive and edifying. It was estimated a thousand people were present in the afternoon.

Second-day, the state of Society was considered by reading the Answers to the Queries, which called forth much good counsel. Friends were encouraged to faithfulness in the attendance of all our meetings, not as a form and habit but with minds covered with the spirit of reverence and true devotion to the Heavenly Father.

Third-day was occupied with reading reports from committees. Unity was expressed with Benjamin P. Brown in a concern to visit Women's Meeting. Job S. Gidley at the close of the meeting entertained the children and others in the yard by some instructive counsel and reciting poetry.

On Fourth-day there were again two public meetings for worship. These coming in the middle of the week are not so large as on First-day, but those who attend are mostly serious, thoughtful people, who add life to the meeting. The Gospel was preached in the spirit and power of God. Many were made tender and encouraged to press forward in the good work.

Fifth-day the meeting heard the report of a committee appointed a year ago to carry out a concern which originated in the meeting of Ministers and Elders, for the help and encouragement of our members and others. The report contained the information that the meetings had all been attended except one at a distance, some of them several times, and some families had been visited; also eleven public meetings had been held, two of them at meeting places of the larger body of Friends. Unity was expressed with the work of the committee and it was continued for another year.

The closing work of the Yearly Meeting was the reading of the Epistles to the other Yearly Meetings, and the returning minutes for our dear Friends who in addition to the labor in the different sessions of the Yearly Meeting, held nine public meetings at nearby points. Job S. Gidley and Henry T. Outland expressed a wish that the meeting close with open shutters, with which the meeting united, and after a remarkable outpouring of the Holy Spirit the clerks read the concluding minutes.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The Ledger announces that the high price of coal will be a hardship to the poor in the vicinity of the Bedford Street Mission. Last year 16,321 buckets and sixty-nine tons of coal were disposed of at cost or less by the Mission.

John Wanamaker has suggested that a great exposition be held in Philadelphia in 1926, in celebration of the 150th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and the idea is welcomed by the newspapers of the city.

In all the centuries of her history and tradition as America's greatest medical centre, Philadelphia has never found herself the hostess to more distinguished guests than she welcomed last week, when the Seventh Annual Clinical Congress of Surgeons opened its sessions.

Dr. Joseph C. Bloodgood of Baltimore, who has made cancer his life study, told a large audience in Witherspoon Hall that America's great fight of the future would be to conquer that disease which he termed her deadliest foe. From 60,000 to 80,000 lives annually are sacrificed to this scourge, the eminent surgeon declared, a plague that is even more insidious and sinister than tetanus, typhoid or tuberculosis.

GENERAL.—A cargo of foodstuffs and clothing valued at $700,000 was to be sent last week aboard by a United States navy collier to Beirut, Syria, for the relief of refugees. The response of the public throughout the country to President Wilson's proclamation for Armenian and Syrian relief days was very generous.

Fifty-two acts of heroism were recognized and rewarded at the fall meeting of the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission. Six cases received the silver-medal award, the remainder the bronze medal. Twelve persons were killed while performing their heroic acts; and to dependents of six of these pensions aggregating $3120 a year were granted; to dependents of three sums amounting in all to $2000 were awarded.

The following is announced from New York: If every motor car registered in the office of the Secretary of State were available to take out a different load of people each day, it would require less than one week to give the entire population of the Empire State an automobile ride. In other words, about six trips is all that would be necessary to permit every man, woman, and child to go motoring.

Announcement of an increase of $400 in the salary of each full professor at Brown University appears in the annual report of President Faunce, at the fall meeting of the corporation. The minimum salary, exclusive of pay for administrative work, is now $3000 and the maximum $3650.

Food rises of the last four years have cut down the dinner-table supplies not only among the poor but also among families with comfortable incomes, according to an ominous study conducted in New York last week. Twenty New York families whose incomes range from $2000 to $3000 submitted their household expenses for comparison, and agreed in reporting that they had been obliged to give up articles of food for which they had not before regarded as luxuries.

For the first time in its history, according to well-informed leaders, a stand on the liquor traffic was taken at St. Louis, Mo., in the general conference of the Protestant Episcopal church. A resolution adopted by the house of bishops placed the church on record as favoring "such action in our legislative assemblies as will preserve the interests of temperance and the repression of the liquor traffic."

Women were denied equal rights with men in two actions taken last week by the house of bishops of the Protestant Episcopal general convention in session at St. Louis, Mo. Appeal to permit women to sit as delegates in the general convention was rejected, while a request from Logan H. Roots, bishop of Hankow, to be allowed to admit women to membership in his advisory council, was denied.

NOTICES.

An interesting meeting under the auspices of the Peace Committees of the Meetings at Fifteenth and Race Streets and Fourth and Arch Streets will be held on the evening of Fifth-day, Eleventh Month 9, 1916, at 7.30 in the Arch Street Meeting-house. A fifty-cent supper will be served in the Lunch-room from 5.30 to 7.00 and in the afternoon a Round Table for discussion of Peace interests will be held at 4 o'clock in the same house.

It is hoped that Friends and others will make a special effort to attend the evening meeting. Rufus M. Jones will speak on "The Conscientious Objector" and will be followed by Leyton Richards, of Manchester, England, whose interest in the cause of Peace and whose intimate knowledge of the problems of to-day have won him large audiences. He is in America for a short stay and it is a rare privilege accorded Friends to have this opportunity of hearing him.

A Meeting for Divine Worship will be held in Friends' Meeting-house at Arney's Mount, on First-day afternoon, Eleventh Month 12th, at three o'clock, p. m., under the care of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting's Committee. All are cordially invited.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING'S Visitation Committee held an appointed meeting for Worship in the Fire House, 516 Ryers Avenue, Cheltenham, Pa., on First-day afternoon, Tenth Month 29th. It is also proposed to hold similar meetings in Cheltenham on Eleventh Month 12th and 26th, at 3.30 p. m. A Committee of the Quarterly Meeting has been appointed to consider the establishment of a regular meeting for worship in the village where a handful of Friends reside. Any Friends interested to attend the meetings will be gladly welcomed. The Fox Chase car from Fifth and Market Streets runs about four blocks from the Fire House. O let me listen with a ready ear,
Thou gentlest among voices! Never yet
To me Thou speakest as in accent set
To syllable or number. What we hear
Comes spoken to us with impression clear,
But how we know not. Thou who dost beget,
Dear thorn-crowned Saviour in Thy bloody sweat,
Friend, in our hour of darkness, ever near!
To Thee all power in heaven and earth belongs,
Thine are the cattle on a thousand hills,
On Thee the needy fixes his desire.
The widow's heart Thou lifts in praiseful songs,
Thy goodness helps us wear our bitter ills,
And brings my spirit through this sea of fire.

To be like Christ, then, is to be a Christian. And regeneration is the only way to the Kingdom of God, which we pray for.

For serving God concerns the frame of our spirits, in the whole course of our lives; in every occasion we have, in which we may show our love to His law.—WILLIAM PENN.

"AS CHRISTIANS SHOULD."

"We call each other by name, as Christians should," wrote Charles Lamb (if I remember correctly), referring perhaps to his friendship with Charles Lloyd. The remark is both characteristic and suggestive. Doubtless it proceeded less from a scruple than from a natural vein of simplicity in the famous essayist—the same in which he found fault with his tailor for "making inroads" (though "by modest degrees") upon the customer's wonted mode of dress: "foisting upon me an additional button," etc., and finally bringing home a coat finished in a style belonging to the "full tide of luxury."

Without stopping here to make particular application of Christian principles to the two matters that were the subjects of these quoted remarks, let us entertain the suggestion to regard our obligations in commonplace things as well as in the obviously momentous ones, and consider what is incumbent upon us daily by reason of our profession of discip-ship. Admitting the real advances of this age, we are nevertheless face to face with conditions that do somewhat amaze and perplex us. The onrush of business and traffic in multitudinous forms; the achievements of science as affecting our modes of living; the increased production and use of luxuries and "comforts;" the variety and urgency of social and educational demands; the multiplying of recreations and diversions—is there not in all these a place of division, as regards the extent to which the Christian should be occupied with them, as well as the nature and tendency of the things "which he alloweth"?

This is not a plea for austerity or aloofness; but the thought is, that too often there is less distinction—as Biederwolf so well shows—than there ought to be, between a life that is professedly Christian and one that is not. The lesson of scrutiny and even of reproof remains for us in the Master's question, "What do ye more than others?"

True, it is not for us to know always who should be enrolled as the Lord's saints, but those who would be His followers are at least "called to be saints," according to their measures of knowledge and grace; and such calling does assuredly impose the necessity of "walking worthy" of it; in short, of living, in heart and action, "as Christians should." How well this is expressed in "Andrew Rykman's prayer:"

"Out of self to love be led,
And to heaven acclimated,
Until all things sweet and good Seem my natural habitude!"

Such experience, however, is not to carry us permanently into the desert, to isolate us totally from our fellows, or to disconnect us from the forward movements and interests of our time. Rather it is to give us discrimination, adjustment and balance, so that we may be able to be "in the world but not of it," in a sense; or as Paul says, "to use this world as not using it to the full."

To this lofty ideal, most of us must acknowledge that we have not "already attained," but we have some instruction as to the goal toward which we should press. It will be allowed that few have ever reached a higher standard of purity than did John Woolman, so often cited and quoted, whose example, however, in its simplicity and self-renunciation, we are probably more apt to admire at a distance than to emulate in matters at hand. But let us hear some of his observations and "remarks on sundry subjects."

"It is a truth most certain, that a life guided by wisdom from above, agreeably with justice, equity and mercy, is throughout consistent and amiable, and truly beneficial to society; the serenity and calmness of mind in it affords an unparalleled comfort in this life, and the end of it is blessed."

"Where people through the power of Christ are thoroughly settled in a right use of things, and freed from all unnecessary care and expense, the mind in this true resignation is at liberty.

from the bands of a narrow self-interest, to attend from time to time on the movings of his Spirit upon us, though He leads into that through which our faith is sorely tried."

"Where customs contrary to pure wisdom are transmitted to posterity, it appears to be an injury committed against them; and I often feel tender compassion toward a young generation, with desires that their difficulties may not be increased through unfaithfulness in us of the present age."

"So deep is Divine love, that in steadfastly abiding in it, we are prepared to deny ourselves of all gain which is contrary to pure wisdom, and to follow Christ, even under contempt and through sufferings."

In "An Epistle to the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings of Friends," John Woolman refers to that worship "which stands in doing the will of God on earth, as it is done in heaven, and keeping the holy name sacred." This he says cannot be done, "but by humbly abiding under the cross of Christ."

"I often feel a labor in spirit," he writes, "that we who are active members in religious society may experience in ourselves the truth of those expressions of the Holy One—'I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me.' . . . A tender care hath been incited in me that we who profess the light of Christ Jesus to be our teacher, may be a family united in that purity of worship which comprehends a holy life and ministers instruction to others." THE STORY OF BALAAM.

Let it ever be borne in mind that there is such a thing as the creation of a false conscience. We may wish for a certain thing to be our duty until we actually persuade ourselves into the certainty that it is our duty. Instead of at once acting on light when it comes and of doing the right when we know it, we pray for further light and knowledge of what is required of us. And thus we can actually get into such a confused state of mind that we lose our discernment between the right and the wrong. The right which our better judgment has approved of, but from which we would like to be excused because of the worldly loss obedience to it entails, comes to be supplanted by the wrong which we secretly love. And in this manner Balaam tricked his conscience. Let me cite the words of another:

"There are two opposite motives which sway men. Some will give gold to be admired and wondered at, others will barter honor to get gold. In Balaam the two are blended. We see the desire at once for honor and for wealth; wealth, perhaps, as being another means of ensuring reputation. And so we have seen many begin and end in our own day—begin with a high-minded courage which flatters none; speaking truth, even unpalatable truth. But when this advocacy of truth brings, as it brought to Balaam, men to consult them, and they rise in the world and become men of consideration, then by degrees the love of truth is superseded, and passes into a love of influence. Or they begin with a generous indifference to wealth—simple, austere, by degrees they find the society of the rich leading them from extravagance to extravagance, till at last, high intellectual and spiritual powers, become the servile instruments of appropriating gold. The world sees the sad spectacle of the man of science and the man of God waiting at the doors of princes, or cringing before the public for promotion and admiration."

Let us now look at the final results. The mouthpiece of some of the most majestic prophecies in the whole range of the ancient Scriptures (See Micah vi) ended by suggesting to Balak that a hideous temptation to iniquity should be placed in the way of a nation whom he could not curse because of its acknowledged moral superiority. He knew no enchantment prevailed against Jacob and no divination against Israel as long as that nation held fast to its integrity. But once get them into sin, Balaam using his very knowledge of the moral and ethical elevation of the God of Israel over the licentious rites of the pagan world of his time, was persuaded the Divine favor would be withdrawn from them and they would become weak as other men. So reasoned the prophet, and applying his very knowledge of God to the service of the devil, he taught Balak his vile secret. The 25th of Numbers shows how nearly his infernal artifice succeeded. The situation was saved by the zeal of Phineas, the grandson of Aaron, who publicly vindicated and re-established the holiness of the character of Jehovah before the eyes of all in the hour of national peril. But the greatness of the crime and the depth of the fall, on the part of the people, dwelt in the memory of successive generations, for even after hundreds of years we find Hosea reminding his contemporaries how God found Israel:—

"Like grapes in the wilderness, like the first ripe figs in spring; but they went to Baal-peor, they consecrated themselves to that shameful idol and became abominations like their love."—Hos. ix: 10.

In Ps. 106: 28, it is said: "They joined themselves unto Baal-peor and ate the sacrifices of the dead"—that is, of dead idols, as contrasted with the Living God.

As for Balaam, he died in battle fighting against the very cause the final victory and supremacy of which he had at the cost of great personal sacrifice proclaimed as certain.

I close with a few serious considerations which we may justly draw from the study of the subject of this paper.

(1) The ministrations of the most exalted truths may be altogether independent of the personal character of the minister. Our Lord foresaw a day in which many would hear from His lips: "Depart from Me, I never knew you!" even though they might protest: "We have prophesied in Thy Name, and in Thy Name done many mighty and wonderful works." Communion with Christ in a true life is worth more for the Kingdom of God than the most brilliant exploits in the way of public ministry.

(2) It is possible for a man to make great sacrifices for Truth and to be at heart disloyal to it. We can easily imagine how Balaam congratulated himself on his return from Moab that he had been faithful to his light and refused to curse Israel at Balak's bidding; that he had preserved his reputation as a man of principle, seeing that compromise would have promoted him to high honor. But in the eye of heaven greed was in his heart all the time. He still hoped against hope that somehow a via media would be found. He wanted to please himself without displeasing God. To keep on good terms with the God of Israel and with the King of Moab at the same time was his real object. He attempted the impossible to be a prophet and a diplomatist in one. He knew God would not curse the good and so he schemed to make Israel wicked to bring the curse on them. He would not transgress a rule, yet did not scruple to violate a principle.

(3) The desire for personal salvation in heaven is not religion. It is one thing to wish to be saved, and another thing to have a passion for the triumph of the Will of God. Balaam said: "Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last bed be like this," but he died as one of the enemies of the Lord. It is one thing to desire a happy death and another to hunger and thirst for a holy life.

And now what is the remedy, for the same temptation is with us also?

It is so to apprehend the Divine revelation to man that the heart will love God. Balaam knew much about God, but did not love Him. If he had loved Him he would not merely have acquiesced in the Divine will, he would have adored it, would have delighted in it. He would not have prayed the second time about a settled matter. He would have said as the Blessed Son of Man said in His day: "My meat is to do the Will of Him that sent Me and to finish His work." The doing of that Will involved the Cross and the pathway of rejection leading to it. But the perfect Servant said: "I was not rebellious, neither turned away back. I gave my back to the smiters and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair and hid not my face from shame and spitting." But for all who will follow in His footsteps it will be found true at last, that "the world passeth away with the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever."

The following lines were written by Avis C. Howland in answer to Lorenzo Dow's question, "What Are Your Religious Sentiments?"

Like Bethlehem's inn my heart confest
Is crowded off with sin and care;
Though unsubdued is many a quest,
Yet still I trust the Babe is there.

For oft the Spirit's glimmering beam
Will, through the mists of folly, roll,
And earth with all its pleasures seem Unworthy an immortal soul.

But these impressions soon depart,
And careless still I hold my way,
Though sure to feel the goading smart
Of conscience at some future day.

These struggles 'twixt the dark and light
My childhood's earliest days unfold;
And best I love and deem as right,
The tenets which the Quakers hold.

A HOSPITAL LETTER.

[We publish the letter of J. P. M. at the suggestion of Eleanor C. Emlen. J. P. M. when in Philadelphia is pastor of a mission in the southern part of the city. His congregation is made up of workmen and women and this earnest appeal to them was published in their monthly church paper a few weeks ago. J. P. M. offered his services, under a sense of duty, and found work in an American Ambulance corps.—Eds.]

THE AMERICAN AMBULANCE,
Neuilly-sur-Seine, France.

To my friends of the Chapel of the Prince of Peace, in true New Testament style, I send greetings. And I am very thankful at every remembrance of you all for all the goodness that God has put into your hearts and lives. May He who has begun every good work in you strengthen you to persevere in it, and make you perfect at last.

For the steady, solid work here, though it has kept me from writing to you until to-day, I am thankful. Only, it may keep me from writing to you again, both together and separately, for there is very little let-up in the duties every day. Now I assure you I can sympathize with you more deeply than before in your own, hard, tiring labor. That is just what the work of an orderly is.

The American Ambulance, with its 650 beds, is a large hospital, and I suppose almost all those beds are occupied now. Most of what I see is, however, in two wards, holding nine wounded men each. As for the war itself, I know less of what goes on than you do. Paris and this suburb Neuilly, in which the hospital servants work, are as quiet as our own city, perhaps quieter. I have heard no cannon until this afternoon, and they were only practicing. The newspapers are four pages short, and I do not get time to read them. But I am gradually coming to know a little about wounded French soldiers. As I cannot speak their language, I cannot talk much with them yet, but we can understand each other in many things. They are just as natural, ordinary, simple-hearted human beings as you are. Besides giving them baths in bed, and doing other humble tasks for them, we help wash their wounds every day. Such wounds are not to be imagined until you have seen them. I suppose they can never be understood by us, for we have not felt them ourselves. And besides each soldier only God can do that! May He in His love spare you and yours from it! And may His poor, foolish, wilful children cease bringing such terrible things on themselves, on each other, and on Him! One of the men in our ward is especially patient and brave. Somewhere in France he has a wife and a little four-year-old girl, and his hair is touched with gray, and his age is only my age. Two or three times a day it is the duty of the orderly—that means me—to hold up that man's foot and knee while the doctor or nurse syringes it with a strong, disinfecting liquid. Often the rubber tube with which this is done is pushed and pulled two or three inches back and forth in the wound. This is to try to wash out some of the poison which still infects the flesh and bones. You can never have seen such a foot and ankle, with a great gash, two fingers' width, running right through the shattered leg, and the whole thing a wreck. It is not an easy task, probably it is impossible to hold those broken parts up, without hurting the man. But he is very quiet and patient always. He has been long months in this bed, and if his foot can be saved from amputation, it will be many more months before he can begin to limp around. Will he ever be able to go back once more to his wife and child, and be strong to help them?

Another man was brought into us the other day, with his left shoulder frightfully wounded. The entrance of the bullet over the shoulder left a small, clean hole about half an inch in diameter. But where it came out, well, the whole upper side of the arm for a space about five inches long and four inches wide is all torn away in the ugliest, roughest kind of a bloody hole you can imagine—or can't imagine. The soldiers themselves will tell you that the enemy who did this, did it with a lead ball which exploded as soon as it entered the arm. But the officers who claim to be wiser say it was not an explosive bullet, but one which was reversed in the cartridge, so that while it made a clean entrance into the flesh and bone, it made an exit which is, let us say it, hellish.

This is not pleasant reading, and I do not mean it to be. I have only told you a short word about two cases in a large hospital, and they are not nearly as bad as many others in the same building. A large hospital, 650 beds! And it is only a drop in the bucket. Remember that! Every charge you read of, every bitter defeat or glorious victory in this and every war which human beings, from now on, engage in, has or will have for the least dark part of its dark background, the shattered, suffering men that I have told you of, and thousands of others besides. There is nothing sentimental, nothing but the barest suggestion of the complete facts, in what is written here. You can, you must, draw your own conclusion. But I say, may God rouse us to condemn the deliberate sin which has deliberately inflicted such wounds as these on Europe. Yet may He help us to cleanse first the inside of the cup, to cast out and shake off the selfishness and material greed and lack of brotherhood in our own hearts and in our own nation, which in due time would plunge us also into such guilty misery. May Christ make us ever mindful that the Infinite God is our Father. So may He help us to take His own, insistent, unconquerable Good Will for our wills, that in His might we may go forth and conquer evil with good, and treat each other as His sons, as brothers all, and so live together accordingly. Thy kingdom come!

Very sincerely,

JOSEPH PAUL MORRIS.

OUVERT, 368, Par Tautorie Militaire.

THIS truth comes to us more and more the longer we live that on what field or in what uniform or with what aims we do our duty matters very little, or even what our duty is, great or small, splendid or obscure. Only to find our duty certainly and somewhere, or somehow, to do it faithfully makes us good, strong, happy, and useful men and tunes our lives into some feeble echo of the life of God.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

MARY H. STRATTON.

BY ONE OF HER PUPILS.

The death of Mary H. Stratton at her home in Salem, Ohio, on the fourteenth of Ninth Month, 1916, removed from amongst us one who was known and loved by a large circle of friends. She was born near Colerain, Belmont County, Ohio, on the fifteenth of Ninth Month, 1834, thus, at her death, lacking one day of completing her eighty-second year.

She was the eldest daughter of Asa and Asenath Raley. As she grew to womanhood she had the advantages which belonged to a farmer's daughter in that neighborhood. They were, however, advantages of no mean order. Her parents were individually strong, and all the elements of her environment healthy and invigorating. Concord Meeting, of which she was born a member, was one of the small meetings within driving distance of Mount Pleasant, the centre of Friendly interests in Ohio, and the place of holding the Yearly Meeting.

The Raley homestead was famous for its hospitality, and a daughter of the household naturally formed a wide circle of acquaintances. Mount Pleasant was nine miles from the Ohio River and the railroad. By a process of selection quite foreign to modern ideas, it had become the literary and religious emporium of the rapidly growing body of Friends. Wheeling, Va., on the other side of the river, was a slave market, but Mount Pleasant was a hot-bed of abolition sentiment. Here religious books were printed and anti-slavery periodicals published. Near the village a farm had been purchased, a house erected, and before Mary Raley was old enough to be one of its pupils, the Friends' Boarding-school was opened in 1837. The school building was on a hill adjacent to the great Yearly Meeting-house. In the autumn of each year, when the Yearly Meeting convened, the school accommodated a large number of guests, but many others sought lodgings at night at the homes of members at Concord, Harrisville and all the nearby Friendly neighborhoods. At such times the hospitality of the Raley home was tested to the utmost, but never found wanting. A diminishing number of surviving guests can still recall the glimpse they had of a hard-worked, cheery, intelligent, hopeful, wide-awake household, in which the affairs of Society and of the nation were discussed with dignity and hopefulness. Such a stream of guests, whether at Yearly Meeting or at other times, was in itself a widening and educating influence.

There were other daughters in the family, and at early womanhood Mary Raley began to teach in the neighborhood schools which Friends supported. One or more terms she was employed at Stillwater, in the little brick school-house so long in use there.

After a few years' experience in primary schools she became a teacher at the Boarding-school at Mount Pleasant. Here the writer was associated with her, first in 1864-5, as her pupil, then as teacher with her, then as life-long friends who were never burdened with the necessity of "getting acquainted" over again.

After the lapse of half a century, certain impressions of those days remain very clearly outlined. One, as I interpret it now, was the supremacy of character over mere intellectual attainments. Whether or not she was well equipped in textbook knowledge remains a mystery. I never discovered any limitations, and I cannot recall that her pupils ever raised the question or were troubled with any doubts on that score. We fully recognized that she was amply able to meet the varied requirements.

It would seem extravagant for me to speak of her as an illustration of "womanly completeness," but I recall a sense of wonder at the wide range of her usefulness. The school was not well equipped. Modern ideas of sanitation were not even dreamed of. There was sickness to contend with, and homesickness and sometimes disorder and mild insubordination. She was everybody's friend, everybody's helper, and a walking cyclopaedia of domestic, household, nursery and educational hints and remedies. This abiding love and sympathy and spirit of helpfulness remained with her through life and accounts, in part, for the sense of loss felt by a wide circle of her friends.

One can but recall, in reviewing those Mount Pleasant days, the wide range of her interests, and the ease with which she met a variety of situations. There was a Dr. Updegraff who made professional calls at the school. He introduced a breath of fresh life from the outer world but, what is more to the present question, he felt his call was incomplete, if he did not chat a little with Mary Raley and leave or borrow a new book. I scarcely understood it then, but now I regard it as evidence of sympathy and kinship with culture in its best sense. All who visited the school, and there were many, sought and enjoyed the company of "Teacher Mary."

In the later sixties Mary Raley taught for a few years at Friends' School in Germantown. Of this it is needful only to remark, that here, as elsewhere, she formed numerous friendships which were terminated only with her life.

In 1871, she married Edward Stratton, and Salem, Ohio, became her home. She now exchanged the care of other people's children for the more intimate relation of mother to the little flock which grew up around her. Here, as elsewhere, the innate spirit of helpfulness was manifest, and the needy and suffering drew largely on her sympathy.

She was ever an exemplary member of the Society to which she belonged, and willingly bore a share of its burdens. She was often engaged in committee work, and in Salem, a service of nineteen years as Monthly Meeting Clerk fell to her share.

Growing infirmities kept her much at home during the last years of her life, but wrought no decay in her love and sympathy for those around her, and induced no word of complaint. In reviewing such a life one is tempted to say that the value of any religious society, or any special environment, is best shown by its ability to produce and reproduce such characters as that of Mary H. Stratton. "Her feet ran slow to evil, but swift to do good. . . . She was wise with the wisdom which cometh only to the children of the Kingdom."

SOME PEACE BOOKS.

V.

"New Wars for Old," John Haynes Holmes, Dodd, Mead & Co., $1.50. The title of this book is the thesis which peace advocates must learn to substantiate. In decrying carnal warfare too many have belittled the militancy expressed by the apostle in saying, "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal." The other part of his statement is the vital part: we do wrestle "against principalities and powers, the rulers of darkness, etc.," and this warfare is emphasized, its motives and methods made clear, in the ten eloquent chapters of this book. The "Logic of Force," "The Fallacies of Force" and "The Meaning of Non-Resistance" are especially valuable chapters. Their point of view is clear from two brief quotations: "War, in the last analysis, as we have seen, is a reversion to savagery; and its advent marks the awakening from slumber of all that is bestly in the human heart. . . . War is in essence chaos and not order, discord and not concord, hatred and not goodwill. It brings liberation to the lowest and suppression to the highest that man knows." (Page 312.) This seems quite clear and altogether unqualified. We should do the author an injustice, however, if we did not observe that he goes the length of giving credit to all the good that has been claimed for the devotion and spirit of sacrifice and heroism manifested in war. His conclusion, quoted above, has the greater worth on this account. He faces the question fairly, avoids none of the difficulties, gives the enemy (in the argument) every possible advantage and then comes out on this high tableland of hope for the race: "Non-resistance is moral militancy, spiritual chivalry, the knighthood of the Kingdom." We have not yet learned as well as we should how to present the cause of peace, so that it will be beyond question that "non-resistance is no counsel of cowardice and the non-resistant no minion of fear." This book will certainly be a help to us in attaining this advantage.

VI.

"Why War," Frederic C. Howe, Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York, Chas. Scribner's Sons, $1.50. There may be those who will regard this as a partisan work. Its author is an officer under the Wilson administration and the book is dedicated to the President. Should these facts make any chary of the conclusions of the several arguments, they cannot properly impugn the recital of history and the general array of economic and sociological data in which the volume is so rich. The author is a deservedly famous authority along these lines, as six very important and well-used treatises testify. "Why War" is written to show the complex undercurrents in present-day history that account not only for the present fourteen-nation conflict, but that make the possibility of future wars. These causes are many and seem to justify the statement that "all of the machinery of organized society is really arrayed on the side of militarism." (Page 59.) The cure of such a situation might appear well-nigh hopeless were it not for the further step in the analysis, and the conclusion that "in all of these nations the war-mind is economic. It is neither racial, nationalistic nor dynastic." The first hopeful step in curing a disease is to have a right diagnosis. An understanding of the "Occupation of Egypt," of "France and the Morocco Incident," of "The Partition of Persia" and of "Germany and the Bagdad Railway" discloses something of the economic situation. After an understanding of that, one can appraise with a show of success the "Gains and Losses of Imperialism" and the "Shifting the Cost of War." "There would be an end of war and preparations for war if the cost were borne by those responsible for war." (Page 290.)

Frederic C. Howe makes a plain demonstration that even the economic basis of war is feudal in its origin. To Americans at least the further demonstration is quite as plain that "The Possibility of World Peace" is involved "in a real Democracy." "Peace is the problem of democracy," he says, and this is but the corollary of his other statement that in a sense is the pith of the whole book, "Privilege and democracy cannot unite on a peace programme, they cannot join in a peace conference because privilege and democracy have conceptions of the state that are forever at war."

Constructive peace work, if it is to be effective, requires a wide acquaintance with the economic facts and laws which give the 350 pages of this volume such a rich background. If this rich material is to be objected to in an apparently partisan setting let us seek it diligently elsewhere.

EARLY FRIENDS' CONSISTENCY AS TO WAR.

Writing in the Journal of Friends' Historical Society (England) President Isaac Sharpless says, "I am asked by the editor of the Journal to make some comments on certain passages in J. W. Fortescue's 'Military History.'"* On page 11 we read:

"You know that late in the seventeenth century a company of worthy and excellent men formed the settlement of Pennsylvania in North America. They were members of the Society of Friends, who would have nothing to do with war, and consequently bought their lands from the Indians instead of taking them by force or fraud. Frugal, thrifty and industrious, they soon grew wealthy, and extended their borders further and further, until they came into collision with other tribes of Indians, who one day fell upon the outlying settlers with fire and sword. In utter dismay the sufferers appealed to the Government of the province for protection; but the Colonial Assembly would not do violence to their tenets and ignored the appeal, leaving their unhappy and inoffensive frontiersmen to be massacred. At length, goaded to desperation, the settlers came down to Philadelphia with their arms in their hands, and threatened violence unless the Assembly voted money for supply of ammunition and other measures of defense forthwith. Thereupon the Assembly yielded, but still they would not openly pass a vote for the purchase of gunpowder. To save their conscience they voted money only for the purchase of corn or other grain, which, as gunpowder is made up of grains, was sufficient warrant for the acquisition of the necessary but unspeakable article. To such contemptible subterfuge are men driven who refuse to face facts."

This statement is very misleading. It was not other tribes of Indians which made the trouble, but other tribes of white men, who had come to the Quaker Province and abandoned the Quaker methods. The Friends lived in the southeastern corner. The other settlers were the Germans, who got along very well with the Indians, and the Presbyterians from Ulster, commonly called Scotch-Irish. These exasperated the Indians by their pugnacious intolerance. "Why should the Indians have land which Christians want?" they demanded.

"The settlers that came down to Philadelphia" were a company of these militants, who had just lynched some twenty peaceable Indians at Lancaster, and proposed to treat a group of Moravian Indians, then in Philadelphia, in the same way. The Philadelphians, including some 200 Friends, rose in arms, and the expedition went back without a fight and without accomplishing any other object than extorting from John Penn, grandson of the Founder, and not a Friend, a promise to offer a reward for male and female Indian scalps."

The incident, related by Franklin, of the purchase of gunpowder referred to a different transaction about twenty years before. The Province was asked by England to aid in a military attack upon the French fort at Louisburg on Cape Breton. The Quaker Assembly refused, on the ground that "the peaceable principle professed by divers members of the Assembly do not permit them to join in raising of men or providing arms and ammunition." They, however, appropriated £4,000 for "bread, beef, pork, flour, wheat or other grains." The Governor, not a Friend, on his own responsibility said that "other grain" meant gunpowder, and so expended the money.

Again on page 105:

"The pious Quaker of Pennsylvania and Rhode Island used to finance pirates, who at one time nearly swept our East Indian trade off the seas."

There were pirate ships that went out from Philadelphia and from Rhode Island about the year 1700, and returned with spoils. So far as I have been able to ascertain, Friends had nothing to do with financing them. I am sure that if any individual Friends had done so, they would have received the censure of their Monthly Meetings, and the fact would have appeared on the minutes. I never saw or heard anything of the kind.

NO NEED OF A WAR.—I would not give the life of one clear-eyed Kansas boy for the whole of Mexico. We do not want war with Mexico. Mexico does not want war with us. There is nothing in the Mexican difficulty that could not and cannot be settled by the sincere co-operation of the two countries. All war is wasteful, wicked, criminal folly. It is the wrong way to right wrongs. It is the longest way around any international difficulty. Might does not make right. It never will. Murder and extermination are crimes whether a nation commits them or an individual. An international court to enforce peace and settle disputes between nations is the right way to adjudicate national questions. It is the common-sense way. It is not the brute way.—From Governor Capper's Address at Baldwin, Kan.

THE DIVINE SERVANT.

"Have ye aught to eat?" the Master cried,
 As He stood on the shore that day;
 The risen Master, the glorified—
 No longer common clay;
 But still the same as He was of yore,
 He stood that morn on the open shore.

They stepped from their boat with hunger keen;
 Lo! food was prepared, and they,
 Hardly daring to trust what their eyes had seen,
 Could only His words obey,
 As He said, in love, "Come, break your fast!"
 Did ever mortals eat such repast?

For, wonder of wonders! the Son of God,
 The Saviour of Men, that Day
 With His own hands had prepared that food,
 And waited on common clay;
 To teach forever the lesson fine—
 He who serves most is most Divine.

And still the hands of the Crucified
 Are breaking bread for men,
 And still, as of yore that morn He cried,
 He calls to each one, as then:
 "Come! Break your fast! Come! Eat with Me,
 That which My hands have prepared for thee!"

A TRANS-PACIFIC VOYAGE.

BY WM. W. CADBURY.

An ocean voyage is always a unique experience in one's life, and if this be true of a short trip of a few days across the Atlantic Ocean, it is far more so when days are lengthened into weeks, as one traverses the great Pacific.

I have now completed my ninth ocean voyage, and I can look back upon each one as a time when new friends were made, new places visited, and new experiences gained in the school of life.

The trip from Vancouver to Hongkong by the new fast Canadian Pacific steamers occupies about three weeks. These two vessels, the Empress of Russia and Empress of Asia, are registered at about 30,000 tons displacement, each, and are capable of making five hundred knots a day. They are equipped with all the modern conveniences of a great passenger steamship.

We embarked on the Empress of Russia the tenth of Eighth Month. Our ship took us by the so-called northern route to Japan, passing close to the southern shores of the Aleutian Islands, first northwesterly, then due west and finally southwest to Yokohama. Leaving this port we passed on to Kobe and through the Inland Sea to Nagasaki. Cholera was epidemic at this port, so that after coaling we went straight on to Woosung, the port of Shanghai. Our route led thence through the region of perpetual calm, east of the Island of Formosa, to Manila, whence we turned back to Hongkong.

From north to south our course covered about thirty-seven degrees of latitude, that is from fifty-one degrees north to fourteen degrees north at Manila, where the Southern Cross was visible and the North Star lay low in the northern horizon.

From Vancouver, one hundred and twenty-four degrees west, to Canton, one hundred and fourteen degrees east, we crossed one hundred and twenty-two degrees of longitude, about seven thousand five hundred nautical miles in all. This distance, including stops of twenty-four hours or less, occupied twenty-two days, the sixteenth of Eighth Month—meridian day—being omitted from our calendar.

There are four things which always claim the chief attention of every passenger on an ocean voyage. The first is what passengers and how many are able to meet in the dining saloon. Then the weather is an all-important matter. The personnel of one's fellow-travelers becomes of ever-growing interest as the days go by, and finally comes the important question of when the destination will be reached, a question which none of the officers will venture to answer and many wild reports are spread about.

Only a few stormy days marred an otherwise peaceful sea, so that I was able to enjoy to the full the many interesting men and women whom I met during the trip.

Our party consisted at the outset of five besides myself a married teacher with his wife, and a single man and woman for an academic department, a graduate of Kansas State Agricultural College, to assist in developing our own agricultural work. At Yokohama we were joined by Catharine B. Jones, who will teach at the Canton Christian College during the coming year. Gilbert Bowles and Esther Balderston were at the wharf to see her off. I had about an hour's conversation with Gilbert Bowles and we discussed the great work that he himself and the other members of the Friends' Mission in Tokio are accomplishing, and he was much interested to hear the latest reports from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Bishop Bashford, general director of the missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in China, accompanied us as far as Shanghai. All who spoke with him and heard his addresses were much impressed with his insight into some of the problems of China.

There were several physicians on board, including my former colleague, Dr. J. C. McCracken, with his little crippled daughter. He is now located at Shanghai. We had many interesting talks together on medical problems in China. Dr. Mary Stone, a Chinese physician, was also on board and impressed all who met her and heard her speak with her beautiful Christian spirit.

The passage of the Jones Bill and its signing by President Wilson were announced during the voyage, and our Filipino passengers received the news most joyfully. One, a young lawyer, graduated from Georgetown University, in Washington, D. C., assured me that in two or three more years it would be quite safe for the United States Government to withdraw the military and naval forces from the islands and even the Governor-General himself. On the whole, I found Americans satisfied that the bill had passed in order that uncertainty of the future course might be ended. The almost universal sentiment of Americans in the islands, is, however, that all real progress has been seriously checked.

At Manila my friend, William Hilles, was at the dock to meet me, and I had a delightful visit with him and his wife in their lovely bungalow. In the evening we dined with Dr. Chester Haig, a Haverford alumnus, at the Manila Hotel. William Hilles took me to visit the Bilibid prison, where we were shown through the workshops employing most of the prisoners. An air of contentment was apparent in all and one could not but observe the striking contrast with the dejected countenances of the idle captives bound in chains. A large hospital is attached to the prison, which though very simple in all its arrangements is scrupulously clean. Most of the nursing is carried on by the prisoners themselves.

Dr. Victor C. Heiser, formerly Director of Health of the Philippines, and now of the International Health Bureau of the Rockefeller Foundation, and Professor MacCallum of the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, joined us in Manila. They came with me as far as Canton and I had the pleasure of showing them four of the hospitals of that city. They expressed great enthusiasm for the vast field of service opened up here for a medical man.

I was much interested in talking with a group of American engineers on their way to Peking. They represent an American syndicate, backed up by the International Banking Corporation of New York. An agreement has already been signed by this syndicate and the Chinese Government, whereby a loan of $50,000,000 is to be made to China for the construction under American supervision of canals and railways. The first undertaking will be reopening the Grand Canal. This loan differs from the Five Power Loan and others made with European powers in that it is purely a business proposition and the American Government as such has no relation to it.

It was my privilege to meet many other interesting characters during the voyage. Finally we reached Canton on Ninth Month 3rd, and it was a great pleasure to greet my many old-time friends, both Chinese and American.

My friends Clinton N. Laird and wife are occupying my home, the William Penn Lodge, temporarily. They gave me a warm welcome and I am now living with them.

The field for service is fully ripe, and the laborers are all too few. My prayer is that the Lord of the harvest will send more laborers into this harvest.

THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

One of the remarkable sights witnessed in England during this war was the marching of a group of men through the streets of Dover en route for France. They were prisoners proceeding under military guard, and were being deported from "free England" because they could not conscientiously participate in war or destroy their fellow-men. Some were church people and based their refusal to support the war on the teachings of the Gospel; others were Socialists whose conscience forbade them to fight as a sin against humanity and social betterment. Some expected to be executed; all knew that humiliation and imprisonment awaited them. As they marched to the ship all joined in singing "Stand up, stand up, for Jesus."

When the Conscription Laws of England were framed, provision was made for those who are conscientiously opposed to war. Such "Conscientious Objectors," as they are called, would have the privilege of going before Tribunals which were established in different parts of the country and, presenting their case, claim the immunity that the law was presumed to afford them; but theory and practice were two different things; the Tribunals became the judges of the sincerity of the applicants for relief under the law, and with few exceptions have been prejudiced against them. If an applicant at a Tribunal is refused exemption he at once is considered to be and automatically becomes a member of the army, subject to army penalties applied to those who are insubordinate or traitors to their country. Unfortunately, under these circumstances, every Tribunal has done what was right in its own eyes. They have also had the power when granting exemption, if doing so, to determine the nature of the alternative service of national importance which was to be taken up by those released from direct participation in the war. Often they have tried to force "Conscientious Objectors" into work that would indirectly assist the war, and frequently the latter have refused to be inveigled into such a situation. As a result much muddling and chaos have ensued and the presumed intent of the law has often been lost. All this has led to prosecution and persecution and to the destruction of civil and religious liberty to an extraordinary degree.

While the military man has got into the saddle and overrides the liberties of England, and while the people live under restrictions that they have not known for generations, it has remained for the "Conscientious Objectors" to take a stand that is most unpopular, but which must be taken by some if the traditions of the race are to be maintained. Above all, the commands of our Lord appeal to them. Many rejoice in their opportunity to serve their country and the cause of human liberty through personal suffering. One day I met in a railway station in Birmingham a young man, who remarked, "I am going home this afternoon to see my people, for it may be a long time before I have another opportunity, as I am expecting arrest and to go to prison most any day." I expressed my sympathy, when he added, "I would not miss this opportunity of coming to a decision for anything." Another "Conscientious Objector" wrote from his prison cell, "I am proud to be here; I have never been regretful for one moment that I came here." I am acquainted with a young man—a graduate of one of the great universities—who, when being commended for the sacrifice of all his earthly prospects because of his conscientious convictions, replied, "You speak about sacrifice; I have the peace of God." He faced imprisonment with joy rather than destroy in his heart the peace of God so precious to his soul.

Many young men have faced the Tribunals with the same dauntless spirit. I recall a home where our host was one of the brightest young business men of London and the junior partner in a great and wealthy firm of that city. He apprehended what would await him because of the character of the particular Tribunal with which he would be obliged to deal shortly after we were with him. He lost friends; his beautiful home would be broken up, his partnership profits relinquished, his family scattered, prison would very likely await him; yet I was never in a household where the presence of Christ was more real and where troubles were being faced with a more happy spirit.

I have frequently heard how boys from eighteen years and upward meet the Tribunals. These Christian lads have a genuine intuitive sense of the sinfulness of war, and feel that they cannot engage in it out of loyalty to their Master. Inexperienced and unaccustomed to dealing with men or with expressing their religious faith, they have often faced the ordeal of contending at the Tribunal with men skilful in speech and law and who are trained to entangle others in arguments, and who are also hostile to the lads before them, or fail to understand the purity of their motives. Some of these lads have been known to stand constant heckling by the hour with the utmost composure. The answers given by these boys have at times been astonishing. Thus, a member of a Tribunal during an examination said to a boy of my acquaintance, "How is it that you, who are so tender of life, do not hesitate to kill cattle and even eat them?" Quickly was flung back the answer, "Have cattle souls?" Another lad was being badgered by a Tribunal, when one of his judges asked him "Why should a big, healthy boy like you want exemption?" Instantly the lad replied, "Why are you not in the trenches?" "Oh," said the man on the bench, "I secured exemption." The youngster answered, "That is just what I want." He got it.

Alternative service is very often dictated by the Tribunals as a means of punishment. We are told that in many instances alternative service means one shilling per day and to be housed in workhouses, prisons, or lunatic asylums.

The efforts of the Tribunals to make any service as near the nature of a punishment as possible cannot make for national betterment, and are often ridiculous. Thus, I have known of school teachers being put at farm work of the humblest description, and the vacancies "filled" by incompetent persons who would be most useful to the State if engaged in their regular employments. Up to several weeks ago over two thousand of these contestants for civil and religious liberty had been arrested and many sent to jails—civil or military—and some to hard labor for various terms. At one time thirty-four men were sentenced to death, but their sentences were afterward commuted to ten years' imprisonment.

While in many instances "Conscientious Objectors" have been well treated by prison officials, there are many cases of hideous cruelty, which should be a warning to any nation that professes to stand for a love of human liberty. A friend of mine tells of such a prisoner who, speaking of his bodily suffering, exclaimed, "If they would only shoot me!" Dr. John Clifford writes as follows: "Letters by every post give facts like the following: A Congregational minister writes of a man twenty-nine years of age. He has known him all his life and has been an intimate friend for the last ten years.

For his genuineness he offered unimpeachable evidence. In spite of all evidence, the Tribunals declared he had no conscience and ordered him into the army. I have recently seen him, and under these conditions: the cell is ten feet by seven, walls painted slate blue black, the floor to lie upon, an overcoat for a pillow, and not even a chair; solitary confinement for days and days, and everything taken away, even a tract that a good woman had given him on the journey; nothing to handle, nothing to count, thrown back entirely upon his own thoughts, with just food enough to keep him alive, unable to wash or shave or get his clothes off, or write any letters. "So the great military machine is set to do its work. Bad as that is, it is a mild case compared with others I could quote. "Four of them," says a victim, speaking of the soldiers, "set on me. . . . One shook me, dragged me along, while the others punched and thumped and kicked me. . . . They set on me again and bruised me more." A third time "they started bruising again, I was absolutely exhausted, with bruises all over, lumps on my head, swollen cheek, and bleeding in one or two places, and could do nothing but lie on the floor and pray for God's protection."

A youthful "Conscientious Objector" who was suffering solitary confinement, begged a Bible of the prison authorities. He was refused this, along with any reading matter; but finally the officer in charge said to him, "Too much Bible reading is as bad as too much whiskey; you can have it one hour a day."

The many friends of these sufferers, as in the days of the apostles, "Remember them in much prayer." I recall a young man speaking of the deliverances wrought on behalf of some of these brave young men, declaring that "prayer has done more than anything else." The world may say that he made a foolish statement, but the eye of faith sees that he was right.

Young men of all conditions in life are found in the ranks of the "Conscientious Objectors." The general attitude of many of them when appearing before the Tribunals may be epitomized in part by the statement of the son of a peer, who in normal times devotes his whole life to improving the social conditions of the poor in the east end of London. He stated to the Tribunal, "As a disciple of Jesus Christ . . . I must refuse to take any willing part in operations which have as their object or accompaniment the wholesale slaughter of my fellow-creatures in war. I regard all wars, defensive and offensive, as essentially alien to that Divine Spirit which led Christ to the cross, and which bids us love our enemies and overcome evil, not with explosive bombs and shells, but by the methods of love and reason. . . . I bear my testimony against a Compulsion Act which I regard not only as unchristian, but also as a betrayal, in large measure, of the ideals of liberty for which Britain is considered to be fighting." He concluded his defense by a Scriptural quotation most appropriate to the occasion, whereupon he was accused of "blasphemy" and was compelled to cease his defense. The whole account reads like a reversal to the conditions of the seventeenth century in England, and indeed it is so.

Some may say that the protests of a few thousand men are negligible when they are opposed by millions of other men who think differently, but history proves that our civilization and ideals of righteousness have been developed by the spiritual influence of those who have realized and faithfully called men to obedience to the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

"IN EVERYTHING GIVE THANKS."— . . . "Broken!" Of course your thanksgiving must be broken while troubles are thick upon you; still may I again most gently say, try? If the hardships of to-day stick in your throat, look back the way you have come and see God's mercies strewn your path and get your praise-material there. Look onward to the certain issue of good unto which His love has committed Him to bring you, and find your praise-material there. Then come back and search even the face of to-day again and see if even now there is not much to thank Him for.

PEACE COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS, 304 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Readers of THE FRIEND have, from time to time, been kept in touch with the work of the Peace Committee as it has taken shape and gone forward. Those who have followed the previous accounts as published in these columns will be interested in the following description of the work of the past month.

NEW OFFICES.

The second-story room at 111 S. Thirteenth Street, which has been occupied since early summer jointly with four other Peace organizations, was rented for a term of six months, expiring Eleventh Month 1st. The situation was originally chosen in the hope that a considerable number of calls might be attracted from the street. This was not the case, however, and the accommodations have proved inadequate for the work of so many organizations. It was, therefore, the judgment of the Executive Committee that our office work could be more efficiently and comfortably conducted in a separate room and in closer affiliation with other work of the Yearly Meeting. Our new office is located in Room 25, in the Arch Street Centre, 304 Arch Street, Phila., where visitors will be welcome to such literature or other help in their Peace work as we have to offer. As our telephone number was too late to be included in the new telephone book, attention is here called to the fact that we can be reached by calling up Market 4065 or by asking the operator for the Peace Committee of Friends or for Anne G. Walton. Both names will be listed in the late winter issue of the telephone book.

MEXICO.

The article entitled an "Open Letter and Appeal" which was prepared by the Governmental Relations Committee this summer and distributed widely in the United States and Mexico, appears to be making a great impression on progressive and liberal-minded Mexicans. The Governors of four States of Mexico have written that the letter has been given to the press of their State; and the government official who corresponds to our Minister of the Interior has written a long letter of eight pages voicing his appreciation. At the same time he sent a copy of what Dr. Rowe assures us is the leading newspaper of all Mexico, giving our Open Letter and Appeal in full followed by his eight-page letter of endorsement.

Five hundred letters have been sent out recently to the presidents and deans of colleges and universities throughout the United States, asking them to consider scholarship aid for Mexican students. A very prompt and cordial response has already come from more than twenty colleges and universities and there are indications that by next year several scholarships may be offered and educational avenues of intercommunication may be opened between our country and Mexico.

LITERATURE.

The edition of the pamphlet called "Rifle Practise in Our Public Schools" has been exhausted. This pamphlet was originally issued by the Friends' Peace Association and contained short paragraphs from various noted men and women on the subject. The question of military training is likely to be introduced into many of the State legislatures this fall and is, therefore, of immediate interest. To meet the need for debating material for schools and colleges as well as for other distribution a new symposium of opinions of prominent men and women has been prepared. The selections were specially written for the leaflet and come from two presidential candidates, one State governor, several college presidents and professors, editors of educational journals and commissioners of education, noted preachers, etc. Copies of this pamphlet may be obtained on application to the Secretary's office.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THOMAS ELLWOOD.

In company with Isaac Penington, he went to a monthly meeting at High Wycombe on the following day. It was held in a large room in a private house, and Edward Burrough's ministry, he says, came forth amongst them "in life and power, and the assembly was covered therewith." To his own heart it came again as just the message he needed and the right course for him to take seemed more clearly defined than before. He yearned to yield a loyal allegiance to his newly-found Saviour, but the fear of his father's displeasure weighed heavily on him. When he reached home, his father was out, but after a while he arrived in his carriage; when he noticed the change in the young man's deportment he was very angry, and only saying, "I shall talk with you, sir, another time," hastened into his parlor.

Meanwhile, Thomas decided to go on the morrow to Oxford, in order to attend the Friends' meeting there; he gave orders that a horse which he had borrowed should be ready early. Before starting he asked his sister to go to their father's room to tell him that he was intending to go to Oxford and to inquire whether he could do anything for him there. The message she brought back was that his father would come and speak to him, which he did immediately. When he saw that his son did not remove his hat at his approach, he was so overcome with passion that he struck him with both fists and pulled off his hat; he then bade the servant ride back the borrowed horse; the man who was much attached to his young master tried to make an excuse and to cause a little delay, but in vain—he had to ride off immediately even before taking his breakfast. Regarding "hat honor"—a writer—Hepworth Dickson says: "Lifting or not lifting the hat was very far from being all. It was a sign, and one of many signs. In the reign of Charles II. men wore their hats in house or church as well as in the streets and parks. Men sat at meals in felt and listened to a play in felt. 'I got a strange cold in my head,' wrote Pepys, 'by flinging off my hat at dinner.' Everyone ate covered. A preacher mounted to the pulpit in his hat; the audience wore their hats and only doffed them at the name of God. Hat-lifting therefore was a sign of a depraved and foreign fashion recently brought into England. All sober men put on their hats while wits and foplings carried them in their hands."

To return to Thomas Ellwood: his horse being gone, he now set off on foot. His father, supposing that he had gone to his room, did not ask for him until the evening, when as he sat by the fire, he bade his daughter call her brother down. "It may be," he said, "he will sit there else in a sullen fit till he has caught cold." "Alas, sir," was her reply, "he is not in his room, nor in the house neither, he put on his shoes and went out on foot and I have not seen him since. And indeed, sir," she ventured to add, "I don't wonder at his going, considering how you used him." Walter Ellwood was distressed at hearing this, and so overcome with fear that his son might run into danger and perhaps die in jail that he cried out weeping, "O my son! my son! I shall never see him any more!" Notwithstanding, when Thomas returned the following day the greeting his father gave him (after snatching off his hat) consisted of blows and the words, "Sirrah, go up to your chamber!" Hat after hat having been taken from him, he was now perforce a prisoner at home, where he spent much time in reading chiefly in the Bible and in waiting on the Lord.

The solace of congenial companionship was at length afforded him. Isaac Penington and his wife paid a visit to Walter Ellwood, and before leaving Mary Penington said that, since Thomas's company was "so little acceptable" to him, she hoped he would grant him leave to spend some time with them, and taking advantage of their old acquaintance, she, with womanly tact, overruled all his objections. As Thomas was about to step into the carriage, his sister reminded their father in a low tone that her brother was without a hat and leave was given her to fetch one, but he started without a penny in his pocket for his father had taken all his possessions from him. This visit to Isaac Penington's was a time of such blessing to Thomas Ellwood. On his return home his sisters did all that lay in their power to soften his father's displeasure, and his path became much smoother.

"As my spirit was kept in due subjection to the Divine power," he writes, "I grew into a nearer acquaintance with the Lord, so that I sometimes heard His voice."

Thomas Ellwood's next visit to Isaac Penington was in Aylesbury Jail, where he and more than sixty other Friends were imprisoned, he found them in a wretched tumble-down room once used for a malt-house, from which there would not have been the slightest difficulty in escaping, but the jailer's confidence in them was unbounded.

After Isaac Penington's liberation, Thomas Ellwood, who was now twenty-one, went often to the meeting held at Chalfont. One morning, this meeting had hardly begun, when the prancing of horses gave warning that tumult was at hand. No one stirred from his seat except a worthy old Independent or Baptist who had come to Chalfont for some religious conversation with Isaac Penington. Seeing a private door which led from the parlor into the garden, he sprang over the bench before him and quickly making his escape hid himself in a safe nook in the shrubbery. Hardly had he done so when a company of soldiers, headed by one Matthew Archdale arrived; his behavior was very different from that of most of the officers sent on like errands, for he allowed no violence and spoke civilly. He said he had received orders to take the men who were present before a magistrate, but added that he should not arrest all. He chose Isaac Penington, George Whitehead, Thomas Ellwood and four or five others. The magistrate received them courteously, but said, "I am sorry that your case looks ill, for how can it be imagined that so many could jump all together, at one time and place from such remote quarters if not by combination and appointment?" They reminded him that their meetings were public, being held with doors open to all comers of any denomination, and that it would be mere madness to plot under such circumstances. Public meetings of all kinds were forbidden in those unsettled times, lest they should prove conspiracies against the government. After threatening the Friends with a term in jail, this kind magistrate dismissed them all unharmed.

(To be concluded.)

NEWS ITEMS.

A FEW weeks since we printed in the children's department from the Quarterly Examiner a story entitled "Fierce Feathers." It was written by L. Violet Hodgkin and had unusual merit on at least three counts. Historically it had a well-authenticated background; as a piece of composition its quality put it in the first rank—Hawthorne could have done no better; finally, the peace lesson which was the motive for which it was written told itself without any needless moralizing.

We are pleased to report that it has now been put into circulation as a neat paper booklet of nine pages by the Delaware Peace Society. Our Friend, Frances Tatum Rhoads, is active in this Society and it will be well if others in adjoining or distant States consider what field they can command for service for this or another edition of the booklet. For collateral reading in the history and English classes of grammar schools it is equal to the best we know.—[E.S.]

ALFRED H. BROWN of Hobart, Tasmania, is visiting among Philadelphia Friends and others in the interests of the Friends' Boarding-school at Hobart.

Our readers will recall references to this School in the home letters of W. C. Allen and W. B. Harvey published in THE FRIEND two years ago. A. H. B. in a personal letter to a well-known Friend writes:

"I am traveling with a minute from London Yearly Meeting to see something of American educational methods (before returning to Australia) and to interest Friends in the above School. It fills an extremely important position, as it is the only Friends' School in Australia; New Zealand children also attend. We are anxious that none of the children of our members should be refused, but the accommodation for boarders is much more than filled already and we still have prospects of an increase in the numbers.

"The School, designed for about thirty boarders, has now to provide for over sixty boys and girls. With day scholars our number stands at about 220.

"Our Society in Australia and New Zealand is very far from wealthy and Friends in England are very hard hit by the war. I am therefore asked to appeal to Friends in the United States to help the committee of Hobart School to make such additions as will bring our premises into a satisfactory condition.

"Estimates show that some $50,000 will be needful to carry out the work and the School will be very grateful for any help that can be given.

"Wm. B. Harvey, of Westtown, Pa., has seen the conditions at the School and very kindly consents to answer questions and to act as receiver for any amounts that may be contributed."

[Some Friends among us who have become acquainted with conditions in Hobart have made contributions to the cause, and it is hoped others will follow, and English Friends, notwithstanding the demands at home, have remembered this distant interest.—EWS.]

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The following item is from the Ledger: "Long periods of silent prayer were conducted by more than 500 women of the Pennsylvania Branch of the Women's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Pennsylvania at an All Saints' Day service in Holy Trinity Church, Rittenhouse Square. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of the Philippines, who officiated, emphasized the value of the silent worship. 'There has been danger of late years,' he said, 'that our speaking to God has been so abundant, that He has had no opportunity to burn His message into our souls.'"

When a child was run down and killed one day last week the year's toll of deaths from auto accidents in Philadelphia reached one hundred. As the hundredth death came just as the eleventh month dawned, this represents an average of ten fatalities a month. In other words, motor-driven vehicles in this city have taken a human life every three days since 1916 dawned.

A band of farmer boys—twenty-four in number—rode from Philadelphia through the beautiful Chester Valley last week for a glimpse of the rural life in that section. The boys came from California. Every one of them is a prize winner through ability to show practical results in farming, and for their interest and success in agriculture, are being given a transcontinental trip under the auspices of the High School Agricultural Club of California.

GENERAL.—The Springfield Republican has this item: "The manhood life of the late Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood, who recently died at his home in Newton Highlands, at the age of sixty-nine, was devoted to unceasing advocacy of peace. In season and out of season he preached the wickedness of war and heralded the coming of international harmony. Death took him in the midst of the world's greatest war, and yet it was a life well spent. He looked forward to international disarmament, and hoped by that means to check the horrors and waste of war. For nearly twenty-five years Dr. Trueblood edited the Advocate of Peace that entered so many New England homes, and if it did not convert the readers of it to acceptance of the views of its editor, the sense that he had the full courage of his convictions was always felt."

The undersea freighter Deutschland, laden deep with a cargo worth $10,000,000, completed her second voyage safely and docked at New London, Conn., on the 1st.

Virginia, the eighteenth State to ban the sale of intoxicating beverages, closed all saloons at midnight on the 31st ult. completing a dry area in the South reaching from Washington to Jacksonville on the east and from Washington to New Orleans to the west. Although a large part of the Old Dominion previously had been voted dry in local elections, the new State law closed more than 800 saloons, mostly in Richmond, Va., Norfolk, Newport News, Lynchburg, Petersburg, Roanoke and Bristol.

Last year $300,000 were spent to build and equip new hospitals with the special thought of securing better care of Indian babies. Much good has been accomplished and it is said that to-day there is substantial increase of births over deaths.

The following is from an eastern paper: "Under the glorious climate of California is to be spread what will be the biggest bridge in the world. It is to connect Oakland and San Francisco, and will relieve five ferry systems. It will cost $22,000,000, be five and a half miles long, one of the heaviest bridges ever built, carrying three roadways and four railroads, and two of its 16 spans will be high enough and with space enough between for any ship to pass."

With addition of new features at the University of Maine this year, students can now cut down a tree suitable for pulp, and on the University campus, turn it into a printed newspaper. New machinery has been added to the University Press, among which is a linotype machine, with a complete equipment of all varieties of type, including characters for the German and Greek languages, and accents for Spanish, Italian, Latin and French.

Harvard University is to extend its instruction to police officers in Cambridge. It became known last week that plans for a course in the duties of officers will be under way and would be instituted within a month. Raymond B. Fosdick of New York, regarded as an expert in some branches of police methods has been invited to become the first instructor.

A key to the language of the Moseeton Indians has been discovered among the Bolivian manuscripts in the library of Northwestern University. When Dr. Walter Lichtenstein, librarian of Northwestern University, was in South America a year and a half ago, he purchased in La Paz, Bolivia, the library of Senor Don Donato Lanza. In this library was included a mass of manuscripts which is now being carefully investigated. Dr. Rudolph R. Schuller, who has the work in hand, discovered among these manuscripts a large unknown tract upon the language of the Moseeton Indians of northeastern Bolivia. The author of the work was an Italian Franciscan missionary named Bonigno Bibobetti.

THE POWER OF HIS RESURRECTION.

There is an orderly progress of teaching concerning the Resurrection in the New Testament. In the Gospels we have the historical fact of the Resurrection. In the Acts, the proclamation of that fact as the great demonstration of the truth of the Gospel. In the Epistles the doctrine, the spiritual significance and meaning of the Resurrection are unfolded to the churches who had already been gathered into the faith of the Risen Lord of Glory. The Resurrection of Christ was set forth as a witness to Christ's personal glory and to the efficacy of His death. It was also regarded as a pledge and prophecy of the resurrection of His people. And above all, Christ's rising out of the darkness and bondage of the tomb was set forth as the symbol of our new life in the world.

Of course, to accept the veracity of the apostolic record is tantamount to the confession of the supernatural, that the spiritual world, which is the world of causation, has verily revealed its reality in the world of matter. The apostles were as certain as evidence could make them that Jesus had actually triumphed over death.

Now the story of Jesus as we have it in the New Testament is the record of the supernatural from start to finish. To eliminate that feature from it is to lose the record as history altogether. The simplest and perhaps the oldest Gospel (that of Mark) is, if anything, fuller of miracles than any other.

A non-miraculous Christ is substantially a mythical Christ. If we reject the supernatural in the New Testament; if we accept one or other of the various theories whereby from earliest times the apostolic testimony concerning the crowning miracle, the Resurrection, has been refused; we are driven to the conclusion that the most beneficent influence in history, that which has been the pioneer and safeguard of civilization in every progressive land, is the result of a bundle of myths.*

*There is the theft or imposture theory (started by the Jews). The swoon theory (adopted by Mahomet). The hallucination or self-hypnotization theory (advanced by the older materialists). The ghost or apparition theory (the modern spiritualist explanation). It is not part of my present task to deal at seriatim with these ancient and modern forms of unbelief. Their irrationalism has been shown up over and over again.

But while no event in history universally accepted to have actually occurred can produce stronger evidence for itself than the resurrection of Christ, the mere belief in it did not suffice for the apostles. Paul longed to know "the power of His resurrection." He called it "the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe." If the mighty power of God did actually triumph in the grave of Jesus, if that dishonored and crucified body, wrapped in linen clothes by loving hands, and laid in the rock-hewn sepulchre, was really raised, leaving behind the cerements of death; the angel coming to roll away the stone not to let the Lord out, but to show to the weeping women that He had already risen; if the way the garments were left, showed how complete the victory over death, no sign of a conflict even in the grave; and that they were left at all, an evidence that the body had not been stolen, but that it had slipped out of its wrappings as a butterfly slips out of the chrysalis, a "spiritual" body, unhampered by material obstacles, then we have an Evangel to "souls in prison." The power that acted then is available to-day to deliver souls in the grip of moral evil, energizing them to walk as "risen with Christ" in newness of life.

That was the preaching that established the Church. It was carried by the apostles into the great pagan world. It explains the very existence of Christianity. The passing on of the teaching of Jesus only would not have produced such results. The presentation of Jesus as a mere pattern to copy would have been a mockery to men struggling with their lower nature. The glad tidings were that the death and resurrection of Christ had liberated and set in motion spiritual forces available for every man, even if in the lowest depths of despair, to lift him out, as he by faith takes hold of that power, and to raise him up as a personal witness in his own experience to the historical reality of what took place outside Jerusalem in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, on that blessed Easter morn.

EXPERIENCE AS TO THE ATONEMENT.

WILLIAM DEWSBURY, 1646-52.

Having fully known in himself the utter impossibility of attaining to peace with his Creator, so as to enjoy communion with Him, without the mediation of a Saviour, who, as Advocate with the Father, could plead His own most precious blood as the price paid for the ransom of souls; and impressed with the high importance of obtaining the possession of the good things thus provided, which are variously set forth in the Holy Scriptures, and in testimony to the real enjoyment of which, they afford so great a cloud of witnesses; he was indefatigable in the pursuit of this one great object. "Christ! Christ!" was the incessant cry in the secret of his soul; Christ the Bread of Life, the Fountain of living waters. It was not enough for him to be told, even in the language of Holy Writ, that Christ was his Saviour and Redeemer, that He had tasted death for every man—that He is the Propitiation for the sins of all—that He was manifested to take away our sins—and that He had actually borne our sins in His own body on the tree; he could see there was no inheritance of the promise for the first birth, that corrupt nature which attaches to Adam and all his children in the fall. He was deeply sensible that "except a man be born again he cannot see the Kingdom of God."

He felt with more than ordinary conviction the full force of the passages of Holy Scripture which most plainly set forth the one great Offering for sin. But although he arrived at the clear and unquestionable evidence in his own mind that remission of sins through the blood of Jesus Christ was and is to be preached everywhere, yet, with equal truth to support him in the conclusion, he was constrained to bear witness that none can become partakers of the benefit of Christ's death, but as they are brought into a measure of His life; which takes place in the obedient mind, consistently with the testimony of John—"If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanse us from all sin."

The foregoing extract was sent us by Arthur Pim. He came across it in the handwriting of the late Joseph Radley, headmaster of Lisburn Friends' School. J. Radley had added the following note—"The testimonies of our early Friends were all based on the same eternal truth; George Gregson, the first founder of Lisburn Meeting, explicitly holding the same conviction."

THE PEACE MOVEMENT IN JAPAN.

It is hardly accurate to speak of the peace movement in Japan at the present time, for since the outbreak of the great war there has been little activity in the way of general propaganda. But if serious thought and searching of heart be preparatory to future activities, the present mental and spiritual attitude of an influential section of the Japanese people has in it much that is hopeful.

Speaking broadly, the history of the peace movement in Japan naturally divides itself into four periods: (1) From the organization of the first Japan Peace Society in 1891 to its dissolution in 1894; (2) The period from 1894 to 1906, covering the Chino-Japanese and Russo-Japanese wars, during which no organized peace work was undertaken; (3) From the organization of the present Japan Peace Society, 1906, until the outbreak of the European war; (4) The period of the present war.

The impetus which led to the organization of the first Japan Peace Society was given by William Jones, then Secretary of the Peace Society, London. During his world tour in which he secured for his peace manifesto the signatures of many prominent statesmen, William Jones met Count Okuma, who was then Minister of Foreign Affairs, and secured his signature and seal, which are conspicuous among those of W. E. Gladstone, President Cleveland, Li Hung Chang and other influential statesmen, as given in his "Quaker Campaigns in Peace and War."

The first Japan Peace Society took a positive stand against all war, from a distinctly Christian point of view. In the beginning, a vigorous campaign was carried on, including a canvass for members and the publication of a periodical, which was suspended two or three times by the Government. The fight for peace was a difficult one and at the outbreak of the Chino-Japanese War, the Society suspended activities and passed a motion of adjournment, sine die.

During the period from 1894 to 1906 there was no organized peace work, though certain individuals remained true to their principles. During the latter part of the period, there was some vigorous work by a few socialists, who were always under strict police surveillance.

The present Japanese Peace Society, founded in 1906, grew out of a conference of thirty-five representative Christian workers, including six or seven missionaries, who met to consider the question of forming an "arbitration and peace society suited to the present needs of Japan." At the first meeting it was decided to admit non-Christians to membership and to adopt a platform calling for general efforts for the removal of the causes of war and for the peaceable settlement, "as far as possible," of international difficulties. On a platform of educational effort, appeal to government officials, and co-operation with similar national and international organizations, the Society has gone forward with its work.

A new era for the peace work in Japan, as in other places, began with the outbreak of the present war, though in Japan the change has not been of a radical nature. Soon after the outbreak of the war, the officers of the Japan Peace Society definitely refused, in the face of no small pressure, to allow the Society to become an organ for defending before the world Japan's entrance into the world conflict. While the Society has pursued a conservative policy in its educational propaganda it has steadily maintained its standing and character as a peace society, keeping in touch, as far as possible, with peace workers and peace organizations in other lands.

The rest of this article will be devoted to a consideration of the question of peace and war as related to the Christianization of Japan.

As to the early effects of the war upon Christian work in Japan, the following words of the present writer, written in 1914, may, with little modification, be applied to the whole intervening two years:—

"The effect of the present war upon the spiritual attitude of the Japanese people may be contrasted with that of the Russo-Japanese war ten years ago. Because that war was felt to be a matter of life or death for the nation, there was a universal sense of sobering responsibility and sacrifice, so that with all the suffering and sorrow of war, there was a certain moral element to which the Christian message made an effective appeal. Up to the present hour there are no indications that the present war with Germany will have any similar effect upon the people.

"The weakness of the sacrificial appeal of the present war in the Orient, so far as Japan is concerned, leaves more opportunities for the play of the lower forces which war inevitably calls out. As to the influence of so-called Christian civilization upon Japan, there is no question but that the European war has struck it a serious blow. Almost every day is bringing to my notice the confession of individual Japanese Christians as to the difficulty which they have in defending Christianity against the assaults of those who point to the European war now raging as an evidence of the ineffectiveness of Christianity, saying, 'If this be Christian love, we do not need it.'

"The testimony of a few Christian workers may be to the point. The leading Japanese representative of one of the largest denominations said recently: 'The Japanese understood that the okusuri (medicine) of the Gospel works slowly,' implying that the fact of its not having thoroughly healed the ills of Western Society need not discountenance it in the eyes of the Japanese. 'But,' he added, 'we wish to have only the real medicine.'

"A well-known Japanese educator and Christian leader confessed two days ago, that he finds it no easy task to meet the recent criticisms of non-Christians. He often answers by saying that the European war has arisen not because of Christianity, but because of undue emphasis upon material development as contrasted with spiritual.

"Last night's testimony of one thoughtful college student is suggestive of the struggle now going on in many lives, but it is feared many may not be able to press on to such a wholesome conclusion as did this young man. He said in substance:

"When the war broke out there was a struggle in my breast. I had been taught nationalism and I had been taught the universal love of Christianity. I could not, even if I would, tear from my heart the love of country, but when I heard the cry, 'Strike Germany,' or 'Strike Austria,' there was conflict in my heart. I went anew to my Bible. I was deeply stirred to find Jesus, moved with intense love of His own country, crying out, 'Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem.' But this Jesus who so loved His own land was the same who sought to draw the whole world to His heart and taught the ages universal goodwill and love to all men. My heart was comforted with this new light and I saw that the truest love for one's own country was that which loves all men and which must, by sacrifice, if necessary, remake society according to the universal ideals of Christianity.

"The war is tending to encourage restlessness and suspicion relative to international relations, especially such as affect America and China. War must not bear all the blame for this, but it has fertilized the soil in which the seeds of suspicion grow. It will require much earnest prayer and effort to counteract the evil forces now at work if they are to be prevented from working injury to the Christian cause in Japan.

"We are gratified to learn that, war notwithstanding, the hearts of many people are opened to the Gospel."

As Japan is far removed from the scenes of conflict, there has been so little manifestation of the war spirit that a well-known publicist has spoken of it as Japan's "Platonic War." But there has been much anxiety and searching of heart as to the bearing of the war upon the future spiritual welfare of mankind. While some Japanese refer to it as the failure of Christianity, there is a general recognition of the fact that if Christianity had really been the religion of the great powers the war would not have occurred.

AMERICA'S PROSPERITY.

They tell me thou art rich, my country: gold
In glittering flood has poured into thy chest;
Thy flocks and herds increase, thy barns are pressed
With harvest, and thy stores can hardly hold
Their merchandise; unending trains are rolled Along thy network rails of East and West;
Thy factories and forges never rest;
Thou art enriched in all things bought and sold!

But dost thou prosper? Better news I crave.
O dearest country, is it well with thee
Indeed, and is thy soul in health?
A noble people, hearts more wisely brave,
And thoughts that lift men up and make them free,—
These are prosperity and vital wealth!

FRIENDS' WAR VICTIMS' RELIEF COMMITTEE.

LA CITÉ RECONSTITUÉE.

In a corner of the Tuilleries gardens in Paris is a little group of temporary buildings called "L'Exposition de la Cité Reconstituée" which is an attempt to show what might be done in the way of temporary re-housing of a population of various grades of society. They remind one of all other exhibitions in their theatrical paint-and-stucco-effect, and one's heart sinks at the thought of the influence of such gimcrack buildings on those whose fate it would be to inhabit them. But at last, standing a little away from the others, one sees what might be a home. A long low building, of a pleasing dull brown wood, roofed with warm red tiles, bunches of dried haricots hanging in the eaves, plain blue check curtains in the wide windows, the door hospitably open. So solid and good a building, with its double walls, that it seems almost impossible to believe that it can be taken to pieces, folded up and re-erected wherever wanted in a marvelously short time.

This is one of the "Maisons démontables" of which numbers have already been erected by the Friends' War Victims' Relief Expedition for the homeless people in the devastated country of the Marne and Meuse. Within can be seen the history of the work in France, told by means of specimens and photographs sent by the workers from the various centers. The plain and simple articles of furniture are those that have been given by means of our workers, in the villages of the Marne, by the Department and in the Meuse by the "Bon Gîte," a French society formed to help the refugees. There are photographs of the motors bearing the great piles of mattresses to their destination, snap-shots of our workers, men and women unloading chairs, tables, wardrobes from the lorries, and of the proud possessors wheeling them away on wheel-barrow.

In one bed-room there is a little wicker cradle, with its mattress of chaff, blanket, pillow and dainty patchwork quilt. In cradles like this lie the babies that are born at the Maternity Hospital for the refugees at Châlons, and mothers who need them are given a cradle when they leave. At the hospital there are babies everywhere, in the wards, in the gardens, yes, even in the staff dining-room very often, and their photographs smile at you from the walls of the little house; "les petits anglais," as their mothers call them, a new generation springing up, cementing the friendship between nations. Counting their mothers, their brothers and sisters and the children and others brought out of the bombarded city of Rheims, 1,152 people have been housed and cared for under its hospitable roof. Back come the mothers again and again bringing the beloved babies to thank "Les Amies" for their help in time of trouble, and letters received continually show that the bond of friendship is felt to be no temporary thing. Lately some poor mothers, still in exile, are coming back for care a second time, bringing with them the ex-baby to rejoice the nurses' hearts.

In this room also are specimens of the clothing sent for the refugees from England, Australia, America and many other far-away places where friends are working. Good solid clothing for the men and women, strong and dainty for the children, down to the exquisite baby-clothes that are given to each new arrival. Thousands and thousands of refugees have been visited by the relief workers, their needs noted, sizes measured, and then the "paquets" given. If the friends who have given so much care and thought to the making of the beautiful garments could see the joy they give, they would be many times rewarded. The further off the country from which the garment comes, the greater is the interest. It is, however, not only the clothing but the sympathy it expresses which is so deeply appreciated by the French.

In the living-room are specimens of exquisite embroidery from the workrooms at Bar-le-Duc, organized by our relief workers for the refugees who are crowded there. They have sent also one of the linen chests that are being given to families who have lost all their linen, with a pair of sheets or some towels embroidered by themselves to start their stock again. When Verdun and its neighborhood was evacuated, our workers there had a busy time in helping the authorities to cope with the continuous stream of people flying before the storm of war, and now they are again occupied outside their ordinary work in helping to send them to neighborhoods out of reach of constant air raids, which are shattering to their nerves as well as dangerous.

There are photographs of the little hospital at Sermaize, with its crowd of sick and convalescent boys from Rheims and Bar-le-Duc, and also of the Château at Bettancourt, where about sixty little refugees, all delicate or ailing, are being nursed back to health in the happy open-air life they live, forgetting all the sad things they have seen. There are snap-shots too, of the "garderies," or open-air classes, held by some of the workers in the partly destroyed villages, before their communal schools were reopened to keep the little ones happy and good instead of running wild among the ruins. On a little shelf are seen specimens of the books given to replace the burnt-out children's libraries in the schools.

In one corner are found the garden tools that are given to those of the "sinistrés" who have ground to cultivate, and sample packets of the seeds distributed. There are photographs of the Committee's mowers, reapers and binders at work; of the distribution of livestock, rabbits and chickens to restock the homesteads; of the whole process of building of the homes, from the framework to the finished house in its place with the family reinstated; and of the "cité ouvrière" built in brick at Sermaize, a miniature "garden city." But the most interesting of the exhibits are the plans of the destroyed villages where work has been done. Every house as it was before the war is shown, colored grey; those left standing after the tide of war had ebbed, in black; those rebuilt, in red. Sermaise, Villers au Vent, Sommeilles among others—what vivid pictures these little maps, so accurate and neat, call up. First, ruin and desolation, people homeless, living in barns, stables or cellars, land uncultivated, children running wild; then a year of ceaseless effort with and for the people; now little homes, red-roofed among the ruins, growing seeds, schools reopened and village life beginning again. And the future? Already preparations are being made for that time, when the wave of invasion shall have rolled back, and the country to which the longing hearts of the homeless are always turned, shall be their own again. Already the help of Friends has been definitely asked for by the governments of these Departments, and plans are being made for numbers of the "maisons démontables" to be constructed ready to erect at once when that happy day shall come. In the meantime our workers in the towns see that the health of those who wait for their deliverance suffers as little as may be, making use of the new home at Samoens for those whose sufferings have brought them to the verge of illness that will cripple them if left uncared for. They help with clothing and if possible find work for those whose savings, perhaps sufficient for one year, no longer exist and they care for the children. In the country not now occupied, the work of help and re-population still goes on and schemes for moving émigrés there from the overcrowded towns are under consideration.

An unasked-for reward comes sometimes already to those who work and those who build, when the people whom they serve show by some phrase or look that the motive of their work is understood. They see visions of a time when all that is now overthrown by war is built up again by love, and they dare to hope that in helping to bring about "la cité reconstruite" they are also helping to build up that other City wherein all men may dwell together in unity.

R. C. OGDEN'S LIFE RULES.—Robert C. Ogden's "Stepping Stones" were practically his rules of life. His own career, which was superbly successful, both as the world views success and from the higher plane of noble living, was guided by the principles he put into writing. They follow:

Keep faith in humanity.

A man becomes what he most desires to be.

Do not mistake a prejudice for a principle.

Keep your intellectual and spiritual life bright.

Be energetic, wide-awake, pushing, but be patient.

The world wants men who are well equipped and worthy.

False witness may be given by a gesture or a grimace.

Honor womanhood if you would keep faith in humanity.

What a marvel of a business man's guide is the book of Proverbs.

The longer you live, if you live right, the less you will think of yourself.

Be true. Stand up and believe in yourself, then other people will believe in you.

A vigorous, healthy man has really only one right in the world, only one thing to demand, and that is a chance to work.

In every life comes some crisis when conscious integrity gives a power and heroic strength that can come from no other source.

The charity that we are bidden to display is broad as God's sunshine, but his laws are fine as a razor's edge, and quite as keen.—Ohio State Journal.

QUAKER ELOQUENCE.

BEING RECOLLECTIONS OF WILLIAM SCARNELL LEAN (1833-1908).

BY ALBERT J. EDMUNDS.

[It was the rare privilege of some of our readers to hear W. S. L. on one or more occasions. To them the following seems but a poor tribute of a noble gift willingly surrendered to the Master's service.—Eds.]

In the second half of the last century (more accurately 1848-1894) there stood on a hill near Ackworth School in Yorkshire, England, a little Quaker college, now extinct. It was known as the Flounders' Institute. During its half century of existence, two learned principals were its pride—Isaac Brown and William Scarnell Lean.

In an address at Ackworth in 1912, an old teacher named Joseph Travis Mills gave some lively impressions of Scarnell Lean's remarkable eloquence in meeting, beginning thus:

"This country, in a degree unapproached by any other, was adorned with beautiful churches by the piety of our fathers. But I doubt whether York's soaring arches or Selby's sculptured choir have ever echoed to words more eloquent than the humble walls of the meeting-house hard by. This may seem to some of you an obvious and gross exaggeration, but not, I think, to any of those who heard and were of an age to appreciate the prayers and the sermons of William Scarnell Lean."

Travis Mills goes on to tell us how, in 1865, when the Friends of Westminster Meeting were wondering whether any minister in the gallery would say aught about the death of Abraham Lincoln—

"Suddenly, in the middle of the room, an unknown youth stood up, with the ancient query uttered by kingly lips upon a similar occasion of national grief: 'Died Abner as a fool dieth?' and, in a torrent of rushing words, of magnificent phrases, the genuine expression of deepest feeling on the part both of audience and of speaker, did homage to the mighty dead, and to the great Spirit who made him."

We are also reminded how, at the funeral of John Bright, the same speaker electrified the crowd up to the housetops by quoting Tennyson's words about Milton:

"God-gifted organ-voice of England!"

Travis Mills then gives a sample of Scarnell Lean's Ackworth eloquence:

"Two weeks in succession there had been a death among our small congregation here. The first was that of a man called home after a long life of over seventy years; the second that of a young girl, a scholar—if I remember rightly—in this school. It was inevitable that the contrast should suggest itself to every mind. Lean condensed our common thought into one brief and sympathetic phrase: 'In the paradise of God there is room for the stateliness of Lebanon's cedar and for the tenderness of Sharon's rose!'"

My diary records this funeral, in 1877, but there is no notice about an old man. However, on Fourth Month 20th of that year, Scarnell Lean referred to an old Ackworth Master, John Newby, who was dying. He compared him to a wave which was breaking, in the following words:

"I often think that the rows of dear children before me are like waves breaking on the shore. As they move gradually up the meeting, first appearing in the front rows, and then giving way to new-comers, they seem like waves which are ever sweeping backwards and backwards, breaking along the sides of the meeting, until they reach the seats in the rear, when they sweep out through the door and are seen here no more. And some there are who HAVE BROKEN IN FOAM ON THE ETERNAL SHORE!"

He then compared John Newby to one of the waves which had risen in the ranks of the little boys, had flowed up along a narrow channel, ever growing smaller and smaller, until now it was dying away in a calm and quiet pool.

EXPERIENCE.

I learn as the years roll onward
 And leave the past behind
 That much I have counted sorrow
 But proves our God is kind;
 That many a flower I longed for
 Had a hidden thorn of pain,
 And many a rugged bypath
 Led to fields of ripened grain.

Though clouds may cover the sunshine,
 They cannot banish the sun.
 And the earth shines out the brighter
 When the weary rain is done.
 We must stand in the deepest sorrow
 To see the clearest light,
 And often from wrong's own darkness
 Comes the very strength of right.

We must live through the weary winter
 If we could but value the spring.
 And the woods must be cold and silent
 Before the robins sing.
 The flowers must be buried in darkness
 Before they could bud and bloom.
 And the sweetest and warmest sunshine
 Comes after the storm and gloom.

So the heart from the hardest trial
 Gains the purest joy of all,
 And from the lips that have tasted sadness
 The sweetest songs will fall.
 For as peace comes after suffering,
 And love is reward of pain,
 So after earth comes Heaven
 And out of our loss the gain.

THE WAR AND THE CHURCH IN ENGLAND.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

One day during the summer of 1916 in London, when walking out Victoria Street from Westminster Abbey, I noticed within a stone's throw of that beautiful old structure and under the shadow of it the offices of the great armament concerns—John Brown & Company, Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth & Company, Ltd., Vicker's, etc. Then I remembered how shares in these huge firms are owned by prominent church members, how the priests of the church in the name of the non-resisting Christ have faith in, bless and glorify the products of their mills, how the church is admittedly the backbone of the war system, and how week by week prayers ascend from grand old Westminster Abbey, as well as from countless other places of worship in the realm for triumph over the enemies of England. Can God become confused about such matters, even though men do? Anyway, it seems perfectly appropriate that the offices of the trade which in its very nature creates mutual international fears and jealousies should thus be nestled close under the spires of the noble edifice which represents the organization that of all others supports war and preparation for it.

I heard an Englishman remark last summer, "The moral and spiritual things are at a discount just now; the Divine in man is blurred, ruined and desecrated." He said that when he would quote "What the Lord Jesus Christ says," he would be met with the reply, "Oh, yes, yes, yes! we know all about the Lord Jesus Christ; but we live in very serious times and cannot think about these things." My own conversation with many Christians discovered this to be the general attitude of laity and clergy alike.

Succeeding the outbreak of the war, many churches were thronged with people who joined in prayers for success to their arms. This gave the appearance of a religious revival, and was largely considered and has been spoken of as an indication of such. But with deferred hope as to speedy victory the apparent religious fervor has passed away. The ministers of the established Church and of the Non-conformist bodies now deplore that their places of worship are neglected and that so few attend communion services. In conversation or newspapers they ask in pained amazement "Why?"

Really the matter is not very mysterious. The plain people may not all have the religion that some would like them to have, but many of them have a fair degree of common sense and appreciation of the eternal fitness of things. A good many church communicants feel that war is in essence wrong, and are dubious as to an assumed possibility of "Satan being able to cast out Satan." Then, too, if you are persuaded that under certain circumstances it is right to kill men by wholesale and in other ways violate the spirit of the Gospel, it certainly is not harmful to refrain from going to church.

Some men and women are brave enough to denounce the preachers for trailing at the skirts of politicians and armament people, who in turn are obeying the wishes of those animated by greed or who are involved in secret treaties. No sophistry can appeal to these objectors. They are derided for quoting the New Testament and are ostracized by their friends because they are deemed unpatriotic. I met one such man at a Friends' meeting for worship, who said that he had fled to their simple way of waiting upon God because it was the only place that he had found where human slaughter was not exalted in the name of the Lord Jesus.

One day in England recently I met with a Christian gentleman who has been identified with large business interests which had frequently taken him to Germany for many years. He spoke of the decline in church attendance and how it has been accompanied by a deadening of the spiritual life in that country during the past forty years. His statements agreed most fully with common observation and with the statistical position in Christian countries during the past few decades; namely, that in proportion to the development and building of great armies and navies, so has infidelity increased and church attendance and maintenance declined.

England has not been so spiritually depleted as Germany in this respect, but it is no exception to the rule. The expansion of her navy has been accompanied by a national lowering of the obligations of religion. It seems as if you cannot direct your minds towards war, toward preparation for war without blurring the spiritual perceptions and losing grip upon the fundamental moral attributes which make a nation virile and great.

On my voyage out last spring I spoke upon the subject of love at Divine service one beautiful Sabbath morning. At the conclusion a lady attired in black came to me and said, "Mr. Allen, I have been so thankful to hear what you have preached to-day. If the ministers of the Gospel would all preach as you have this terrible war would not have happened." She then, with tears, informed me that one month before her only child, a lad of twenty-one years of age, had been killed in action in France. I also addressed the service on the return voyage. The officiating clergyman read the prayers for the triumph of the foes of England. At the conclusion of the service a gentleman smilingly said to me, "Mr. Allen, do you know that your address and the prayer were in direct contradiction of each other?" I told him I could not help but know that such was the case. Yet a number of the participants in that service seemed very glad of a simple effort to protest on behalf of what we all know are the commands of Christ. A Christian (British) on the ship remarked to me, "I am glad to get away from England; the spirit of the people seems terrible to me. I could not go to church once during the ten months I was there. I do not see how people can worship whilst such terrible things are going on." A young lady, also a subject of the British Empire, said that for almost two years she had not been to church, adding, "the preaching is all about how bad the Germans are, and how good we are, and I got sick of it and quit."

I know of a preacher who not long ago appealed to the school children of his congregation to save their pennies, for every fifteen shillings six pence would buy one hundred and twenty-four cartridges wherewith to kill the Germans. The demoralization to the spiritual understanding of ministers that develops from the attitude they have assumed towards the war is still more disastrous. A friend of mine was one day pleading with a friend of his, a clergyman, for the exercise of a different spirit toward the Germans. The minister confessed, "I have been preaching 'Love your enemies' for many years, but now I would blow out the brain of every German I met." Again, said a preacher to a friend of mine, when discussing the effect of the war upon his faith, "I am more of an atheist than anything else." The same friend of mine, when talking to another minister, was astounded to have him say, "Frankly, I do not carry a New Testament around with me any more."

Indeed, the New Testament is at a discount just now—it has to be under such circumstances. Last summer a curious incident made cynical England laugh. The good bishop of Oxford had not long before published a book in which he had quoted the New Testament to prove our Lord's teachings regarding some of these matters. Not long ago the censor got hold of the book, and because of such dangerous doctrines ordered the confiscation of any copies that could be seized. It was very funny, but very sad. Considerable newspaper comment followed the incident, along with real and semi-serious suggestions that the New Testament itself be censored as being "quite unfit for the patriotic times in which we live."

Probably the Y. M. C. A. has come to the front during the war more than any other religious or moral agency. It is in many respects doing splendid work at home and behind the trenches. Happily the United States Y. M. C. A. has not become entangled in the international position. Whilst granting the value of the work of the English Y. M. C. A. I confess that it was with considerable of a shock that I discovered one day when stepping into their building in London how fully it was committed to recruiting and in other ways promoting the war. I was interested in the beautiful small editions of the New Testament with a fac-simile of an endorsement of its value to soldiers on the fly-leaf from the pen of Lord Roberts. Will the young soldiers read the Sermon on the Mount or the last verses of the 12th chapter of Romans? I bought in this Y. M. C. A. a postal card of the Camp Silhouette Series representing bayonet practice—humorous or tragic as you please—representing men at the charge or sticking their bayonet into the dummy human forms they are attacking. Surely, this does not seem like our ideals of the Y. M. C. A.

The London Daily News and other newspapers report how fully and frankly Dr. Tasker dealt with the present condition of Methodism in England at the Conference held in London this year. Allusion was made to a "dismal decade," and to the fact that the net decrease in church members was over 5000 this year. The ex-president said that there were no general signs of the revival of the work of the Lord in their midst. It was stated that this position was not due to the absence of the Spirit of God, but the minds of their people were necessarily preoccupied. In spite of this fact, these good Methodist brethren as an organization fully support the war, as do most of the other religious bodies.

The attitude of labor has become distinctly unfriendly toward the churches. The Western Morning News, of Plymouth, this fall, when referring to the Trades Union Congress held in Birmingham refers to an attack on the clergy in connection with the army. The following resolution was passed: "This Congress regrets the unfair privilege which has been given by the Government to members of the clerical profession by granting them exemption from the Military Service Act." The leader who introduced this resolution said that "the best place to convert a parson to Christianity was to send him to the front. . . . The workers had to fight, yet able-bodied parsons and ministers were exempted. Great lawyers had done some thing in the war by creating the 'Devil's Own,' would it not be well for parsons to follow the example and create a 'God's Own'?" He could not see why these men who talked so much of Heaven should be afraid to go there." On the card vote the motion was carried.

Does this action on the part of the Trades Union Congress indicate that, rightly or wrongly, very many working-men feel that the churches have helped to force them reluctantly into the hated war and conscription? Does it mean that the churches have lost their hold on the Master and with it their grip on the masses? Can the American churches learn from these things?

The National Mission of Repentance and Hope is being inaugurated by the churches as a medium through which the people of England may be brought back to God. There has been no intimation that its promoters intend to face the problem of war. A writer in a widely-read Church of England paper has said, "Will the Church of England lead the world into the path of international peace? When will the Church see that the ultra-militaristic attitude which she has chosen to adopt is lowering her in the eyes of ordinary men?"

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

We are living, we are dwelling,
In a grand and awful time,
In an age on ages telling—
To be living is sublime.
Hark! What waking up of nations,
Gog and Magog to the fray,
Hark! what soundeth is creation
Groaning for the better way.

THE TRUTH ABOUT BEER.—It is my professional opinion, after observations of many years in the practice of medicine, that beer is doing more harm to humanity than all other alcoholic. There is a reason for this: Beer is insidious, de-lusive, tempting and fascinating. Advertised to contain less alcohol than some other drinks, it appeals to the man who does not wish to be considered intemperate. But statistics prove that this is a delusion.—CHARLES GILBERT DAVIS, M. D., Chicago.

BANQUETING FIFTY STEEL WORKERS.—Fifty workmen were taken out of the steel mills in Chicago and transferred to better positions in Pittsburgh. Because of superior ability they had been carefully selected from among thousands employed in the mills. Their friends gave them a supper when they were about to leave and furnished plenty of liquor for the occasion. But to the amazement of the hosts, every one of the fifty workmen turned down his glass. Whether or not the bosses knew about their temperate habits is not told. But it is significant that these fifty superior workmen were apparently total abstainers. All this is in line with the tendency on the part of high-class artisans to cut out drink.—CHARLES STELZLE, in The National Daily.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—Increased demands in industry for sober men. Abstainers given preference in promotion. State and city departments beginning to require sobriety as an essential in officials and employees. Between 850 and 900 newspapers and over 60 magazines refuse liquor advertisements.

GREAT BRITAIN, by its Central Control Board, in many districts has reduced the hours of sale to five-and-a-half hours per day, restricted the sale or supply of spirits, forbidden treating and credit sales.

France has permanently prohibited manufacture, sale and exportation of absinthe. Hours of sale in wine-shops are reduced. Military orders forbid sale of spirits to French soldiers in the war zone, in the Paris command; to French, British and Belgian troops in Normandy.

Germany forbade the sale of spirits during mobilization, but the order was not uniformly applied; to save barley the output of beer is officially limited; the sale of spirits to soldiers is forbidden in certain areas, and to all buyers between certain hours in certain areas.

Russia prohibited vodka, and gave local option on wine and beer, which has been widely exercised to close all selling places.

Roumania has forbidden the sale and consumption of alcoholic liquors during the war.

Austria limits hours of sale.

Italy limits the number of selling places.

Norway forbids the sale of spirits three days in the week and forbids the use of grain or potatoes for liquor manufacture. She has only twelve towns or cities where spirits can legally be sold.

Sweden is tightening up restrictions in stricter control by the Gøttenburg System.

Denmark prohibits sale of liquor to soldiers in certain districts and the use of potatoes and some grains for making spirits.

Switzerland prohibits absinthe.

Australian States are limiting the hours of sale.

CANADA'S GREAT FIGHT.—All the provinces of Canada have now voted dry except Quebec and Yukon Territory. A plebiscite on the question was lost in Yukon by only three votes. Prohibition has gone into effect in all provinces that have voted for it except in New Brunswick and British Columbia. Quebec is considerably more than half "dry," by local vote. Newfoundland's legal selling will end Twelfth Month 31st. Prohibition in Canada includes all retail liquor selling, except in Saskatchewan, where there are still twenty government-operated liquor shops.

THAT MALICIOUS NEUTRAL—meaning the liquor traffic in Europe—is the title of an article in a recent issue of The Sunday School Times, from which the following extracts are taken. The writer of the article, Margaret Wintringer, was abroad several months last winter for the express purpose of studying the temperance situation at first hand. She says:

"The most important fact brought out by the war is that the welfare and safety of every nation in Europe was suddenly seen to be endangered by the merely normal drinking habits of the people. Modern warfare simply revealed the drain of drink upon national resources.

With one drinking-place for every eight men, and her countless wine cellars, Belgium nullified the efforts of her brave army and contributed to her own subsequent humiliation and suffering. Even now, the request of the Belgian government for the importation into Belgium of twelve thousand tons of barley monthly for the Belgian Brewers' Federation falls discordantly upon the ears of a world pierced by the cry of starving Belgian babes and little children hungry for bread. And yet the British government has acceded to the request and every month sees the importation of precious grain to be transmuted into beer instead of bread; and our own government is aiding in distributing the barley to the breweries and in seeing that none of the beer gets across the German lines!

France, with a reputation for sobriety, was bleeding under a lowered birth-rate and increased mortality record, due to the actual consumption of the largest amount of alcohol in proportion to population of any nation in the world. There is a saying in Paris that "A Frenchman is seldom drunk and never sober." Certainly in this land of constant wine drinking, absolute sobriety is as exceptional as drunkenness. During forty years of peace, with one million private stills among the peasants, one bar to every twenty electors and only one person in every three thousand a total abstainer, alcohol has extorted a toll of men and money equal to that exacted by Germany in 1870, and France entered the present war impoverished in men, health and money.

In Germany, the Imperial chauffeur must be a total abstainer, and there is a rumor that lately his Royal Master has adopted the same safe rule of conduct.

Previous to the war, Germany exceeded every other nation in the consumption of beer. In view of this enormous consumption, it is surprising to learn that Germany is known as a "brandy" country. The fact that the German people consume as much brandy as beer should be a refutation of the claim that beer is a substitute for alcoholic beverages.

Years ago, the Kaiser made the famous declaration that the next war would be won by the nation which used the smallest amount of alcohol; and, foreseeing that sobriety would be on the obverse side of the medal awarded the nation which should win the present conflict, it was an absolutely "dry" army that entered Belgium. But even Prussian militarism cannot transform an habitual user of beer into a "goose drinker" (the German term for total abstainer) in a day.

Russia's consumption of alcohol per capita is smaller than that of any other nation, except Norway and Finland.

The laboratory of Europe is evolving some startling analyses, and none is more important than the discovery that the wine drinking nations have a higher consumption of alcohol and suffer more from those diseases attributable to alcohol, than the brandy and spirit consuming countries.

Drinking among women is common in Europe, but nowhere is it so prevalent as in Great Britain. While the women of the aristocracy and of the middle classes drink in the home, in many of the laboring districts women are in the majority in the public houses. They remain longer than the men and drink more freely.

In Dublin, according to the Metropolitan Police Court records in 1911, there were two-and-a-half times as many women who were habitual drinkers as there were men. I have before me a folder containing a list of homes for inebriates, prepared by the Friends' Temperance Union, which lists six such homes for men and twenty-seven for women. Some advertise that they care only for "ladies of the upper classes."

Previous to the Children's Protection Act of 1908 it was not an uncommon thing to see bars packed with women, a majority of whom held babies in their arms. As late as last Twelfth Month the Bristol police reported thirty-five licensed public houses with "Children's parlors," where children could be left while their mothers drank at the bar. Even now, in every large city in England, one may see scores of children in front of the public house, awaiting the mothers within. The pity of those children! In London alone, every year, six hundred babies are crushed to death by mothers in drunken sleep.

ELECTION RETURNS indicate many encouraging triumphs for prohibition, and no very serious defeat. The effort to repeal prohibition in Arkansas was unsuccessful, and Montana, South Dakota, Nebraska and Michigan adopted constitutional prohibition. Utah elected "dry" legislators who are pledged to statutory prohibition. Florida elected as governor a Prohibitionist, and this is quite likely to result in the adoption of his policy in that State. Baltimore City cast a very encouraging vote, but not a majority, to close all the saloons. Kansas City, Mo., however, surprised the nation and stunned the liquor dealers of that State by voting "dry" by a strong majority. In California the amendment probably failed of a majority.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THOMAS ELLWOOD.

One day, as Thomas Ellwood was walking through Beaconsfield, he was taken up by the watchman who said he had orders to arrest all rogues, vagabonds and sturdy beggars; when Thomas asked him for which of these he took him, he vouchsafed no answer, but soon consigned him to the care of a constable; the latter informed him in the evening that some of the chief people in the town had assembled to decide what should be done with him and added that he would have to appear before them, but first he took him to a dirty little hovel adjoining the market-place, the home of an old dame who went by the name of Mother Grime, where the nightwatchmen used to warn themselves. After Thomas had been asked a few questions a consultation was held as to what should be done with him for the night. One suggested that he should go to a public house, others who were for practicing economy when it did not interfere with their own comfort, remarked that it would save expense if he spent the night walking the streets under the care of the watchmen; this idea took exceedingly until some one ventured to ask whether the law would bear them out in the execution of it. "I heard all their debates, but let them alone," says Thomas Ellwood, "and kept my mind to the Lord." One of the company now asked the common sense question—"Does any one know who this young man is and whether he is going?" On hearing this "Mother Grime" could no longer keep quiet, but exclaimed that she knew Mr. Ellwood of Crowell well, for she had once lived in service with his grandfather; the account she gave of his father at once caused the abandonment of the scheme of sending him to spend the night in the streets; he was well lodged at the house of a constable. The next day, being desirous of ridding themselves of a prisoner against whom they had no charge, but the fact that he was a Friend, they proposed that he should slip out at the back door. They found, however, that Thomas Ellwood had no notion of accepting any such dismissal; he told them that as he had come in at the front door, so he would go out at it; having paid the woman of the house for his supper and lodging, he took his departure.

It was soon after this that Thomas Ellwood became ill of small-pox at his solitary home at Crowell. His father having removed with his daughters to London, had sent directions that Thomas discharge the servants, so that he had only a woman who came every morning to set the house in order. As soon as his kind friends at Chalfont heard of his illness, they sent him a nurse and afterwards visited him, bringing Edward Burrough with them. Thomas Ellwood writes, "It pleased the Lord to deal favorably with me, both inwardly and outwardly, for His supporting presence was with me." In his convalescence he turned for occupation to his father's library. His intercourse with cultured Friends had made him aware of his deficiencies in education—so that he spent most of his leisure in study, but longed for more assistance; he spoke of this to Isaac Penington, whose friend, Dr. Paget, was acquainted with the poet Milton. Thomas Ellwood quaintly describes the famous man-poet as "a gentleman of great note for learning throughout the learned world for the accurate pieces he had written." Milton was now leading a quiet life in London; in consequence of his loss of sight he employed a reader, usually some young gentleman who thus found an opportunity for his own intellectual improvement. Dr. Paget now arranged that this privilege should fall to Ellwood's lot; to Milton's house he went each afternoon, and sitting by the great man in his dining-room, read Latin works to him. Milton took great pains to help him on with his studies and was much pleased with his progress. But this was abruptly broken in upon by the imprisonment of Thomas Ellwood, he with other attenders of a Friends' meeting being placed in Old Bridewell Jail. In the violent persecution of this year, 1662, many Friends were confined in the various prisons in London. The Society of Friends had arranged that some of their members should have the oversight of these prisons; Bridewell was visited by two honest, grave, discreet and motherly women. The weather was cold and they came with hot meat and smoking broth and bade all who were not otherwise provided for to come and partake. Although the smell of the warm, savory viands was very inviting to a hungry man, whose breakfast had been a light one, Thomas Ellwood after pondering the matter decided not to accept the tempting offer, his pocket now contained but ten pence, he had no further money at his command, but others he thought might be worse off, and indeed the ample meal was soon disposed of without his aid. "This was but a small estate to enter upon an imprisonment with," he writes, "yet was I not at all discouraged at it, nor had I a murmuring thought. . . . I knew I ought to be content and through the grace of God I was so. I had lived by Providence before, and I had always found the Lord a good provider." When in the evening the porter came for orders, saying that bread, butter, bacon, beer, cheese and eggs might be had for money, Thomas bade him bring up a penny worth of bread, on half of which he made dinner and supper in one meal. "So well satisfied I was with it," he says, "that I could willingly then have gone to bed if I had had one to go to."

On the following day the prisoners had bedding sent them by their relatives, but Thomas Ellwood, who had no one to provide for him, improvised a bed by gathering up rushes from the floor, which he spread under a table, using one end of its frame for a bolster, here, "with a quiet easy mind, he rested and slept well." After a few days a released prisoner left him his hammock. Before his ten-pence was quite spent a brother of Isaac Penington called and placed twenty shillings in his hand.

Although committed by no civil authority, many weeks passed ere the prisoners were brought before the court. Then, as they could not take the oath of allegiance, they were all committed to Newgate and placed in the crowded common jail, where they found many Friends. At night all, whether Friends or felons, lodged in one room. It was round, with a great wooden pillar in the centre, to this the prisoners fastened one end of their hammocks, securing the other end to the wall, they could find room only by placing these in three tiers, while beneath on the floor beds were laid.

The impure and exhausted air caused illness, and often death; indeed, in this close, foul prison of Newgate, but a few years later, that brave young apostle of the Lord, Edward Burrough, laid down his life, "to the unutterable grief of very many," writes Thomas Ellwood, and the "unspeakable loss of the church of Christ in general."

A death occurring in Newgate at the time of Ellwood's imprisonment, the Bridewell prisoners were all ordered to return thither, "where they would have better air." The porter did not accompany them, but placing their bundles on their shoulders, the Friends walked two and two to Old Bridewell. The procession attracted notice, and they were asked by shopkeepers and passersby who they were, and whither bound. "We are prisoners," said they, "going from Newgate to Bridewell." "What, without a keeper?" was the next question. "No," they answered, "for our word, which we have given, is our keeper." At the next session of the court the prisoners were all discharged.

Thomas Ellwood again resumed his employment with Milton, and it is about this time that the well-known incident occurs regarding "Paradise Lost," the great poet lending Thomas the manuscript to read at his leisure, and writing "Paradise Regained" at his suggestion.

Several times more did our Friend see the interior of prison walls. In 1669 he married Mary Ellis, who later became a minister among Friends. Their home was at Hunger Hill, in Buckinghamshire.

Of the latter part of Thomas Ellwood's life we know but little, he was a prolific writer, his principal work being "The Sacred History of the Old and New Testaments." He also copied and prepared for the press the "Journal of George Fox."

A man of good looks, of a free and generous spirit, courteous and affable, a gentleman, a scholar, a Christian, Thomas Ellwood lived greatly respected by his neighbors, with doors ever open to the poor and the sick. "I matter not what cost I am at to do good," was a saying often on his lips.

He died after a few days' illness in his seventy-fourth year, "If the Lord hath no more work for me to do," he said, "I am content and resigned to do His will. My hearty farewell to all my brethren. . . . My spirit is filled with joy."

NEWS ITEMS.

The Visitation Committee of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting have arranged for several public meetings for worship to be held under their oversight. There is to be one at Exeter in Berks County, on the afternoon of the 19th inst., one at Wilkes-Barre on the evening of Twelfth Month 8th, the day following and First-day the Committee will be in the neighborhood of Pennsdale and on First-day evening a meeting will be held in Williamsport.

On the evening of the 9th about 1500 Friends and others gathered at the Arch Street Meeting-house in the capacity of a Peace Meeting. Addresses were made by Rufus M. Jones and Leyton Richards and at the close opportunity was offered for asking a few questions touching on the subjects that had been under discussion. It was felt that the meeting was one of the best that has been held in the Peace cause. A Philadelphia daily in the issue of the 10th gave it much prominence; doubtless many readers of THE FRIEND read this report, but we have the promise of a still fuller review of the addresses which it is our expectation to publish next week.

The North Carolina Yearly Meeting held near Woodland last week was an occasion of great favor. We hope to have an account of it from one of our own members, to appear in an early issue. Among Philadelphia Friends in attendance were Walter L. Moore and Wm. S. Yarnall with minutes from their respective meetings, also Edgar T. Haines, Anna Mary Woodward, Emily Haines and Elizabeth S. Harmer.

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING comes later than common this year. The opening is on Eleventh Month 17th at three P. M. It is not unusual for some Philadelphia Friends to join in the privileges of this comparatively near Yearly Meeting, and we are assured from experience that they always find a warm welcome.—[Eds.]

EXTRACT FROM LETTER OF ANNE W. MARSH.

2 Downs Park West,

Bristol, England, Eighth Month 11, 1916.

No doubt we want much clearer and more profound thinking than we have had in the past, but in view of all that is sure fact in the present I think one almost falls back on doing and suffering as the ultimate tests of our religion by whatever name we call it.

Personally I find increasing rest in the inward revealings as they keep pace with these awful outward surgings and moanings as of a great sea, forever tossing and flinging its waves upon our national and individual lives. To-day God can only be found and heard in the inward stillness and if we can preserve that we have a bulwark that will serve us in good stead when the roaring of the sea and the tumult of the waves cast us upon strange and unknown shores.

The war is a pinching experience for most of us and we have to help one another. . . .

The end seems not yet in sight, and I suppose we are now in for more air-raids as the days are shortening, and all the preparations of this sort, which the Germans have been making these past months, will be put on their trial to our damage and possible destruction.

Bristol, like London, is very dark at night. It is quite wonderful how people have put up with it, and got used to it, and also how little advantage is taken of it by criminals, so far as any are left in the big towns.

The problems that are already with us and which Peace will only serve to emphasize, are extremely interesting, but almost appalling in their greatness. I suppose men and women will arise who can handle them; that seems fairly certain, dark as is the outlook.

The great battles now raging are making sad homes for many, and as to who suffer most, the conscientious objector or the soldier and his family, it is idle to try to decide nor does it very much matter. The cup and the baptism are universal though under differing forms.

Is not housekeeping a business these days! Every thing nearly double the price; even fruit very dear this season: one shilling a pound for raspberries, nine pence for plums, apples four pence; bacon one shilling eight pence; eggs two pence each, and bread rising to 4 pence and 5 pence a half quarter!"

The following is taken from a Philadelphia daily:

Haverford, Pa.—Haverford College freshman class numbers sixty. It is interesting to note that the standard of candidates for admission has been raised rather than lowered by the increased numbers; for in the past year, with fewer candidates, about eight per cent. failed on examinations for admission, while in 1916 rejections reached about twenty per cent., and yet the freshman class is larger by thirty-three per cent. than last year. The following schools from New York State and north Jersey are represented: Walden High School, Great Neck High School, Stone School, at Cornwall-on-Hudson and Carlton Academy. Five new seniors, winners of annual fellowships from other colleges, also enrolled. Four candidates for the master's degree began residence for the year. There are several changes in the faculty. Dr. A. S. Bolles, for many years lecturer in banking, retired, but will continue to reside at the college and bring out his publications in connection with the institution. Professor A. G. H. Spiers, who was called to Columbia to head the collegiate French department, is succeeded by Charles H. Livingston, A. M., graduate of Harvard, and an alumnus of Central High School of Philadelphia. Professor Joseph Seronde, of the University of Pennsylvania faculty, and a graduate of Yale, will give two lecture courses in advanced French. For the first half-year, during the absence of Professor Henry S. Pratt, whose "Manual of Invertebrates" has just been published, the courses in biology will be conducted by Charles H. Abbott, A. M., Arnold fellow in biology at Brown University for the year 1915-16, and assistant in field zoology at the biological laboratory, at Cold Spring Harbor, L. I. Dr. Pratt has been appointed to duties in the Belgian relief work, and will remain abroad on leave for some months. During the summer, Dr. Pratt was zoologist at Cold Spring Harbor.

Both sections of Lloyd Hall have been completed and are occupied to their full capacity. Two residences for professors at the west end of the campus are occupied for the first time by Professor Kelsey and Professor Brown.

During the past year, the College endowment has been greatly increased. Gifts during that time (not including two legacies which have not yet been received) total $449,504, including the T. Wistar Brown fund, previously announced; a $5,000 gift for scholarships from Isaac T. Johnson, '81; unrestricted legacies of $10,000 from James R. Magee, '59, and $1,000 from Albert K. Smiley, '49, and a legacy of $1,000 from Elizabeth B. Smith, of Germantown. There has also been a legacy of $30,000 from T. Wistar Brown to add to the library equipment. The total par value of interest-bearing invested funds is now $2,517,482.

Ithaca, N. Y., Eleventh Month 5, 1916.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—

I was quite amused in seeing "The Indian and His Basket" in No. 13 of THE FRIEND, and as there seemed to be quite a doubt as to the writer, and even the authenticity of it, I will just say that Avis C. Howland was the author and the poem may be found in "Rhode Island Tales," which my sister had republished some years ago. Avis had an intimate friend of her younger life by the name of Sarah Shove, who married and came to this country and was long a member of our Quarterly Meeting, and through her we learned the facts of every incident in that little collection of poems—and she gave me some of her writings that have never been in print.

The Annual Meeting of the Friends' Institute will be held at 20 South Twelfth Street on Third-day, Eleventh Month 21st, at 4.30 P. M. William O. Easton, of the Central Y. M. C. A., and Harold M. Lane, Secretary of the Institute, will speak. Tea served at four o'clock.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

"Open-window classes," not for weaklings, but for the normal children of all public schools, are advocated by the Pennsylvania Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis in an appeal.

On the face of the returns, President Wilson has been re-elected.

Prohibition swept Michigan, South Dakota, Nebraska and Montana and Utah elected a Governor and a Legislature absolutely pledged to the principle that liquor has no place in a modern community, in the recent election.

Supplemental reports filed in Washington show the Republican national campaign fund totaled $2,012,535 and the Democratic national campaign fund totaled $1,310,729, at the close of business on the 30th ult. The accounts to date show expenditures of $1,886,569 for the Republicans and $1,126,762 for the Democrats.

Six hundred thousand persons died last year from alcohol. Why are we so calm in the presence of this chronic scourge," says the New York Churchman (P. E.), "while we work ourselves up to such a desperate pitch over war? Which is the more tolerable evil?"

The Union Pacific Railroad company filed suit in the Federal Court at Omaha, Neb., to test the constitutionality of the 8-hour law recently passed by Congress and known as the Adamson Act. Thomas S. Allen, United States District Attorney and four Union Pacific trainmen, representing the different railroad brotherhoods are made parties defendant.

The post-office department is prepared to accept a proposal submitted by Count Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, that mails between this country and Germany be transported in merchant submarines. Announcement to this effect was made at Washington last week by Otto Praeger, second Assistant Postmaster-general. The proposal is that not more than 300 pounds of first-class letter mail be carried by each German merchant submarine leaving an American port at the regular steamline rate.

Under the auspices of the National Committee on Prisons, Thomas Mott Osborne is to visit every State in the country to preach prison reform and especially to expound self-government as he worked it out as warden of New York's Sing Sing prison. He expects to devote the winter to this work, and the plan is to form organizations in each State to push prison reform.

The recent annual meeting of the American Board in Toledo, O., brought out the fact that the financial support of mission work has not failed in this time of international disturbance. The expenses of the year were some $98,000 more than last year, due mainly to the increased cost of living and the fact that more missionaries were home on furlough and yet there was a balance of $917 on the right side.

St. Louis boasts a special library accessory almost unknown elsewhere—a public writing-room, whose free service includes pens, ink, and letterheads, while, for a reasonable fee, other valuable public services are rendered. Its custodian is a public stenographer and notary public, ready to serve all comers. Special assistance in research work, copying, compiling, the preparation of manuscript for publication and similar services may be obtained.

FOREIGN.—Norway has been taking a great slice of the carrying trade of the nations since British shipping has been subject to sudden calls from the Government. The present advantage of her merchant marine looks good to Norway, and her people are buying all the vessels American shipyards will sell. Into such a situation has entered the disturbing fact that German submarines are ruthlessly destroying Norwegian vessels.

NOTICES.

THE true story of Pierce Feathers, printed late in the past Eighth Month, in our columns, is now to be had in leaflet form for distribution at Peace Headquarters, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND.—The Committee now making the campaign for this fund has continued to receive a cordial reception from those whom its members have so far visited. Up to the 14th inst. out of the total of $125,000 desired to make up the principal of the Fund, $46,527 has been already paid in or pledged, with a reasonable hope of some $15,000 more, not yet definitely promised, however.

WESTTOWN—ENTERTAINMENT OF GUESTS AT THE SCHOOL.—The Faith House having been closed for the winter, friends and patrons of Westtown may obtain meals at the School, and a limited number may be accommodated over night, if notice is given several days in advance.

A charge of 40 cents will be made for meals and 50 cents for lodging. Tickets should be obtained at the office on arrival.

E. DEAN STANTON,
Business Manager.

THE Western District Monthly Meeting is now held at 7 o'clock in the evening, supper is served at 6 o'clock and a cordial invitation extended to all their members. Friends are reminded that the mid-week meetings are held at 12 o'clock, noon, except at the time of the Monthly Meetings.

WM. S. YARNALL.

UNDER recent date Grace A. Blair writes: "I have received the following, dated Ninth Month 21, 1916, from Headley Brothers, London, England."—

"We have obtained a special license from the Postal Censor enabling us to send The Friend to neutral countries, and we have been despatching the publication in accordance with the terms of this permit for some weeks past. We have, we regret to say, had other complaints from subscribers in neutral countries as to the non-delivery of The Friend and we are at present time in communication with the authorities on the subject. We trust you may eventually receive the back numbers which are missing, but of course it is the Censor's Department which is responsible for delivery. We hope to write you again when we get some satisfactory reply from the Censor, and in the meantime we hope you will be so good as to convey this explanation to your subscribers."

[At the present writing, Eleventh Month 10th, our copy of The Friend (London) is still withheld.—Eds.]

ETERNAL and most glorious God, suffer me not so to undervalue myself as to give away my soul, Thy soul, Thy dear and precious soul, for nothing; and all the world is nothing, if the soul must be given for it. Preserve therefore, my soul, O Lord, because it belongs to Thee, and preserve my body because it belongs to my soul. Thou alone dost steer my boat through all its voyage, but hast a more especial care of it, when it comes to a narrow current, or to a dangerous fall of waters. Thou hast a care of the preservation of my body in all the ways of my life; but in the straits of death, open Thy eyes wider, and enlarge Thy Providence towards me so far that no illness or agony may shake and benumb the soul. Do Thou so make my bed in all my sickness that, being used to Thy hand, I may be content with any bed of Thy making. Amen.—Prayer of JOHN DONNE (1573-1631).

REASON AND THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

The richest verses in Paul's message to the church at Corinth are probably found in the thirteenth chapter of the First Epistle. He names, as we all know, three great and essential characteristics of the Christian life, and tells us that after all else has been reckoned with, after other virtues have been considered and proclaimed to be excellent of their kind and various gifts and powers have been enumerated, the message still rings clear and "now abideth these three." Other virtues and other attainments are not decried, they are recognized as holding a position of importance; but none of them, nor all of them together, attain unto the standard of the three, and of these one notably overtops the other two.

Paul with the scholarship of a rabbi, says nothing in this catalogue about the place of reason or of intellect, and were we inclined to draw hasty inferences from faulty premises we might conclude that in his plan of a Christian life there was to be no place for reason. He definitely calls attention to some twenty or more gifts or virtues and enlarges to some extent on some of them, but the letter closes without a direct reference to the part that reason and intellect are to play.

The Church at Corinth had been established during a sojourn there of a year or more by the apostle, included in his co-called second missionary journey. The years that had intervened between the establishing of the church and the writing of the Epistle had witnessed marked changes with the little band of Christians there. The location of the city on the isthmus that joins the north with the south portion of Greece made it great commercially and it was not unnatural that the qualities that marked the life of the first converts, drawn together into a church through the instrumentality of Paul's zeal, should in his absence have lost some of the original beauty and that certain weaknesses should have sprung up, which if not called by appropriate names, are certainly made very evident from the language used in the Epistle. Among the sins of Corinth were those associated with laxness in morals. We read that by members of the household of Chloe, Paul learned while at Ephesus of the spread of immorality and dissension among the Corinthian Christians, and it is well for us as we ponder the lessons of the Epistle to have the historical setting.

We have heard from our youth up that the Christian life is the result of a series of experiences, is a growth, very aptly likened to the expanding into life of a grain of corn, and is not something that has been produced out of a system of truth that has been thought out and planned for us. In brief, we have been taught that it is something apart from reason and above it.

Now thus far this is well and right, but there are certain counter considerations that we do wrong to neglect in this connection, and I think they will harmonize with this thought, that Paul was stirring up a people who were given over to many gross sins, and who had exalted ignoble traits to the place of the noblest qualities God has implanted in the heart of man.

Some one has called the picture of the Christian virtues as given by Paul in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians, "The New Testament portrayal of the millennium." If we turn back over the span of eight centuries we shall find that the picture Isaiah gives us of that day for which all other days were made is summed up in this: It shall be a day when the powers of darkness shall be suppressed, when violence and destruction shall be no more and when concord and brotherly kindness shall prevail, "and a little child shall lead them."

It is the continual and reiterated lesson taught by Christ that the child nature is the symbol of adoption into the Father's household.

Christianity is above reason. Intellect never has and never can satisfy the implanted longing of man's soul after God's richest gifts.

Argument did not create Christianity, and though argument has often assailed it and marred it in individual lives, yet despite argument it still lives on and grows in stature. The popular evangelists of the day play upon this fact almost to the disgust of many who accept it, but they have the truth with them. Reason and intellect never can save a soul, there is something they cannot furnish, and Paul, exalted this something to a place above reason, but in doing this he did not decry reason.

We lower the dignity of faith as a gift of God if we allow ourselves to picture it as a blind and groping trust. We fail in our knowledge of child-life if we do not recognize that a child, though incapable of sustaining a complete argument, is rarely at his best except when he is propounding his whys to his elders. "Unless ye become as this little child" was our Lord's declaration when He set forth the terms for admission into His Father's kingdom.

Is there anything blind and purposeless in the trust of a little child? Who is quicker to read treachery and deceit than he? Who is harder to win back again to a full measure of the old confidence if that confidence has been once broken? A child's faith, it would seem, is a very rational faith. He has a reason for believing his parents and out of this grows his trust in them. Faith and reason are not divorced in the child and they must not be divorced as he leaves childhood behind him. As he grows in mental grasp, his desire to understand grows also. He has accepted much of his knowledge on faith and he holds much of it on faith and his active mind strives to reconcile his holdings with reason. It is natural for him to do so and he acts out of harmony with his nature if he strives against it.

There are "deep things of God" that we may not understand as we would wish to; they may be opened in great clearness to others whom we esteem less gifted than ourselves; but because they remain still a mystery to us need not argue against a desire on our part to understand them. There are truths of God's teaching applicable to our condition to-morrow which He does not make clear to us to-day. The fact that we trust Him to use His own time for our enlightenment does not dull our expectation of knowing the truth in His time.

Nature cannot be outraged except it be to the loss of those who have been the victims of this folly. Religions have seemed to flourish, but have brought little fruit to perfection because they have violated nature's supreme law. Our intellects, sensibilities and wills are but different expressions of the one self and while we must recognize that religion addresses the heart more than the head, yet it dwarfs us if we relegate the whole of what we call our religious life to the world of sentiment and feeling. We know that there have been sad wrecks where curious reason has been made to pry into the secrets of God, do we also know that a blind faith has supplanted a reasonable faith and led whole nations into a fanaticism that is very far from the simple Gospel of Christ?

It is true that our Lord's teaching was more than once declared to be foolishness and a stumbling-block, but it was also declared to be "the power of God unto salvation." It was His plan for man's redemption. It was not revealed especially to those who were wise in the wisdom of the world, but to those of strong faith in His power. None the less our Lord's intimate companionship with His disciples showed them to be no intellectual sluggards. They used the powers they had in His service.

We recognize that the great truths of the Gospel can be grasped by those who are not profound and that much so-called theology has obstructed the way to the truth, but as our whole bodies are to be presented to Him, as a sacrifice alive and alert, for His service, the great gift of intellect, that which above all others distinguishes us from the brute creation, cannot be left out.

We are childlike in our nature if we are continually active in striving to know of the deep things of God, if our whys and wherefores are sincere and are addressed in the same simple faith that characterized the little child.

Where in all the annals of Christian history shall we find a man who had the mark of a reasonable faith more emphatically stamped upon him than had George Fox?

It has always been the claim of Friends that we should be ready "to give a reason concerning the hope that is in us." So intimately blended are all the virtues and traits of a real Christian character that it is a violence to his nature to pick them apart. Like the stool with many legs, if we remove one support, though many be left, the stool is liable to a complete collapse, so He who has given us all the powers we possess claims a full service from every part.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS IN ENGLAND.

To most of those who listened to Rufus M. Jones and Leyton Richards at the meeting at Arch Street, Eleventh Month 9th, the facts which they presented came as a fresh revelation of the sufferings of the English Conscientious Objectors to military service.

Rufus M. Jones reminded us that from the very outbreak of the war the situation for English Friends was extremely difficult. Most of them, though they did not believe in war, believed that the cause which England had espoused was a just cause. A number—for the most part those who were only nominally Friends—joined the army. But most of the Friends threw themselves heartily into the work of service for those who were afflicted because of the war. Scores of young men offered themselves for work even in the most perilous non-combatant services.

With the passage of the Conscriptio Act came a much more serious crisis. In this Act there was included a reasonably adequate exemption clause that would relieve conscientious Friends from military service as combatants, and as a result most Friends have been assigned by the military authorities to ambulance or hospital service or other relief activities.

A considerable number of the young men, however, were unwilling to take advantage of this exemption. They refused any privilege that was extended to them as Friends, which was not equally extended to all conscientious objectors. They insisted that they should be treated not as Quakers but as men, and that they should have liberty of conscience, not because they were members of a certain religious society, but because liberty of conscience is the precious privilege of English manhood.

Of the conscientious objectors of this sort—men who have refused to accept any service that is laid upon them by military authority—there are about 2500 to 3000 in England. Some are Friends, some are men of like conviction who are not Friends.

Such a stand means sore trials and persecutions. As these men are considered deserters from the army, it is a criminal offense for anyone, even their own parents, to give them any food or shelter. Being "traitors," they are debarred from all occupations. Most of them are in prison, and those who are not, are in daily expectation of arrest. A short time ago thirty-six of them were condemned to be shot, and were transported over to France to be so executed. But the British Premier was induced to have their sentences commuted, and to-day these conscientious and Christian young men are in English jails, classed with those guilty of forgery and manslaughter, serving sentences of ten years at hard labor.

The brutality of the military authorities in the treatment of some of these conscientious objectors is too terrible to report in detail. The men are dragged about, punched, kicked, beaten; they are laced up in straight-jackets, put on bread and water, prevented from sleeping, they are "crucified"—hung up with their outstretched arms strapped to gun-carriage wheels until they faint away. One young man has been done to death by these persecutions.

Rufus M. Jones read several extracts from letters and diaries of those who were being persecuted, of which the following may serve as a sample:

"Four of them then set on me. One of them took hold of me by the back of the neck, nearly choking me, shook me and dragged me along, while the others punched and thumped and kicked me as hard as they knew how. They banged my head on the floor and walls and threw me into a little cell with thick walls and a small skylight. They then told me to get my boots off, but I would not do so, and the sergeant I have mentioned deliberately punched me behind the ear and all of them set on me again and bruised me more. They at last cleared out and slammed the door, leaving me without boots, coat or braces, lying on the floor almost exhausted."

In concluding, Rufus M. Jones pointed out that the kind of spiritual strength that enables these young men to withstand such trials is one of the finest things that can result from the war, and gives promise of a hitherto undreamed of vitality and spiritual power in the future preachings of the Gospel of the Prince of Peace.

Leyton Richards, the other speaker, is an Englishman, a Presbyterian clergyman, who has long agreed with Friends in opposing war. In Australia and in England he had come into contact with many experiences such as those quoted by Rufus M. Jones. He emphatically stated that such brutality does not represent the real spirit of England, but represents the spirit of militarism in England. The British military government had no intention of becoming persecutors. But they found an unexpectedly large number of men who claimed exemption on account of conscience—about 25,000. The administration of the exemption clause was left to the military authorities, and they from the first realized that any adequate exemption clause is in fact a blow at the foundation of their own principle—compulsory and universal military service. A conscription act in time of war, or any kind of compulsory military training act in time of peace, is intended to impose upon the consciences of citizens the will of the militarists.

For some time Australia has had a Defense of the Realm Act, making all young men liable to military training. Even in time of peace the same kind of brutalities in minor degree were practised upon conscientious objectors in Australia as have recently been practised in England. It is impossible to have both militarism and liberty.

The serious fact in the present situation is not that these young men in England suffer, but that suffering is inflicted upon them. For the time England appears to believe that moral courage is wrong instead of right. This coercion of conscience is in fact an attempt to destroy the foundations of national character, and it is to save England, not to save themselves, that these young men have been willing to suffer.

In the struggle they have been upheld by two sturdy bulwarks, faith in God and faith in man. Through faith in God they believe that God will vindicate a life of love and service, and they therefore cannot engage in any activity dictated by the powers that are repudiating the law of love. They are dedicated to a true service of the nation, and are filled with a passion to do good. They are above all believers in spiritual preparedness.

Through their faith in man they are upheld by the belief that fighting is useless because the other men will no more yield to fear than they themselves do. The more appeal is made to brute force, the more heroism is aroused in opposition. Preparedness is therefore utterly futile as a means of preventing war. Rather is it true that your fellow-man, or fellow-nation, will more readily respond to the spiritual appeal of love and service. Good will engenders good will in the long run. Evil is impotent in the face of the irresistible might of meekness.

Every one concedes that in modern times the only war possible is one which is believed to be defensive. None of the world-powers would dare to undertake a war of conquest, and therefore none of the world-powers could be got to wage war against an entirely undefended nation. The surest defense against attack is to be absolutely undefended.

RICHARD C. BROWN.

THE SECRET OF A BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

An inner life of love changes the aspect of all other lives it touches, casting the light of its own spirit upon them. There is a story of a young woman who was spending the day with a party of friends in the country, rambling through the woods and among the hills. Early in the morning she picked up a branch of sweetbrier and put it in her bosom. She soon forgot that it was there, but all day long, wherever she went, she smelled the spicy fragrance, wondering whence it came. On every woodland path she found the same odor, though no sweetbrier was growing there. On bare fields and rocky knolls and in deep gorges, as the party strolled about, the air seemed laden with the sweet smell. The other members of the party had their handfuls of all sorts of wild flowers, but the one fragrance that filled the air for her was sweetbrier. As the party went home on the boat, she thought, "Some one must have a bouquet of sweetbrier," not dreaming that it was she who had it.

Late at night, when she went to her room, there was the handful of sweetbrier tucked away in her dress, where she had put it in the morning and where unconsciously she had carried it all day. "How good it would be," she said to herself, as she closed her eyes, "if I could carry such a sweet spirit in my breast that every one I met should seem lovely!"

The incident suggests the secret of a beautiful Christian life. We cannot find sweetness on every path our feet must press, in every place we are required to go. Sometimes we must be among uncongenial people, people whose lives are not gentle, who are unloving in disposition, with whom it is not easy to live cordially in close relations. Sometimes we must come into circumstances which do not minister to our comfort, in which we do not find joy, gladness, encouragement. The only way to be sure of making all our course in life a path of sweetness is to carry the sweetness in our own life.

It is thus that Christ would have us live. He does not promise to lead us always through scenes of beauty, along paths of joy; what He promises is to put the beauty and the joy into our own lives, so that we shall have cheer and blessing wherever we go. St. Paul said that he had learned in whatsoever state he was therein to be content. That is, he had in himself, in his own heart, through the grace of God and the love of Christ given to him, the resources for contentment, and was not dependent upon his condition or his circumstances. Some people seem so happily constituted by nature, having such sunny spirits and such cheerful dispositions, that they cannot help being loving and sweet. How others who are not so gifted by nature, or who are in poor health, or have much to try them, can keep always sweet, unaffected by their condition, is the problem. But they can. The secret is to have the love of Christ hidden in their hearts. That will make any life sweet.—J. R. MILLER.

"LET, therefore, our chief endeavor be to meditate upon the life of Jesus Christ. Whoso then would fully and feelingly understand the words of Christ must endeavor to conform his life wholly to the life of Christ. If thou knewest the whole Bible by heart what would it profit thee without the love of God and without grace?"

BLINDFOLDED AND ALONE.

Blindfolded and alone I stand
 With unknown thresholds on each hand;
 The darkness deepens as I grope,
 Afraid to fear, afraid to hope;
 Yet this one thing I learn to know
 Each day more surely as I go,
 That doors are opened, ways are made,
 Burdens are lifted or are laid,
 By some great law unseen and still,
 Unfathomed purpose to fulfil,
 "Not as I will."

Blindfolded and alone I wait;
 Loss seems too bitter, gain too late;
 Too heavy burdens in the load
 And too few helpers on the road;
 And joy is weak and grief is strong,
 And years and days so long, so long.
 Yet this one thing I learn to know
 Each day more surely as I go,
 That I am glad the good and ill
 By changeless law are ordered still,
 "Not as I will."

"Not as I will," the sound grows sweet
 Each time my lips the words repeat,
 "Not as I will," the darkness feels
 More safe than light when this thought steals
 Like whispered voice to calm and bless
 All unrest and all loneliness.
 "Not as I will," because the One
 Who loved us first and best is gone
 Before us on the road and still
 For us must all His love fulfil,
 "Not as we will."

THE PEACE MOVEMENT IN JAPAN.

The effect of the war upon some Japanese Christians, who were already thinking deeply on the subject, may be seen in one particular young man whose public prayers and messages in the early days of the war, committed him definitely to the position that war itself is fundamentally opposed to the Gospel of Christ's cross.

From the Christian point of view, the peace work of Kanzo Uchimura, an independent Christian writer and teacher, is worthy of recognition. Strongly influenced by Friends from his first contact with them in Philadelphia in the early nineties, he has continued to embody in his work many of their principles. His committal to George Fox's type of peace teaching cost him a hard struggle, but once made there has been no wavering. Though a widely-read writer for one of the popular Tokyo dailies, he gave up his position rather than cease his opposition to the Russo-Japanese War. His best known work has been in the publication of his "Bible Study Magazine," which while giving little attention to constructive, co-operative work, does lead most of its readers to the positive conviction that war had no place in Christ's program for His disciples.

Ever since the formation, during the Russo-Japanese War, of a peace group of missionaries, preparatory to the formation of the Japan Peace Society, there has been a continuous work among the eight hundred Protestant missionaries of Japan. The most effective work has been the provision by the Friends' Peace Association of Philadelphia for from two hundred to three hundred free subscriptions to the Advocate of Peace, monthly organ of the American Peace Society, which Joseph Gundry Alexander once spoke of as the most ably edited peace journal. The list of persons to receive the Advocate of Peace, which includes some Japanese and foreign business and professional men, has been revised annually here on the field. It is believed that this periodical has had much to do in keeping such a large part of the missionary body in sympathetic co-operation with the organized efforts represented by the Japan Peace Society and the American Peace Society of Japan, the latter of which deals specifically with Japan-American questions.

The present war has brought to the point of definiteness two positions held by missionaries in Japan, as by Christians in other lands. The one is represented by the fact that at least one of the English missionaries is now serving at the front and others, especially Canadians, are saying that they cannot continue missionary work in Japan if the war does not come to a close. On the other hand, many missionaries are questioning with new seriousness whether international war can ever be right for Christians. A few of these have, through much heart-searching, definitely taken their places with the Christians of the first two centuries.

This leads naturally to the latest phase of peace work in Japan—the gathering together of three informal groups, one of Japanese and two of missionaries, who are prayerfully studying the whole question in the Spirit of the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

It is too early to forecast what will be the outcome of these groups, but the way people with the most positive peace convictions have mingled in the spirit of real fellowship and inquiry with others who desire to see their way clear to the same position, indicates that foundations are being laid for permanent groups, Japanese and missionary, groups kindred to the Fellowship of Reconciliation, whatever be the name and form assumed.

The present writer is thoroughly convinced that the movement represented by the Fellowship of Reconciliation has a vital relation to world evangelization. The note of positive conviction, tendered by the absence of harsh judgment upon others, and the bold adventure of faith which takes hold upon the omnipotence of love, indicate that the Fellowship's spirit and methods are peculiarly adapted to mission fields.

One important fact bearing upon peace work in Japan was dwelt upon to-day in a personal conversation with an experienced Japanese Christian worker. In contrast with the persecution which marked the first peace work in Japan, some twenty-five years ago, this worker stated that, largely as a result of the general peace work which has been done in Japan, peace teaching of the most positive type will not now give rise to bitter opposition. It would, however, be a different matter if Japan were engaged in a war at close range. This worker dwelt upon the fact that Japan has made sufficient progress in freedom of thought to demonstrate the impossibility of stifling moral and spiritual movements by pressure from above.

One of the saddest things about the European war, so far as Japan is concerned, is the discouragement which has come to some leading men, notably to Baron Shibusawa, the most influential man in the Japanese business world. The Baron has repeatedly told of his deferred hope that some light might fall upon the possibility of applying moral principles to international relations. Though not a Christian man, he was hoping that the so-called Christian nations would take some step which would make real in the life of nations the moral principles which as a young man he had learned from the teachings of Confucius. One of his objects in visiting America last year was to study this question. He has not given up hope, but it is a sad day when the wars of Christendom make it hard for the great leaders of Japan to believe in the practicability of the Golden Rule as applied to nations. Baron Shibusawa has said that he sees little difference between the Western maxim, "Might makes right," and the old Chinese saying, "The flesh of the weak is the food of the strong."

TOKYO, Ninth Month, 1916.

"Be content with doing with calmness the little which depends upon yourself, and let all else be to you as though it were not."

[The death of Caroline P. Cowperthwaite on Seventh Month 17, 1916, noted in THE FRIEND for Eighth Month 3, reminded many who will read what follows of her message of Gospel love to the Men's Yearly Meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, two years ago.

It was near the close of the week's sessions, that with the full unity of both the meetings she came into Men's Meeting, and a hush that was profound and reverent settling upon us, she rose with the three words, "Let God Work." It would not be possible after this lapse of time to review the burden of her message; but the effect upon many was that of thankfulness that she had been true to her call, and that a message of help and of cheer had come through her from our common Master. The meeting was refreshed.

The following brief paper has evidently been written with this incident in mind.—Eds.]

"LET GOD WORK."

Bequests of deceased ones have often comforted many and relieved necessities.

An inheritance is often awaited and fondly expected, and yet these all have many times proven disappointing, through misuse or failure to really satisfy.

"Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee; In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk. And he took him by the right hand, and lifted him up; and immediately his feet and ankle bones received strength. And he, leaping up, stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and leaping and praising God."

Such gave the Apostles to the world, commissioned of the Lord, and again and again have His followers offered the same enduring riches unto those to whom He sends them.

"Let God work." Not first nor last, nor least has the above been left to us by one who has been quietly and quickly gathered away from us, free, innocent, peaceable, loved, who being dead yet speaketh.

"Commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in Him and He will bring it to pass."

Beautiful are the lives of dedicated ones, precious is their companionship and we would keep them with us, we expected them to live, we needed them; and yet again and again are we called to yield them up, they are gathered as out of our embrace.

"Keep the star in sight, lads," was the dying legacy of a sea captain to his sailors, the Star of Bethlehem, and fruitful it was to them.

"Let God work;" what more could be done? "I will show thee my faith by my works." God working in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure.

"For poverty and self-renunciation

The Father yieldeth baek an thousand fold.

In the calm stillness of regeneration

Cometh a joy they never knew of old."

She who touched Him experienced His healing power and still it is so, and such as these verily seem to impart, too, somewhat of the same virtue. The human would be active but the spirit so needs to sit at His feet to learn.

"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints, and precious in our sight. They beckon to us, "Follow me as I have followed Christ."

"As for me I am safe, thou art still in the flesh, look well to thy ways."

Let God work in us. "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God." "In quietness and in confidence, shall be your strength, in resting and in returning shall ye be saved."

"In your patience possess ye your souls."

"When a man's ways please the Lord he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." How comforting, not so much that the enemies shall be at peace, but in various ways God knoweth those who seek to please Him. "Great peace have they who love Thy law, and nothing shall offend them."

"Let God work," and when He truly is allowed to work in the soul of His creature man, He makes full and clean work of it.

Then how imperatively does the soul feel the need of His keeping power.

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee because he trusteth in Thee."

"Let God work. Farewell, dear sister. Blessed we feel who knew her, praising God who took her, and believing that throng is again increased, and the melodious anthem swelled by those who only can fully sing His praises, the praises of the redeemed ones. Brothers and sisters, let us forget, not the things we have heard, let us remember the inheritance which a loved sister has left, and which she witnessed in herself."

"Let God Work."

MIDDLETON, Ohio, Tenth Month 1, 1916.

DR. BENJAMIN F. TRUEBLOOD.

"Down the happy future runs a flood

Of prophesying light;

It shows an Earth no longer stained with blood,

Blossom and fruit where now we see the bud

Of Brotherhood and Right."

Benjamin F. Trueblood has left us—dying Tenth Month 26th, almost sixty-nine years old—at a time when "the bud of brotherhood" seemed terribly nipped with frost and when "the prophesying light" was burning at its dimmest. But he always lived and worked with a large faith in the infinite power and love of God and even in these days of winter's frost and darkness he did not lose hope in the happier future for the race.

He has for a full generation been one of the most impressive figures of our Society, well known within our Quaker circles for his large contribution to its educational work, its public causes and its deeper life, and very widely known outside our fold for his large and constructive advocacy of peace and arbitration and higher ideals in international relationships.

He was born at Salem, Indiana, of excellent Quaker stock, in 1847 and was educated in the institutions of the Society, graduating from Earlham College in 1869. For twenty-one years he was among the forefront leaders of the educational work of Friends in the middle west. He was successively principal of Raisin Valley Seminary in Michigan; professor of English Literature and governor at Earlham College, professor of Greek and Latin in Penn College and one of its founders; president of Wilmington College and finally president of Penn College, which position he vacated to devote his entire time to the promotion of international arbitration.

After attending the Second International Peace Congress, held in London in the summer of 1890, he went to the continent and thoroughly learned the French language, without the acquisition of which he could not have carried on his international work effectively. When he was chosen to be Secretary of the American Peace Society in 1892 he was admirably equipped for the position. This Society had been founded in 1828 by the distinguished philanthropist, William Ladd. It had already had an honorable career, though it had not yet made its influence powerfully felt on the national life. Dr. Trueblood threw himself with great energy into the task of carrying the ideals of this Society into a vastly larger group. He was determined that its candle should not be hid but should light the whole country.

During the twenty-three eventful years of his service to the work of this Society the membership increased from a meagre three or four hundred to eight thousand and the circulation of the Advocate of Peace, which he edited, expanded from fifteen hundred to eleven thousand. But these figures do not begin to show the real increase of candle-power which came to the Peace Society during these years. In 1911 it moved its headquarters from Boston to Washington where it was able to exert a far greater influence upon the practical policies of the country. During these same years Dr. Trueblood had a large sphere of influence in the International Peace Congresses, the Lake Mohonk Conferences on Arbitration, the first International Conference at The Hague, and in a multitude of less noted movements and organizations for the promotion of the main cause to which his life was devoted. He was all the time using his pen effectively, contributing to magazines and periodicals, producing pamphlets and writing a valuable book on The Federation of the World. A great many opportunities came to him to give his message to large audiences in this and in other countries and he was strikingly effective as a speaker.

He was a man of splendid physical build and proportions, his mind was well developed, he was a clear and forceful thinker and withal he was a deeply religious man, with a first-hand experience of the vital realities of the religious life. He was recorded a minister in his early life and throughout his extensive public career he continued to be a strong and telling exponent of the Gospel, with a warm and intimate appreciation of its transforming power. He has done his work well and valiantly. He has served his generation faithfully and he has gone trustfully and without fear to enter the larger life, where the bud triumphantly blossoms into full flower.

RUFUS M. JONES.

PREPAREDNESS AND THE HOME.

ARTHUR CAPPER, GOVERNOR OF KANSAS

We have been hearing a great deal about preparedness for war. It is my opinion that our greatest and most important defense against every ill in America is the American home.

This is the age of conservation. But a conservation policy that does not conserve, nor promote, nor foster, nor protect the health, thrift and happiness of the American home—the source of all our strength and vigor as a nation—is an unspeakable sham. We need this kind of a defense far more than we shall ever need a larger army or a bigger navy. Militarism is in fact an enemy of the home as well as a grievous burden for any land to carry.

When we read of the millions of men in the trenches in Europe, it seems to us as if the world had taken up arms. Yet, under one flag, we have a larger, a more potent, a more powerful army in the United States in the twenty-two million children in American schools.

When the warring hosts of Europe shall have vanished or laid down their arms, this huge American army of young citizens of the United States will be waxing stronger and stronger.

What are we doing to mobilize them along the line of independent, self-supporting, high-quality citizenship?

Here is the most potent force of modern times, the America of the near future. Here is the truly great and important preparedness problem, beside which all other preparedness programs sink into insignificance.

It is for us to mold and train this vast army of boys and girls, to have them fit into a useful, purposeful, wholesome life, contributing strength to their communities, to the nation and to their own well-being; or to so ineffectively prepare them that they will find with difficulty, if at all, the place in the rank and file best suited to their powers, and therefore the post of their greatest service to their country and the commonwealth.

Our homes should be what they have always heretofore aspired to be, the recruiting stations of good citizenship, trained in family discipline, honor, thrift, patience, charity and goodwill. These are good Americanisms. They are the very cornerstones of all our character-building in the young, but they are not virtues that America has any patent-right in.

This is the great responsibility that rests not alone upon parents and teachers, but upon each and every man and woman in the United States at this hour. We should strive to realize it, and realizing it, strive to meet it courageously, enthusiastically and effectively.

We are coming face to face with much the same world-old problems which have wrecked empires, vanquished nations, erased peoples. I am not pessimistic about it, only deeply concerned and wishing every American to realize to the utmost the almost staggering responsibility that rests upon him, whether he thinks it does or not.

As a people we are too generally intelligent, too generally forward-looking and enterprising, it seems to me, to fail in this great, big, fundamental purpose of life-home-making, nation-building.

No nation can be better, can rise higher than its homes. The American home is the very foundation of the progress or failure of the American nation.

WHY MEXICANS HATE AMERICANS.

Seventy years ago Mexico and the United States were approximately the same size. In the conflict that began at that time between the two nations, one-half of Mexico's domain was wrested from her and added to the United States, giving the latter country three times the area of the former. That conquest helped to make the United States predominant in North America and settled Mexico's destiny to be that of a second or third-rate power.

An examination of the circumstances shows that, while Mexico was not without blame, the United States was the chief sinner. Magnify Mexican incompetence as you like, call it "manifest destiny" if you will, the fact remains that the United States drove an exceedingly hard bargain because she was in a position to do so.

The trouble over Texas was the beginning of the hatred of the Mexican for the American. Before that time the ties of mutual sympathy were strong between the two countries. So here we have reason No. 1 why Mexicans hate Americans: Fear of their strength and suspicion of their designs. This fear and suspicion extend to Central and South American States, though in the latter region European press agents are partly responsible for such feeling.

But we find other reasons. The language of Mexico is Spanish, that of the United States, English; the religion of Mexico for the most part is Catholic, in the United States Protestant ideals predominate; United States, until recently, has been preoccupied in her own development and Mexico is very much occupied with home affairs even yet. American manufactories, though extensive, supplied little beyond the home market, and Mexico's needs, though great, have their supply, to the extent of her ability to pay, from Europe. Mexico has not evolved or developed a type and some question whether or no there is an American type; be that as it may, Mexican immigrants have come largely from South Europe, while the population of the United States has come from northern Europe, thus representing fundamental differences in beliefs, ideals and character. Furthermore, the descendants of the aborigines far out-number the descendants of immigrant stock in Mexico, which is not the case in the United States. One often hears in Mexico the boast that their policy has been to uplift and free the native, while the policy of the United States has been one of extermination. Though the development of the railways in the United States, after she had completed the Union Pacific in 1869, was very rapid, yet she had no roads extending into Mexican territory until many years later. All of these things—difference of language, of race, of religion and of ideals, which, with preoccupation in home affairs, hindered intercourse between the two countries—account for the misunderstanding which may be given as the second reason why Mexicans hate Americans.

Briefly, then, we have the conditions which in the past have hindered intercourse between the two countries, but a glance will show that what were serious hindrances in the past, as, e. g., "preoccupation at home," can no longer be so considered. On the contrary, the amassing of capital and organization of industries, together with the rise in values, demand for foreign products and development of transportation facilities, are encouraging expansion into virgin fields. The "dead weight of illiteracy" and low moral standard of Mexico, producing vicious government, have retarded development and made of that nation one of those virgin fields for expansion and at the very door of its powerful neighbor. That expansion had begun before the breaking out of the Madero revolution in Mexico when approximately 45,000 Americans were reported in that country with considerable hold upon its commerce and industries.

History tells us that there can be but one result from the impact of an intelligent, rich and powerful people upon a weaker group, especially if the latter occupy territory of great natural resources. So the American expansion into Mexico has caused more and more friction and the end is not yet. Mexican students, who, by the way, are more influential in their own land than American students in theirs, have, on the slightest provocation, paraded the streets, crying "Death to the Americans (or Gringos)." Mexican newspapers have talked of "Commercial intervention," of "Peaceful occupation" and other worse designs of the "Northern Invaders," whom they designate as buzzards and wolves. The Americans, especially those representing the powerful corporations, such as Standard Oil and the Guggenheim mining interests, are accused of financing and otherwise promoting certain revolutions to gain coveted concessions; they are charged with being incapable of sympathizing with the Mexicans in their struggle for economic freedom and are qualified as, upon the whole, undesirable on account of their arrogance, lack of manners and questionable motives. These accusations could be applied as well, and sometimes are, to the other foreigners and to wealthy natives, but there is a tendency to distinguish between Americans and Europeans in the belief that the former are, with few exceptions, enemies of the commonwealth. The Mexicans, in a word, want to develop their own country, however slowly that may be, and though they welcome foreign capital, it cannot be said to be with enthusiasm, nor can it be denied that the preference is for English, French, German or Japanese capital rather than American.

In this commercial expansion, then, we see another source of hatred for the Americans and the aversion for American capital reveals the real source of the hatred to be jealousy, though the element of fear is not lacking.

Summarizing, we find that military conquest, racial differences and commercial exploitation on the part of the United States have given rise to fear, misunderstanding, suspicion and jealousy on Mexico's part. Other causes might be added and the ones given might be developed in greater detail, should the scope of this paper permit, but the writer is confident that most of the explanations as to why the Americans are "in bad" with the Mexicans, if analyzed, would classify themselves under the causes given above.

Just here comes the temptation to discourse upon duties of governments, though that is beyond the limits of our subject. One cannot forbear, however, a word on the opportunity that presents itself to promote better relations between the two peoples.

Circumstances seem to have conspired to spoil the friendly relations between the two neighboring peoples until the suspicion and hatred of the Mexican have passed all bounds of reason, until even legitimate American enterprises are not safe, yet there are areas where this feeling has been modified to a remarkable degree and almost without exception these are the areas influenced most by Protestant missions.

The miner, the merchant, the oil magnate, fibre grower or rancher all exploit the country without satisfactory recompense. The American hobo and even the tourist are sources of irritation, while the missions alone labor for the good of the native without hope of reward. For the irritation from the political, social and economic sources the real counter-irritant is the Protestant mission which, if supported with one-third the funds and one-tenth the men used by the army and navy departments to "promote a proper understanding," could, in fifty years, make our southern border as peaceful as is our Canadian frontier.—CLYDE ROBERTS, in The American Friend.

EVENTIDE.

The deepening shades of Eventide
 Across our pathway fall;
 Once more we come to Thy dear feet,
 O Jesus! Lord of all!
 Through the long day our weary hearts
 Have throbb'd for Thy sweet rest,
 Oh, guide us, Saviour, to Thy light
 And soothe our souls distressed!

All day the noisy world has called,
 And claimed us as her own;
 All day, through hours of ceaseless toil,
 Peace seem'd forever flown:
 But now, when chimes Thy vesper bell,
 We cast our cares away,
 And hasten to Thy welcoming love,
 And, kneeling, humbly pray.

O Jesus! guard our souls this night,
 From danger and from ill,
 And bring us to the light of morn
 Rejoicing in Thee still;
 And when Life's lessons all are learned,
 And all our labor past,
 Bring us, dear Saviour, to Thy rest
 In Paradise—at last!

A FRIEND'S FUNERAL.

[The following has been sent us for insertion. We believe the experience outlined has been repeated times without number and that it will continue in the future, as we are enabled to remain true to the fundamental idea of worship and communion as held and practised by Friends.—Eds.]

I attended the funeral of a Friend, a stranger, and wish I had words to tell of my impressions. The Quaker church is a very old two-story building, with the meeting-room upstairs. There are ten rows of benches in the center section and seven on each side, with a long bench across the platform in front for the older people. The entire west side of the room is a yellow glass window. The church is on a busy street, but the harsh sounds that came into the solemn quiet of the room as we waited for the funeral party were strangely far away. The silence was scarcely broken as the funeral party entered.

I cannot describe the service or the atmosphere of that little room. My heart had that intangible swollen feeling, and my throat ached as I sat through that thanksgiving meeting, for such it was. There was nothing to regret; he had lived long, and, they said, well. They called him their father, lovingly spoke of him as one who had been their counsellor and guide. A gray-haired man who had sat beside him at the head of the meeting for thirty-four years paid him a high tribute. He said that during all those years they had not once made an agreement as to which should preach the sermon. Sometimes one and sometimes the other received the message. There had been times when neither felt called to speak, so they held their peace, and the whole meeting was silent, unless some one else was moved by the Spirit.

The sun was low in the west, and the mellow light which poured into the room seemed softest around the casket as it was opened and we walked past. I cannot describe my feelings as I gazed on his face for the first and the last time.

Such gentleness and refinement! I have never seen another face like his. . . . I could realize why they had given thanks for him, and why they said he was not dead. I cannot find words to express the effect it had on me. It was like a beautiful picture from first to last. It was not sad any more than some wonderful scene which brings tears to the eyes, or music which brings a lump in the throat. It left the impression of something great and beautiful and unspeakable.

PRAYER.

When prayer delights thee least, then learn to say,
 "Soul, now is the greatest need that thou shouldst pray."

Crooked and warped I am and I would fain
 Straighten myself by Thy right line again.

Say! what is prayer? When is it prayer, indeed,
 The mighty utterance of a mighty deed?

The man is praying who doth press with might
 Out of his darkness into God's own light.

The greenest leaf, divided from its stem,
 To speedy withering doth itself condemn.

The largest river, from its fountain-head
 Cut off, leaves soon a parched and dusty bed.

All things that live from God their sustenance wait;
 The sun and moon are beggars at His gate.

All skirts extended of thy mantle hold,
 When angel hands from heaven are scattering gold.

THE LEGACY OF THE WAR.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

The Board of Trade Report issued last summer showed that during the first two years of the war food had advanced 65 per cent., clothing 55 per cent., fuel and light 40 per cent., miscellaneous items 30 per cent., while rents averaged no higher. This alone indicates that with the constantly increasing cost of living in England, as in other countries, there will be a tremendous readjustment of values to be faced at the conclusion of the war. Up to the twenty-third of Seventh Month, 1916, the indebtedness of England had increased—including the new loan issued just before—£2,832,000,000, and taxation has become almost confiscatory in its character. Not once whilst in England did I see a gold sovereign, as in the days of yore, one pound notes are universally used instead.

The labor and domestic service conditions will also be compelled to undergo great adjustment after hostilities have ceased. Millions of men will return to their homes, some content to enter into their old business occupations, but others compelled to take up new kinds of work. Millions of women will have to be turned out of employment, or will continue to take the places of the men. The munition workers will cease to get the great wages that they have enjoyed. There has been a domestic service crisis in London; thus, the remuneration for parlor maids, etc., has been very small, but of later times these servants cannot be secured in many instances except at £50 per year, in default of which they will go into munition work. The Labor Trades Congress will have many matters to consider in connection with the millions of workers they represent. This Congress recently passed a resolution adverse to the employment of 15,000 Chinese on steamships sailing in and out of England, and, while this is a very small matter, it may to some extent indicate the ramifications of the problems they have to confront. The same Congress is now demanding a conscription of wealth. They represent great masses of the poor who have lost their only asset, their best blood, and which will suffer for many decades in disease and in increased taxation as a result of the war. The laboring men therefore are demanding that wealth and property be conscripted to the same extent as are their bodies and the meagre fruits of their toil. All these things portend trouble.

I found a great sentiment throughout England in favor of leaving that country for America as soon as may be possible after the termination of the war. This feeling was not observed among the poor, but among the well-to-do or richer middle class people. Possibly the thought of many of these subjects of Great Britain is expressed in the remarks made to me by a Hollander. Said he, "I have just been to America, first going to Virginia, then to Chicago, then through the West, and then to Southern California. I have purchased property in California, and am now returning home to get my wife and boys. Europe is a bad place to live in, a few men may any time foment trouble whereby I or my sons may be compelled to lose our lives or be crippled in somebody else's quarrel. Taxes are high. I want to get to the United States as soon as I can." There is, however, another side to the question. I one day was talking to a friend—a man of wealth and education—when in the midst of the conversation he pulled out his pocketbook and showed me a United States five dollar gold piece which he carried about with him. He said to me: "I would go to your country and take my family there, only I feel that I cannot desert England in the coming years when some who feel like myself must fight for the rights of conscience and for human liberty."

All these business men representing wealth and culture are meanwhile closely following the course of "preparedness" in America lest they escape from their own now fully militarized country to another doomed to soon be no better.

The brutal treatment of conscientious objectors to military service is a terrific indictment of the spirit created by war. It, too, will leave behind it a legacy to the detriment of England. The writer holds in his possession too many authentic statements respecting this question to permit of any contradiction. The facts are too well known to many people in England, although by means of strict censorship of newspapers and periodicals honest enough to tell the truth, the facts have been largely suppressed and knowledge of conditions kept out of America. Why should the ideals and glory of a splendid people be changed and tainted so unmercifully by indulgence in the passions of war?

The writer was so unhappy one day as to be suffering from what the old lady called "plumbago," when his wife sought a drug store with the intent of purchasing that useful German remedy called aspirin. When she asked the man behind the counter for "aspirin" his bosom swelled as that of a pouter pigeon, and he impressively exclaimed, "There is no such word in the English language; we can give you something made in England just as good." One of the first hotels I was in when reaching London last spring had this sign close to the entrance to its dining-room, "Germans, Austrians, Hungarians and Turks not served here." This trifling incident, along with published declarations made by Conferences of well-known Englishmen may to some little extent show the feeling of bitterness which has taken hold of England. It is true that most of the people do not care to hear the truth and that some excellent English people honestly disclaim a national hatred toward Germany, but that hatred does exist and there are many evidences of it. This miserable fact, terrible to Christian thought, is probably epitomized in an article that appeared in the New York Tribune of Eighth Month 8th, and which was subsequently quoted in the London Post: "Probably never have Englishmen of all classes so completely hated and loathed a foreign nation as do the British now hate and loathe the German." The Post of London, in commenting on the above, says that "generations must pass before the very name of German ceases to be in this country anything but a byword of reproach and disgust.

The sentiment of heartfelt passionate detestation for the German and all his works throbs through every fibre of our national life."

Happily for grand old England there are a few leading men who deprecate this condition. Viscount Bryce when addressing the Congregational Union decried the spirit of hate against the Germans and the unfortunate talk of a lasting trade war. He said, "The precepts of Christianity coincide with those of political wisdom," adding, "Let us avoid, let us repress the spirit of hatred. To indulge in revenge will be to sow the seed of future wars. Nations cannot hate one another forever, and the sooner they cease to do so, the better for all."

One of the great sources of comfort to the concerned Christian when viewing the effect of war upon the life and thought of a people is to see how much has been done for the relief of the unfortunate millions of victims of war. I was particularly interested in the work of the War Victims' Relief Committee of London Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends. They have had large corps of men and women operating in Holland, France and Russia and the financial cost of the administration of the funds placed at their disposal has been less than four pence in each pound.

Many thoughtful Englishmen are wondering what the end of all this accursed business will be. "What is it all about?" they ask. "Will we regain our liberties? Are dark cells, irons, imprisonments for conscience' sake not taking us back over two hundred years? What will we do with our best men destroyed? Will this 'War of liberation' leave us any liberties worth fighting for?"

I am happy to report that there was no personal discourtesy shown toward my wife and myself while in England and Ireland, except a slight one on the part of a not very discriminating military gentleman. This is certainly a fine thing to say when we consider the misunderstandings and prejudices, even toward neutral nations, growing out of the situation. Anyhow, it was with thankful hearts that we, along with some sixty other passengers, were lead like so many sheep by a soldier who was at the head of our procession, out to the pier from which we embarked on the tender that carried us to the noble ship which conveyed us to our beloved America. There is no country in the world like my native land. Our people do not appreciate their blessings. Little do they understand how much they have to be thankful for, because they have not permitted themselves to be driven into this world-wide cataclysm.

NEWS ITEMS.

A COMMUNICATION has been received from Alice Edmondson, of Fairhope, Alabama, giving some information about that locality and the settlement of Friends there. From this we learn that their meeting is held in a small school-house, two miles from the town of Fairhope, and that it is attended by about fifty members, besides a number of people who have some connection with Friends. A larger meeting-room and a good boarding-house are among the present needs of that community.

The natural advantages of the place include mild winters, good air, and excellent water, besides the attractions of the bay itself.

As this is the only Friends' meeting in that part of the South, it would appear that it might have a large field of service. Any encouragement and assistance which Friends in the North may feel inclined to give to those at Fairhope will be gratefully accepted, and any who feel drawn to visit them are assured of a welcome.

MEETING-HOUSE AT HARRISBURG.—John J. Mallowney writes: It is the feeling with Friends resident at Harrisburg that the time has come when the capital of William Penn's Commonwealth shall be provided with a modest, compact and useful meeting-house. For some years now a few Friends have been holding meetings for worship in Harrisburg. Sometimes they have hired a room in a business building, at one time they rented the building of the Harrisburg Academy of Medicine, but most of the time meetings have been held, as at present, at the home of one Friend and then another. We believe that we could be of vastly greater service to the community and could attract the help of new members if we had some place, however small, which we could call "The Friends' Meeting-house."

The writer would suggest that a beginning be made now to create a fund which shall be used to erect at Harrisburg a Whittier House, wherein the Friends of Harrisburg and vicinity may meet for worship and for social intercourse and fellowship, and where, I hope, the really "best books" could be made available for those who are desirous of self-improvement.

Harrisburg would seem to be a most excellent place in which Friends could demonstrate to the world that our "Peace talk" is not in vain. The opportunity and the need of Friendly principles was never greater, the use of whole-hearted, world-wide, Christian love was never more fruitful than right now.

In many other places Friends are complaining that the venerable and beloved meeting-houses are unoccupied; here, in Harrisburg, is a place where there are Friends without a Friendly home.

The writer now proposes that a definite step be taken at once to collect the financial means necessary for the establishment here of a small building which could be used for a meeting-house and for small educational lectures, and for social gatherings, approved by Friends.

ELIZABETH WILSON:—About six months ago the Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States of America celebrated their Golden Jubilee. The 31st of March 3, 1896, was the date when Boston first used the name Young Women's Christian Association. This year when half of the 780,000 world's membership are in warring countries, when women in all lands are carrying burdens grievous to be borne, American members are realizing that they must advance not only nationally, but as the largest free force for work in all lands.

During the present year affairs have not stood still in America—the 342,000 membership has grown to 360,000; the thirteen organized counties have increased to eighteen; the first summer conference of colored students was successfully held in Atlanta, Georgia; the fifteen conferences enrolled 6454; emergency forces were sent to the Mexican border and reinforced the Young Women's Christian Association of San Antonio and El Paso, Texas, as well as opened a new work in Douglas, Arizona.

New workers have been appointed to four of the five countries where the American Foreign Department carries responsibilities—in Turkey, alas, members and associations are scattered, but three Armenian college graduates are in this country preparing for service when the way opens. South America asks for seven new workers; the support of one is already assumed by the newly-organized Business Women's Club of the San Antonio, Texas, Young Women's Christian Association. Two secretaries have gone at their own charges to Bombay, India, the first Americans to follow the British president there. In China the National Training School of Physical Education has graduated its first class. In Japan the new Tokyo building is headquarters for an extensive work among students, nurses, factory operators, while travelers' Aid and Emigration Committees are at work in Tokyo, Yokohama and elsewhere.

The following letter was authorized by the "Peace Committee" at a recent session:

At a recent meeting of the Peace Committee of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends the condition of education in Mexico was considered from the point of view of constructive peace work. It was the judgment of the Committee that permanent friendly relations between the United States and Mexico would be fostered if a number of well-prepared Mexican students were admitted year by year to American colleges and universities by means of scholarship aid.

All educators have been interested in the results of the education of many Chinese students through the income of the Boxer indemnity fund returned to the Chinese by the United States Government some years ago, and the great Cecil Rhodes foundation also indicated the broad international policy of its founder.

It would be hard to measure the future effect on the relations of Mexico and the United States if hundreds of the ablest young men could look back on the United States as their educational home. We have presented this matter to Haverford College, Pennsylvania, and its Managers, at their meeting in Ninth Month, awarded one $400 or two $200 scholarships to suitably prepared Mexican students.

The statement has been made to us on good authority that "several of the students who finish their studies in such institutions as the Escuela Nacional Preparatoria de Mexico have both character and preparation to enter colleges. They are good men of about eighteen years of age with knowledge equivalent to the average high school graduates of the United States." Further information in regard to Mexican candidates for entrance into our colleges and universities may be obtained from Senor Andres Osuna, Director General de Educacion Publica, Mexico, D. F.

In the hope that other colleges may favorably consider the establishment of scholarships for Mexican youth the matter has been referred to the sub-committee on Governmental Relations with the request that they bring the matter to the attention of presidents of colleges and universities throughout our country.

We would urge upon your institution the importance of constructive work of this sort for the future welfare not only of Mexico but of our own country and ask that you consider the advisability of making some provision along the lines suggested.

Dr. Leo S. Rowe of the University of Pennsylvania, Secretary of the American and Mexican Joint Commission now in session, can give direct information on Mexican conditions.

Very truly yours,

JOHN B. GARRETT,
Chairman.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

GENERAL.—It was announced last week from Harrisburg that eight million trees will be available for next spring's reforesting operations from the stock of the State nurseries. This is an increase of thirty per cent. over last year's and is the largest number of seedlings ever grown in the nurseries.

Columbia announces a remarkable increase in enrollment. For the winter session the figures are 18,176, as compared with 15,118 for 1915. The trustees also report many substantial gifts to the University.

The future development of Columbia University calls for a great medical centre in New York City and vast industrial and engineering research laboratories. This development, together with the natural growth which the university will enjoy, will make necessary the addition of at least $30,000,000 to the institution's endowment funds. It is to this extent, says President Butler, in his annual report, that Columbia is undercapitalized. Commenting on the above a well-known weekly says: "President Butler's statement that Columbia University needs $30,000,000 sounds pretty big. But the sun wouldn't build many battleships."

To create a medical school in America which will rank with those of Berlin, Vienna and other cities abroad the General Education Board and the Rockefeller Foundation have made a joint appropriation for the founding of a Medical Department at the University of Chicago, amounting to $2,000,000, to be added to money and property already set aside worth $9,000,000, according to an announcement, made by Dr. Abraham Flexner, of the General Education Board. With this appropriation of $11,000,000 it will be the most heavily endowed medical school in the United States.

Professor Percival Lowell, of Boston, one of the world's most distinguished astronomers and who long had asserted that the planet Mars is inhabited, died at Flagstaff, Arizona, on the 13th, in his sixty-second year. He was a brother of President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University.

William A. Sunday carried Boston by storm in his first three sermons. More than 50,000 heard him, and at each of his three sermons in this biggest of all Sunday tabernacles he preached to a bigger crowd than he had addressed before coming to Boston.

Women students excelled men students at the University of Wisconsin in their average standings during the past year. They averaged 84.8, as compared with 81.4 made by the men. The college of letters and science was first on the list of colleges with an average of 82.8, and the college of agriculture came second with an average of 82.4.

FOREIGN.—Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg announced at Berlin last week that after the ending of the war Germany would co-operate in an endeavor to find a practical means for procuring a lasting peace by means of an international league.

CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITY.

A friend has said to me, "I am a Christian because I believe in God, the Father, and in the efficacy of the atonement for sin through His Son." He goes on and says, "I am a Friend in my denominational relations because I feel the Friends' conception of a militant church, practically worked out, is nearer the plan of the Apostolic Church than anything else that history records or that my own understanding can picture, and further, I believe that the Friendly concept of religion is the true one."

My friend did not stop here, but had he done so, would he have been justified in so doing? To him the Christian doctrines and testimonies held by Friends are very precious. He feels that they differentiate him in certain respects from many of his Christian friends, and set a standard for him which he is not at liberty to evade. Of these friends probably all are doing work for the Master which is yielding visible fruit, but it is work into which he has not entered; some are promulgating what they consider to be great Gospel truths, upon which it would seem that his life places little emphasis; still others, and not a few, are reaching with the message of the Gospel, as they see it, people whose lives are dwarfed through ignorance and clouded with sin.

Their moral standard is as true as his, their love for their fellow-men as seen in the lives they live, as pure, and their devotion to their standards quite as steadfast. The one is not critical of the other, but each is critical of himself, that his own life be according to the pattern set him. There is nothing but love and good feeling among them all, and yet all recognize that there are differences among them, and that there seems to be something essentially fundamental in my friend's standard which they do not embrace.

We do not want to give the impression that we are Christians first and then Quakers, for we claim that one embraces the other, and that the distinctive doctrines of any religious Society should be a natural outcome, based on the rock principle which upholds the whole. The ancient way of giving this expression was, "Our testimonies are a natural outgrowth of the doctrines which we hold"; a more modern form—"The distinguishing views of Friends are found to be, as a matter of history as well as of theory, corollaries which flowed naturally from the main proposition."

Now there was a "main doctrine" or a "main proposition," which Friends re-enunciated to a world that seemed to have forgotten it, and about it are grouped other doctrines which as corollaries are deducible from it.

We must be true to this fundamental truth, which more than all else set the Friends apart from other religious Societies and gave them an initial vitality that has made them the one survivor of the scores of religious sects that took their rise in England near the middle of the seventeenth century.

Our corporate conscience concerning war is not something that we can scale up and down to suit certain unsettled questions that arise and call for adjustment. If we believe, as we must, in the exceeding value of the soul of every man whom God has created, that every man has something of God in him, and that he and you have possibilities which none but God can know, that to mar God's plan for the development of each soul is to intrude the human into the field sacred to the Divine alone, if we accept this, it behooves us to know whither it will lead us.

We accept it in framing our method of public worship. We claim that we have not been misled as a religious Society in this respect, and have through many generations shown that the simplicity of Friends' method of worship has yielded rich returns when we have really worshipped, be they few or many, in spirit and in truth and where man's prearrangements and the fear of man have not interfered with the soul communion, which is the secret of all real worship.

Where the Society of Friends has lost faith in this tenet and has established some other form of worship, not based, at least to the same extent, on this fundamental doctrine, they have wandered from their standard, they have failed to give evidence of the corporate responsibility that rests upon them as a religious Society.

But there is another matter that presses upon us much more urgently to-day than that of worship. Everyone knows what it is, but probably few, if indeed any among us, know the full extent of the claims it makes upon us. Our testimony against war must cost us something before we can satisfy even ourselves, if we are out and out honest with ourselves.

"I cannot," said the same Friend of mine recently, "conceive of a man among us of any breadth of character, finding himself at the end of the present war no richer in the true attributes of manhood than he was at the beginning of it, and all on account of the lessons the war has been teaching him." He must be more long-suffering and tender, more generous, more kindly-disposed, less haughty and more considerate, more humble and more trustful. He must show out in his daily life those beautiful fruits of the Spirit that Paul names in his letter to the Galatians. In short, he must be more Christlike and this on account of the very thing that his own conviction tells him is very anti-Christ, the spirit of war which is everywhere abroad.

He can be nothing less than this if he is true to the Quaker principle. We have made a higher profession than others and have claimed for this inner life of peace, a freedom from all bitterness of resentment and false ambition. The standard is not too high. It is Christ's standard as we have read it in His message to mankind. Our corporate conscience responds to it in large measure in these times of quiet and settlement; may we have the assurance within ourselves that the conviction has such an anchorage that no power can prevail against it, be the storm of opposition ever so severe.

THE QUAKERS AS MAKERS OF AMERICA.

[David Gregg is President of Western Theological Seminary in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, a position which he has held since 1904. From 1889 to 1904 he was pastor of Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, New York. During this pastorate he preached on successive "Forefathers' Days" a series of sermons on the "Makers of America."

One of these "Forefather Day" sermons was on "The Quakers as Makers of America, or Ideal Civilization." We believe our readers will value the opportunity of reading it again.—Ems.]

We are apt to think of the Quakers as a people of peculiarities; they are before our mind as men and women of broad-brimmed hats and poke bonnets, drab coats and gray dresses—a serious people of slow movement; a demure people, who are the victims of their own virtues. They are a peculiar people, but behind every Quaker peculiarity there is a consistent reason. The Quakers are more than an embodiment of oddities; they are an embodiment of great principles and an incarnation of a grand life. Both their principles and life have entered into the bone and sinew of our Republic, and both are still necessary for the realization of ultimate America. The reproduction of their spirit and purpose by American citizens will make real, by and by, our "manifest destiny." We wish to look at this destiny as it exists in germ form in the souls of our Quaker ancestors. There is nothing more interesting or inspiring or profitable than the experience of those great souls who have helped to lead the nations up the heights of civilization and into the advances of civic life; who have led the human race nearer to God and into genuine and abiding liberty. The Quakers had such souls. Such souls looked out of the clear and striking faces of George Fox and William Penn and Elizabeth Fry. Around the lives of such heroes and heroines the history of the world has turned on an axis. They have helped to direct the main current of human thought in the right direction. You call them single souls, but they have multiplied themselves into myriad souls; they have become a people. There is no getting away from the true man and the true woman, from the single soul, if you would get at the origin and history of great movements. The tendency of scientific study in our time has perhaps led us to undervalue the influence of great souls. History has been believed to advance according to definite laws over which neither human genius nor human freedom has exerted any appreciable influence. J. Buckle explains national character as the result of circumstances, and he claims that history and biography are wholly different in their sphere; yet the fact remains that persons are the ruling centres in history. Take such personalities as Augustine and Luther and Fox and Penn out of history and the course of history ceases to be intelligible. Because this is so, we emphasize the names of the great men who stand chief among the races and peoples who form the constituents of our Republic, and we exalt their principles, which form the bone and sinew of American manhood. The Quakers, when seen at their best, stand in American history for ideal civilization; and this civilization is their contribution to the American Republic. As historic characters the Quakers are a marked and influential people in the midst of the most marked and influential types of mankind. They have put their stamp indelibly on national and international life. If we enter into the courts of justice we can see that they have been there: the substitution of affirmation in place of the oath is their work. The jails of humanity show the results of their reform; it was they who changed our prisons from sties to sanatoriums. The dream of that beautiful prison angel, Elizabeth Fry, is being worked out into reality in criminal law, and the remedial element in punishment is being pushed to the forefront in the administration of justice. They have put their mark even on the pages of our Holy Bible and have made it a book of greater power. They have taken some of its grandest prophecies and statements and commands and beatitudes; and by believing them, living them, translating them into reigning forces in the home and in the church and in the state, they have so made these their own that in reading the Book we instinctively associate their names with these Scriptures.

The Quakers arose in an age of dogmas and creeds and persecutions and reforms and religious revolutions and quarreling ecclesiastics. They took their place among the ranks of reformers and were the most advanced of all. They were the liberals and radicals of that age; they were the reformers of the reformed, they undertook to reform Calvin and Luther and Knox. The Episcopalians and Puritans and Presbyterians protested against the Romanists, but the Quakers protested against the Episcopalians and Puritans and Presbyterians. In the language of Milton, to them "Presbyter was only old priest writ large." The Quakers were the Episcopalians and Puritans and Presbyterians of the seventeenth century, sweetened and modified and made over with a new and a large admixture of love. They denied all ecclesiastical rites; they went to God directly for their instructions, and worshipped before God in stillness and silence without prescribed forms. As the complement of a state without a king, they offered mankind a church without a bishop. Their aim was to humanize Christianity and substitute a Gospel of hope for a Gospel of despair. Sweeping aside creeds and councils and rituals and synods, they held that God and the individual man, living in loving fellowship, were sufficient. They simplified things in a wholesome way and struck for an all-round liberty. This was Americanism before its day; this was Americanism out-Americanized. They were a people of great moral purpose. Their ideals were their inspiration, and the realization of these ideals was their goal. They got their strength from ideals and convictions and visions of which the senses take no cognizance. James Freeman Clarke calls them the "English Mystics." If they were mystics, they were exceedingly practical mystics. They were one of the most independent people among all the races. They differed from all the sects around them in that they renounced the use of all force in the propagation of their principles. They inculcated and practised religious toleration. They have the honor of being one of the few divisions of Christendom against which the charges of cruelty and selfishness and love of power cannot be brought. Their gun was a protest, their bullet a principle, and their power the inner light. They served the church and state by what they were. Their method of pushing their faith was to be what they believed and then assert themselves. They exalted the passive virtues. This was the method of Jesus Christ. All which Jesus ever did in this world was to assert Himself and suffer. When violence was used against them their principle of action was, never retaliate. Their method of growth was by patience and perseverance and quiet suffering, and their method was effective. For example, they carried their religion into the Massachusetts colony and planted it right in the midst of the hard-headed Puritans. The Puritans persecuted them, whipped them, robbed them, hung them, but they kept right on asserting themselves and suffering until, by their patience, they wore out the cruelty of the Puritans and brought the Puritan scourge and scaffold into public disgrace. The public, won over to them by their beautiful spirit, rose and demanded the cessation of persecution. Thus they purchased and established for us by their sufferings the religious toleration which now exists in our Republic. They served America by patiently suffering. Their martyrdom was like the martyrdom of the church of the catacombs, of which history tells us in thrilling words. The church of the catacombs was the kingdom of God in sackcloth, working underground, along channels and galleries of rock, to overthrow and replace the armed empires above. The Quakers were content to be in the minority on every great question until by self-assertion and honest argument and right living they could win men enough to their side to make them the majority. In the first days their ways and principles spelled anarchy, but by the slow education of centuries, and by the beneficial changes which they wrought, they now spell righteousness, peace, love. You see, I am giving the bright and beautiful side of the Quaker story; I am telling what they contributed by way of strength and glory; I am speaking of them as the children of light, shining with the celestial beauty of a Christlike spirit. In telling the story of the Quakers there is only one starting-point—we must start with George Fox.

SOME PEACE BOOKS.

VII.

"The Restoration of Europe," Alfred H. Fried. The Macmillan Company, New York.

Alfred H. Fried is an Austrian. He speaks from Switzerland for the "German Peace Society" which he helped form twenty-five years ago. These facts give his book an immediate appeal. Every one is curious to know what is left for a German pacifist to say. Nor will there be any disappointment in his position. From his viewpoint the war confirms absolutely the teaching of his paper, Friedens-Warte (Watch-tower of Peace), and above the din of conflict and the gloom of hatred he sounds a note of hope and of progress.

As a sub-title for the book it would not be unfair to write Dr. Fried's own expression, "Scientific Pacifism." The subject is treated in the very best German form. No detail of analysis is omitted, no mere dogma has place. He puts the world on the dissecting table. To him "cause and occasion are two different things." It is the cause of war that must be disclosed before steps to peace can be intelligently taken. This then is his conclusion, "The present war is the logical outcome of the kind of 'peace' which preceded it." "The rapid development of science and industry has begun to weld the states into a complex organism, and to make the formerly independent and self-sufficient units parts of a higher whole." This principle sounds the note for re-organization.

"Now the world is in a state of 'International Anarchy.' "Only the most primitive stage of organization is achieved through antagonism." "Only by the political organization of all mankind can each nation attain its full freedom and become an active agent of human progress." This is a first foundation stone set by Dr. Fried for real peace. We cannot outline them all. One more at least claims a hearing. He shows by the highest authority that biological, as well as sociological and political law, requires peace. After quoting Novicom this passage is noteworthy: "The stars attract matter; the stronger animal eats the weaker and by digestion transforms it into a part of its own self. But one celestial body cannot chew another, nor can a lion attract cells away from an antelope. The astronomic struggle is different from the biological, and so is the sociological. The fact that the lion tears open the antelope does not imply that the massacre of the population of one state by that of another is natural law. But Imperialism leads us into just such a sea of error. It breeds racial conceit and turns a noble patriotism into Chauvinism."

In style as well as in matter Dr. Fried has produced a stirring book. We should not know how any could rise from its perusal without an enthusiastic determination to join heart and soul in the propaganda for a better order.

"The hour draws near. In millions of minds the world over the thought arises, and the fateful question is put: Was it inevitable? Must it be thus eternally? And the answer swells to an iron echo, awakening and sweeping the world: NO!"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE AMERICAN-SCANDINAVIAN FOUNDATION.

Friends sometimes ask if this Foundation is a peace organization. Yes and no. Actually, every T we cross, every I we dot contributes to make war impossible. Technically, we have nothing to do with peace. After the pacifists have triumphed and war is as much taboo among nations as slavery, this Foundation should continue its work as earnestly as now. A few years ago I heard that genial optimist, Andrew Carnegie, prophesy to a group of professional representatives of the peace societies that the days of their service were numbered, while the international organizations, the Japan Society, the Pan-American Union, the Scandinavian Foundation, and others of their ilk had work for centuries to come.

The above question is but one of many asked about our somewhat novel institution. Is the Foundation a society or is it an institute, they inquire; is it a fund, or a legation, an over-consulate, a travel bureau, an employment agency, a lecture extension post, a prize-giving committee, a research establishment, a news service, or a publishing house? One at a time; we must plead guilty of being a little of all of these. We are also a floating university.

Intellectual understanding, international education, are the watchwords of our quiet propaganda, which is limited to the rapport between four nations, the United States, Sweden, Denmark, and Norway. The Foundation was established by "a rich old man who died" in 1911. The late Niels Poulsen was born a poor boy in Denmark where he received the skilled training of an artisan. He came to America. As a foreigner he was misunderstood, his thorough Danish equipment unappreciated. Haste! haste! haste! was demanded of his careful Danish hands. His American taskmasters set him to work as a bricklayer. His qualities slowly came to the top. He died president of one of our greatest companies for the manufacture of ornamental iron, a business that through Poulsen's genius has insisted on carrying the spirit of beauty into the age of iron. When in his riper years Niels Poulsen looked back upon his career, to him education seemed the solution of all things. If Americans had understood Denmark, its high idealism and scientific education, his own path would have not been made so hard. If he, a Danish boy, had known more of America, he could have steered his own way without so many rebuffs. He willed the residue of his estate to form a foundation "for the purpose of maintaining an exchange of students and teachers, and for supporting all other forms of educational intercourse between the United States of America, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden." The institution was incorporated under the laws of New York, and the control of a body of fifteen self-perpetuating trustees, all residing in America, seven of whom are of Colonial, eight of Scandinavian descent. The three Scandinavian governments quickly recognized the importance of the Foundation, and advisory committees in each country were appointed by the kings.

Now at the end of four years of trial our work has been shaped by circumstances into three principal forms of activity: traveling fellowships, publications and a bureau of information. To date some sixty students have crossed the ocean to spend a year of graduate work in America or Scandinavia. At this writing six Fellows, two from each of the Northern countries, are studying at American institutions, at Yale, Columbia, Cornell, Clark University, the Carnegie Technical Schools, and the Rockefeller Institute. One Dane is a physician studying diseases of the heart, the other an agriculturist who investigates the diseases of plants. One of the Swedes studies roads, the other vowel sounds in Chaucer's English. One Norwegian came in search of new methods of refining steel, the other to investigate the psychology of childhood.

They return again to their home countries to scatter seeds of sympathy and understanding and a knowledge of subtle values and intimate life and thought that in more distant perspective seemed blurred and uncouth. In addition to these official "Alumni" the New York office of the Foundation has made connections for upward of five hundred visiting Scandinavian teachers, students and investigators.

Perhaps the most popular thing done by the Foundation is the publication of a magazine, The American-Scandinavian Review, which appears bi-monthly, edited by the Secretary, artistically and attractively illustrated and containing articles of a general nature dealing with the life and literature of the Northern nations. The Review serves as a link to connect, in every state and territory and eleven foreign countries, the "Associates" of the Foundation, persons who subscribe their good will and one dollar a year to our work. There are now upwards of five thousand of these Associates and subscribers. The Foundation has begun to publish also two series of books, "Scandinavian Monographs," appearing from time to time, and "Scandinavian Classics," authoritative translations of Northern authors, which come out regularly two every autumn.

The students and the publications, however, represent only a fraction of the wear and tear of our modest headquarters in New York. This office has become a clearing-house for Scandinavian ideas. There are, besides the Foundation, three other kinds of bureaus that exist to promote relations between the United States and the North, most of them more efficiently equipped than our organization. Thus the steamship lines take care of travel, the consulates and chambers of commerce cultivate trade, the legations are responsible for the relations between governments. The Foundation may co-operate with all three, and yet our function is properly outside them all. Our counters are intellectual values and our coins are ideals. If a librarian wishes for information about Danish books he writes not to the Danish legation, but to the Foundation. So does the president of the Woman's Club in Texas who is arranging a Hans Christian Andersen program. The dean of a western university is in search of a Scandinavian instructor. A farmer in South Dakota wants to "read up" on Danish co-operative dairying. A local newspaper correspondent writing up an interview about a visiting Danish prince may find the Foundation more accessible than the consulate. And they come in person, both Americans and Scandinavians. Thus a Chicago business man going to the mines of Kiruna will call for a chat and letters of introduction to make his visit to Sweden aesthetically worth while. Fortunately for the small staff who have to compete with this flood of guests and queries, the immigrant has not yet discovered the Foundation, although we are called upon to handle the problem of immigration as a theoretical pursuit. Representatives of all four estates do seek us out, however, after every steamer that docks from Bergen, Gothenburg, or Copenhagen; students with letters from their universities wishing to do research work, lecturers to arrange their tour, musicians in search of a manager, artists hunting for a place to exhibit. Even financiers and diplomats find through us means of making those personal connections and real friendships which the more official and governmental offices could never afford them. So the mechanics of our day's routine resemble those of a legation, except that we are dealing with individuals instead of governments. At present we cannot do full justice to any one of our activities. Fifty students apply for traveling Fellowships where two are appointed. There are manuscripts of five books on Scandinavian subjects ready when we can print but one. Many a long letter of inquiry receives an answer made perfunctory by pressure of time. But we believe that this work contains the seeds of a great public service and that friends and funds will be forthcoming in good time.

The application to peace is obvious. The clear intellectual appreciation between nations that such a Foundation postulates, hour by hour, precludes the possibility of the international suspicions that lead to war.

GROWING OLDER.

A little more tired at close of day,
A little less anxious to have our way;
A little less ready to scold and blame,
A little more care of a brother's name;
And so we are nearing the journey's end,
Where time and eternity meet and blend.

A little more love for the friends of youth,
A little less zeal for established truth;
A little more charity in our views,
A little less thirst for the daily news;
And so we are folding our tents away;
And passing in silence at close of day.

A little less care for bonds and gold,
A little more zest in the days of old;
A broader view and a saner mind,
A little more love for all mankind;
And so we are faring adown the way
That leads to the gates of a better day.

A little more leisure to sit and dream,
A little more real the things unseen;
A little nearer to those ahead,
With visions of those long loved and dead;
And so we are going, where all must go,
To the place the living may never know.

ENGLISH FRIENDS DURING THE WAR.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

These articles would not be complete without reference to the steadfast position assumed by London Yearly Meeting during the present war. I not only allude to its annual assembly of 1916, but to the work of the Meeting for Sufferings and to the general individual attitude and testimony of its members as we observed them.

At the outbreak of the war a hundred or so young Friends enlisted under the volunteer system. They mostly represented the class which may be found in any Yearly Meeting, which is to a large degree associated with Friends through heredity, and to whom the Quaker emphasis on some fundamentals of the Christian religion does not appeal, or who would not claim for themselves any particular strength to the denominational organization. Such cases must be expected among Friends everywhere. There are also some older men, mostly somewhat of the same class, who believe in the war or seem to be influenced by social or financial interests. These neglect their obligations to defend the pacific teachings of the Gospel or to stand for civil and religious liberty. All the above, however blinded by conditions and honest in their beliefs as to the war, are naturally a source of weakness to their brethren who still love them and as far as possible have fellowship with them.

But a large majority of English Friends are standing close by our time-honored principles on these subjects. The greater the pressure brought to bear, the more cruel the derision launched at them, the more valuable friendships they lose, the sharper the assaults on their respectability and patriotism, the keener the persecution their young men endure, just in proportion do they with uplifted eyes and cheerful hearts meet and resist the tide of misunderstanding and international hatred that threatens and assails them. They constitute an example and encouragement to Friends everywhere, and especially to those in the United States who, unless the trend of events soon change, may themselves be compelled at no distant date to make in our beloved country the same stand for Jesus Christ and for the rights of conscience that our Friends abroad have taken.

Considered as a denomination, English Friends are peculiarly well equipped for standing for practical Christianity and for conducting an anti-military propaganda in that country. They have most profound religious convictions. They are not cowards. They are as a group trained to accuracy and definiteness in the handling of church and secular affairs. Their women, with feminine sympathy and intuition, have full scope in church councils. Their leaders and preachers are largely practical business or professional men whose Gospel ministry is free and therefore cannot easily be weakened or touched by financial temptations. They are not easily swerved from their purpose. Thus it happens that whilst Quaker protestants and sufferers on account of military rule constitute but a small portion of the "conscientious objectors" to military service, numerically considered, they at the same time make a rallying point for the many in other denominations who hold the same views with regard to the obligations of Divine and human love.

The title "Meeting for Sufferings" of London Yearly Meeting is in these days no misnomer. The meeting convenes once a month. It frequently lasts from 10.30 A. M. until past 5 in the afternoon. It always commences with a period of silent devotion, sometimes broken with a word of exhortation or vocal prayer. Its activities include nearby relief work, and consideration and alleviation of human sufferings to the very utmost parts of the earth. To these brethren and sisters is not simply committed executive work—they bear the burdens of many of the children of God as well as those of His wayward people upon their hearts. They are reversing the ordinary ecclesiastical attitude in the belligerent countries these days, the attitude of which, whilst resolutely supporting the war, in effect says and preaches, "In the name of Christ and for Him, if thine enemy hunger starve him, if he thirst cut off his water supplies." English Friends still uphold and preach the lovely and sorely needed Gospel doctrine, "If thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirst give him drink." Which is the better way?

I will here speak of some individual and typical cases we came across in English households. The family in the first home I will tell about consisted of middle-aged parents who were for the time living alone. Their house is very attractive, surrounded with gardens and close-clipped sward. Beneath it flows a lovely river, whilst beyond extends a fair English landscape of soft hillsides, green hedges, trees and homes, all rendered perfect in the gentleness of distant haze.

The father and mother were in deep trouble and keenly appreciative of a visit from sympathetic Americans. They were glad to see our Oriental pictures and listen to and talk of foreign lands. One son, who was not a Friend, had entered the army, and the last they had heard of him he was broken in health in the deserts of Asia. His life had been miraculously spared very often since he joined the colors. Will he ever come back? And how will he come? Will he be able to assist his father in the business which it had been hoped he would soon be able to put his youthful energy into?

The other son had recently won a degree at Cambridge with the highest honors, including a scholarship which few can possibly obtain. He is a splendid, big fellow—strong in body and mind and wields a great influence wherever he goes. He is a "conscientious objector." He recoils with horror at demands made to arm the young men to kill. He is one of the few who have been fairly treated by the Tribunal before which he appeared, yet instead of being put into teaching in the schools which are so sadly depleted of schoolmasters, he has been ordered—no doubt as an intended punishment—to work on a farm. There he carries horses, milks cows and attends pigs. He was very happy. The local newspapers meanwhile have commented on his situation with more respect than is usually accorded conscientious objectors. The heart of the mother of these sons is torn with distress. But she hopes in God.

From this home we went a few miles to another Friend's house. Here also was a beautiful home. The parents did not seem to be as strong peace people as are many Friends. One of them seemed to feel that we cannot expect peace until Christ comes to reign on earth. I tried to show that God has been pleased to work through human instrumentalities, and that it has only been through the faithfulness of the few who did not dare to wait upon the future that the Divine Will with respect to many reforms has ultimately been fulfilled. These dear Friends, so generous in hospitality, are no doubt sincere in their convictions. One of their sons is in the army. Whilst we were stopping at their home we received a letter from a Friend who incidentally remarked in it, "We are anxiously awaiting news of three of our nephews who seem likely to be landed in prison before long on account of their conscientious convictions."

When I first reached London and heard about the splendid work of the Friends' Ambulance Unit and of how its members drove motor cars filled with wounded men from the battlefield to the rear or at times under hideous fire carried the victims of war out of its vortex I was filled with enthusiasm for its service and ideals. Here there seemed a work for conscientious objectors to military service to perform. Young men filled with a desire to serve their country, but who could not personally imbue their hands in the blood of their fellows could apparently find an outlet for the exercise of their physical and moral forces. They could not enter into the accursed work of the trenches, but they could help the suffering dupes of this abominable strife. As time progressed, and as I became better acquainted with the situation I learned that many Friends of London Yearly Meeting were concerned about the F. A. U., and apprehensive that it did not fully uphold the Christian testimony adverse to war. Almost always the Tribunals, if offering men exemption from active military service, would stipulate that they join the F. A. U. There is among our English Friends a wide range of opinion, yet they differentiate between being personally engaged in efforts to kill their fellow-men and a support of the system of war. The F. A. U. was not started as a Yearly Meeting project or concern.

As near as I could learn the anxiety of these concerned brethren is largely founded on the following: Whilst members of the F. A. U. are not required to take the oath of allegiance, and whilst they are not compelled on the battle-field, as are members of the Royal Army Medical Corps, to first remove the less dangerously wounded, leaving the more hopelessly injured to their fate, they are at the same time practically considered by a large part of the public and by the military as an adjunct of the Red Cross department of the British army. The fact that some of their activities are directed to relief work among non-combatants is lost sight of, and their work behind the trenches which makes possible the release of other men for combatant service is emphasized. They dress in khaki with the Red Cross on the arm. I am told they are expected to use military salutes, and that they are necessarily in much of their work subjected to military commands. Their members have recently been restricted from speaking with any reference to the subject of peace, except possibly in our own meeting-houses—this immediately limits freedom of conscience. The officers of the organization are compelled to be close to military conference and authority. I have heard no challenge of these statements.

(To be concluded.)

"It is more difficult to persevere in good than to begin; but the beginning is useless if we arrive not at the end."

It should be enough for us that certain things are not given to us. God knows what will be helpful to us and what will be hurtful to us. Some of the things that are helpful to others may be hurtful to us, therefore they are not given to us. Then why do we plead for them, after the manner of the child who will not believe that the parent refuses certain things for the child's own good? "No good thing will He withhold," is the promise. Then the inference is unavoidable: the thing that is withheld would be hurtful to us under the circumstances. The call is for faith.—Selected

A PRAYER.

Let me be a little kinder,
 Let me be a little blinder
 To the faults of those about me.
 Let me praise a little more;
 Let me be when I am weary
 Just a little bit more cheery—
 Let me serve a little better
 Those that I am striving for.

Let me be a little braver
 When temptation bids me waver.
 Let me strive a little harder
 To be all that I should be;
 Let me be a little meeker
 With the brother who is weaker.
 Let me think more of my neighbor,
 And a little less of me.

Let me be a little sweeter—
 Make my life a bit completer,
 By doing what I should do,
 Every minute of the day.
 Let me toil without complaining,
 Not a humble task disdain;
 Let me face the summons calmly
 When death beckons me away.

ROBERT BOWNE HOWLAND, 1826-1916.

A TRIBUTE.

On Eighth Month, seventeenth day, the soul of Robert Bowne Howland passed from this life into the life eternal.

For months he had seemed to be more of the other world than of this, and as the end approached his spiritual exaltation increased, till all who were about him felt themselves in a presence not of earth. "Eternity was revealed," said one, "and life never again will be the same to me." "A holy peace and joy seemed to settle about us," wrote another. "We felt ourselves near the gates of Paradise."

It was out of great tribulation that Robert Howland came up to this nearness to God. Well-born, well-educated, wealthy, honored, he seemed, as a young man, to be blessed with the best that the world could give. He traveled extensively. He enjoyed the friendship of notable people both here and abroad. He collected rare books and works of art. He had the happiness of giving largely to all forms of benevolence. He contributed to literature. He advanced the higher education of woman by founding and conducting a school which was, in some respects, far in advance of similar schools of the day.

And then the wheel of fortune turned. He lost his money. His home and all its treasures passed to other hands. His school was closed—all he had accomplished, seemingly undone. His wife died. He became deaf, and could only with difficulty communicate with friends. He largely lost his sight, and the beautiful realm of books through which he had traveled so happily, was practically closed to him forever. He became dependent for his sustenance on the bounty of others—a crushing blow to so proud a spirit as his. Toward the end, it became necessary, for his physical comfort, to remove him to a hospital, among strangers, where he seldom could see the friends he loved; and at the last, for many weary months, he was racked with physical pain.

But through all these years of trial Robert Howland never uttered a complaint. "My pride needed humbling," he was wont to say, "and God is good." His greatest grief was that he was unable, as he thought, to be of use in his later life. Especially after the war began he often spoke wistfully of his longing to be of help to the world. And in his humility he never guessed that he was bestowing on all with whom he came in contact, the greatest of all blessings—the blessing of a life so Christlike that none could know him without being brought into closer touch with things Divine.

[Personal experience in England at this time we believe is of sufficient interest to share with readers of THE FRIEND, so we enclose extracts from a letter of last Ninth Month received from a Friend to a Friend.]

STILL the weary war goes on. I should have said I knew few in the army, but hardly a day passes but we hear of the death of some one we knew; first an old Band of Hope boy, then the brother-in-law of our neighbor, Lady B., with whose sweet wife I have often been out botanizing. She has five tiny children, poor thing. The night before last there was a bad Zeppelin raid, but two were brought down, one with the crew alive, instead of burnt to death as they have been in former cases. I hear a relative's house in South London had its windows shattered, and he was very busy with the wounded, but I think the damage there was not so severe as in other districts. The noise is so appalling and is heard so far. My sister's old cook says, "You just feel as if your inside turns over!" But considering the hugeness of London with its six million inhabitants little damage has been done. That Germany should be willing to spend such vast sums just to kill a few innocent civilians is so incomprehensible, none of the raids seem to have done any military damage.

More and more of the worst maimed soldiers are being brought here to be nursed. The streets are full of them, armless, legless—oh, the utter folly of it all! They look wonderfully cheerful and are much petted by the populace, but when they go home the inevitable depression must come—and they are such mere boys—with long, crippled lives before them. Our Friends' Ambulance and War Victim men and women go plodding bravely on month after month.

A woman (!) wrote lately of war as the "house-cleaning of nations." But at house-cleaning we don't throw away our choicest silver and china or our best tools, but rubbish. If it were the imbeciles and cripples who were killed off to thin the nation there might be some sense in it.

And good people still go on about the "God of Battles!" To-day I was speaking to the British Women's Temperance Association, about seventy present, and a very man-like lady offered prayer, but the presence of two Quakers on the platform had a very subduing effect. We are incomprehensible animals now, but when the fever is over and the reaction comes I cannot help thinking there will be a great drawing to the one section of the Church which has been loyal to the Prince of Peace. May we be faithful to our appointments! Numbers of the conscientious objectors are attending our meetings now, and being visited in prison by "Quaker Chaplains." R. P. has done fine work in this capacity and we hear that the Church of England chaplain at a prison, although quite unsympathetic at first, has said they have been like a breath of pure air in the prison. I do not wonder he recognized a new atmosphere where fifty or sixty really devoted men attended his services which in ordinary prison life are dreary functions enough. More than 2000 have been arrested and many more are expecting arrest. The "grit" that it has brought out in our young Friends is really grand, and although some whom we meet in the "No Conscription Fellowship" are Socialists of a crude type, I feel that it is all beneficial; these men have never seen unprofessional religion, and have passed it by as what the parsons are paid to say. But these healthy minded young business men, with their intense belief in Christ, are a revelation, and a very wholesome one.

I had a cheery letter a few days ago from ———. He and his brother are still working very hard among the Serbian refugees. The women spin wool with a distaff, dye it with home-made dyes, and weave quite artistic carpets on a primitive loom which he helped them to make. The boys sent the first completed carpet home as a present to their mother. It is a fine piece of work.

My brother's large harvest has dragged from wet weather and shortness of hands, but it is finished now. Government has commandeered all the farmers' hay and straw, and, worse still, wool, at far less than the open market price.

"EVERYTHING good in man leans on something higher."

SHADE.

The kindest thing God ever made,
His hand of very healing laid
Upon a fevered world, is shade.

His glorious company of trees
Throw out their mantles, and on these
The dust-stained wanderer finds ease.

Green temples, closed against the heat
On noontime's blinding glare and heat,
Open to any pilgrim's feet.

The white road blisters in the sun;
Now, half the weary journey done,
Enter and rest, O weary one!

And feel the dew of dawn still wet
Beneath thy feet, and so forget
The burning highway's ache and fret.

This is God's hospitality,
And he who rests beneath a tree
Has cause to thank Him gratefully.

THE LYRE BIRD.

(THE AUSTRALIAN MOCKING BIRD.)

We in Australia have probably the cleverest mocking bird to be found in any part of the world. In size it is quite as big as a White Leghorn hen, with a very much longer tail, longer legs, and very long tapering claws; in the specimen now lying on my table the hind claw is over $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches long. The claws and strong feet are of great use to the bird in scratching for insects, beetles, grubs and snails amongst the fallen tree-fern fronds and dead sticks with which the ground is thickly covered in the tree-fern gullies which form its true home. The color of the bird is dark grey on the underside, and the upper and tail dark olive brown, a shade of color that makes it difficult to see the bird amongst the thick shadows of the undergrowth. The name lyre bird is not given as some of my small friends have thought, because it deceives other birds and people by pretending to be what it is not; but it is named after a musical instrument called a lyre, owing to the cock birds having a most wonderful tail over two feet long, in which the two principal feathers are shaped like the musical instrument of that name. The tail of the hen bird is 18 inches long, and the two outer feathers are half the length of the feathers in the cock's tail, but are branded with chestnut and transparent bands, and are of the same "lyre" like shape as the outer feathers in the cock's tail.

Now, about the home of the lyre bird. I am sorry to say that we have none in South Australia, although we are trying to get the Government to introduce them on to Kangaroo Island, where they will be free from the danger of foxes.

You must come with me, in thought, to the Dandenong Ranges, near Melbourne, or better still, to the wet, big-tree country in Gippsland, about 100 miles east of Melbourne. There the gum trees grow to the height of 300 feet, with a dense undergrowth of smaller trees and bushes that makes it very difficult to push one's way through the scrub. In fact, in one spot I found that the wallabies had made their runs on top of some low bushes that were matted together with a sort of wiry grass. I had to take the same path as the wallabies, but my legs now and again slipped through into space, which was very awkward. This country is cut up into a great number of little steep-sided valleys, the sides covered with masses of glorious ferns, and the bottom, where the purling brook of clear water ran in and out among the tree fern stems, was overarched by a perfect canopy of fronds, the fern trunks standing like pillars, each stem festooned with the delicate drapery of filmy ferns, and some six to ten feet above our heads a ceiling of delicate green, composed of the tree fern fronds. This country, then, is the favorite home of the lyre birds. My visit to this spot was paid in mid-summer. I was awakened early in the morning with the loud but musical cries of a cock lyre bird, the sound coming out of the deep gully below the paling hut in which I slept. The night had been frosty, and as I entered the gully each delicate fern frond glistened with gems, and at the tip of each of the filmy fern fronds was a little ball of ice, which, as soon as the sun was up, began to melt, and gave one a real early morning shower bath. At that time of year the lyre birds were mating, and it is the custom for the birds to congregate at a clear spot in the scrub, where there is sufficient space for the cocks to show off before the admiring gaze of the hen birds. One such spot, ten to fifteen paces across, surrounded with a wall of saplings of hazel, musk and other tall bushes or small trees, was shut in on the creek side by a large bramble bush. I was able to stalk a cock lyre bird, who was performing on his "seat," or more correctly, his "scratch," a slightly raised mound in the centre of the opening. It took a long time to reach the spot, because one could only move while the bird was singing, or more correctly, calling; the second he stopped, even if one was standing on one foot, it was not safe to put the other foot to the ground, because the least snap of a brittle fern stem or stick under one's foot would be heard by the bird, whose hearing is very acute, and he would warn the hens, and away they all would go, and all I should see would be a streak of brown amidst the green of the leaves or the dark shadows of the bushes.

By dragging myself along on my stomach, I managed to get within the shelter of the bramble bush, about five or six yards away from where the cock bird was performing. The hens were either perched low down or standing in the shadows of the mass of tall bushes that surrounded the open space, watching the performances of the male bird. Whether more than one male took part I could not ascertain. The proceedings were much as follows. I have no notes taken at the time, and I may not now remember all the birds that were imitated on that particular occasion, but the following were some of them:—

After a few moments of dead silence, I heard the whistling notes of the harmonious song thrush, both the run of four notes so familiar to all who visit the Australian bush, and which has given the bird the local name of "Bob Bob Whitehead," and in addition were some of the other whistling notes of the same bird.

After repeating these notes a few times, there was again a dead silence, when, from the same "seat," burst forth the hearty laugh of the "laughing jackass," or, as it is called in New South Wales, the kookaburra, followed by another rather lengthy pause, the cock bird listening and the hen birds bestowing on him their admiring gaze, and humbly awaiting his warning before presuming to attempt to escape from any threatened danger. On being satisfied that nothing was to be feared, the cock bird burst forth in the "wailing cry" as "of some lost spirit," which is the note of the great black funeral cockatoo, followed as before by a dead silence. And then a strange rustling sound and a noise of scratching came from the other side of the sheltering bush. Had I been able to see as well as I could hear, this is what would have met my gaze:—The lyre bird spread his magnificent tail, then shook and rustled it, which caused the sound I was listening to, all accompanied with scratching and various antics. This was followed by the sweet, full notes (which always remind me of the notes of the nightingale) of the yellow-breasted thickhead. Several other of the bush birds were imitated, and amongst them was the shrill squeak of the grey crow shriek, and I think the wattle bird was another, though I cannot now recall them all, and interspersed between all this mimicry were the rich, full notes that may be called the lyre bird's true song. So perfect was the imitation that I could not distinguish any difference between the notes of the mocker and those of the birds whose cries he had been so successfully imitating; had I not been so close to him, I should have been quite deceived. On my disturbing the gentleman in his performance, he gave the hens warning, and several of them flew over the tops of the bushes down into the gully. Owing to their wings being feeble, short and round, it is evident that the birds depend more upon their legs for escape from any danger than upon their wings, therefore it is quite unusual to see them fly. The easy, graceful manner in which I have seen a cock bird step, apparently without effort, from the ground on to the top of a gigantic fallen log, makes one compare the legs to steel springs.

Last autumn it was my privilege to spend a week on the slopes of Mount Dandenong, and although it was not the season for the lyre birds to call, on most mornings I was able to get a sight of them or to hear their cry soon after sunrise. On the last morning, as we were driving through the township of Dandenong, we heard a strange sound coming out of the head of a gully that takes its rise in the township itself. The noise sounded almost like someone knocking a piece of wood. The driver told us that it was a cock lyre bird that always frequented that particular gully, although so close to the houses. He said that it imitated all the various sounds of the township, especially the crowing of the roosters.

Some years ago I was visiting some hilly country near a place called Bembo, in New South Wales. The country was very similar to the stringy bark ranges of the Mount Lofty hills, but rather dry, less underbrush, and no tree-fern gullies. I was most pleased to find that lyre birds were not uncommon there, and I saw a nest that had been built in a burnt-out stump, about four feet from the ground. The foundation was earth or clay. Quite possibly the clay had been conveyed there by ants, and the lyre bird had chosen it as a nesting-place afterwards. The nest was made of twigs, arched over. Only one egg is laid, and the more usual nesting-place is on the ground, under some overhanging fern or in some well-hidden spot. The foxes are likely to destroy this wonderful bird from the mainland of Australia. The gentleman I was with near Bembo told me that one day he and his son thought they heard a miner knocking off bits of quartz, looking for gold, from one of the reefs that abound in that locality; this is known by the miners as "knapping." While a couple of years or so before there had been hundreds of prospectors in that district, he had seen no one for a long time, so my friend and his son strolled off the track to see who it was, when, to their astonishment, they found it was a cock lyre bird that was imitating the sound made by a miner knapping.

It has been recorded that some birds that were quite tame in a place in Gippsland used to imitate the sound of a heavy wagon passing over a road made of small logs, placed together, and called a corduroy road. We may be very proud of this wonderful bird, and very glad that Australia possesses the cleverest bird mimic in the world.—EDWIN ASHBY, in the Australian Friend.

FROM THE OUTSIDE LOOKING IN.

The sheltered environment in which most of our members live all their lives seems to those of us who are outside the circle a happy realm of congenial friendship, the spring of inspiration, the rare atmosphere of a mountain-top.

And yet, as the clouds wrap the peaks hiding the humble village below, so you, Philadelphia Friends, on your cloud-capped heights cannot feel the human touch known to us who are deprived of your privilege of inspiration. I count among my friends to-day people whom I would never have come in contact with had I always lived with you. I have found their hearts warm and their spirits brave, yes, I have found longings and aspirations, but so pitifully bereft.

Do you know that the man who knocks at your door, begging a bit of breakfast, may be a man of highest culture; of a family who have been known for generations as standing for integrity, honor and wealth?

"If they just went straight they might go far;
They are strong and brave and true."

but his fortune has been his misfortune; his erratic discipline has made him rebellious; wealth and luxury have weakened self-control; and unadmittedly, yet nevertheless irresistibly, he is manacled by alcohol. We have had such a boy in our home, restless, aimless, miserable. There were moments of ambition; days when he resolved to conquer; then he fell back, spineless, despising himself and his lack of moral courage.

"And each forgets, as he strips and runs
With a brilliant, fitful pace,
It's the steady, quiet, plodding ones
Who win in the lifelong race."

Inheritance, environment and lack of wise discipline have joined hands to unman this manly man.

There is a woman, almost utterly depraved, and yet one night having occasion to use the phone she recognized by the night operator's voice that the girl was ill. That woman drove two miles through the midnight chill to bring relief to the girl on guard over the sleeping town.

Another girl I have known, motherless from childhood. You would think her the very dregs of humanity, and yet the moral problems that she has solved she is absolutely steadfast to.

There is a man, not especially a church-goer (and we Philadelphia Friends look askance at such folks), but those blue eyes look directly into mine; and no one in trouble ever called on him in vain. Once he owed a large bill and was temporarily unable to pay it; but when he was able he paid the bill and interest. Do you not know some who attend meeting regularly and yet feel that, having paid a long overdue debt, their duty is done?

I do not condone the errors of these people; but I have learned that, when you know people you understand why they are as they are; you understand their motives; their sincerity; their warm hearts; you can't help loving them; real love for the individual, not abstract love of humanity. There seems a close connection between the infinite knowledge of Jesus Christ and His infinite compassion.

And now to come closer home; to those who are right beside us. There was a time when all who attended Westtown from outside the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting were dubbed "foreigners." To this day those who are not bred-in-the-bone Friends from generations back, those who come into the meeting by conviction or by marrying in from other meetings are looked upon as aliens. They are made to feel a suspended sentence until they prove themselves. Even if they are accepted we never forget that they are new, such regard have we for conventional ancestry. It has been said that it takes moral courage for a young Friend to marry outside our Yearly Meeting even if it be a member of another meeting.

The new members are pitifully aware of this chill, so much so that their self-consciousness hinders expression or action, which would prove their worth and usefulness to the meeting and community. A young woman came into our midst who in her own environment "shook the country for ten miles' round." Not one thing has been heard from her since she came among us; she has been smothered under our burden of ancestry and convention. Oh! let us throw open the doors and windows; let the sunshine and the stranger in; take them to our hearts; and warm ourselves and them.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

A PAGE FROM MY DIARY.—The Story of Some Wrens.—To-day, our joyous front tenant, Johnny Wren, very early in the morning, maybe five A. M., announced in his singing at our window, that he and his Jenny had begun their family life in the delightful bird-box right there and he was very, very happy in the arrangement. (Parenthesis—We hope they may prosper and that they will let us see their little birds in due time.)

Eighth Month 6th.—We made a little close observation of our lovely wrens who have given us so much entertainment. They are now very busy, feeding their babies and keeping their nest clean and in good order with their growing youngsters. I began to time them when one parent flitted home and alighted at their front porch at 3.12 in the afternoon; in five minutes another fat morsel was taken in, in four minutes another, in one minute another, in one minute another, in one minute another, making six visits with food brought in twelve minutes. Then maybe the father said to them, "Now, go to sleep, you have had enough for a while;" yet in ten minutes more, mamma came darting home with another big worm. On several trips, as papa or mamma flew away, they carried with them, each, a piece of house cleaning, thus keeping their nest all right.

Eighth Month 9th.—Yesterday was a very active day with our wrens. Jenny came in our big front doors; she looked for food and (oh! dismay to good housekeeping) she found it, in the spiders' web under the east front window-ledge. This morning we are very glad to have our wrens flying in and out of their house as they carry food to their young ones. Other birds have been very much in sight to-day, as the light is clouded and the birds are especially active—great-crests, juncos, chippies, song-sparrows, myrtles, as well as several wrens and cedar birds. The voices of the youngsters are high-pitched and diminutive as we hear them flying with the parent birds.

Fifteenth.—Very noisy at our wren-house early this morning. We thought one of the young wrens had got out of the wren-house somewhere near; we could not see it; there was high-pitched chipping, but upon continued investigation to trace the voice, it proved to be a bat which had gone under one of the shingles of the eaves very near the nest and was protesting about something.

17th.—Very chattery at wren-house. To our great interest a small bird's head appeared at the opening at the top of the roof of their house, showing us that the young wrens are very crowded in the house and so are nearly ready to fly.

18th.—At about 5.30 this morning, things were very active at the wren-house, and by all appearances the whole family took its flight. Five weeks and four days since Johnny and Jenny took expectant possession of the nest.

19th.—This evening, in the spruce tree at the east of our front porch, we heard wren chipping. We were very much pleased to hear them again, for we had not heard a sound from them since about six o'clock yesterday morning; we missed them and wanted very much to know where they were; before long, mother wren and three young wrens flew out. It certainly is delightful to know they are safe and around here.

20th.—We had a lovely visit at our front porch from our five (!) wrens—Johnny, Jenny and three youngsters. The three do not fly very confidently yet and their tails do not seem quite complete.

26th.—Yesterday we had a visit from an immature magnolia warbler; coming into our living-room, it sat on our west cross-beam and visited; it flew across the room, back and forth at times and perched in various places as it visited, we had excellent opportunity to look at it and enjoy it.

27th.—And to-day a young red-eyed vireo flew in at our west window, thinking apparently that he was still out under the sky and among the trees. When he found that he could not fly straight on through the front window, he changed right about, and after being on the floor a very little while, he flew out again at the west window.

30th.—Had a jolly visit at our front porch from Jenny Wren and three very lively youngsters.

Ninth Month 4th.—We had our supper on our back porch so that we could have the full glory of "the open" and the sunset. As we were leisurely taking dessert Jenny Wren came to visit with us and I wish you could have seen her doings—she has a runway under our house which she enjoys for fun, she flew into this in her prettiest way and it seemed to me, before she had had time to go through, so quickly did she go, out she came again, then she sat on the stones by the porch and teetered her head for us, then she flew up onto the porch railing to visit nearer. I was talking to her in bird-talk as nearly as I knew how and she was enjoying it, then, as if to do something still more entertaining, she jumped up to the side of the house, clinging to the shingles a little above the porch rail, as naturally and prettily as if she were a little brown creeper, all the time visiting with us. Our attention was taken for a moment and when we looked again she was gone—happy wren.—ANNA WOOLMAN.

NEWS ITEMS.

READERS OF THE FRIEND will recall that sixteen months ago funds were raised for casting a bronze tablet containing the prayer of William Penn for Philadelphia. After long delay this tablet is now in a fair way to be completed, and in a few weeks the contractors promise to have it in place in its new location. This will be in a recess on the east wall of the passage through the City Hall, looking north, up Broad Street, immediately within the archway.

The design has been drawn by the Acting City Architect, Louis E. Marie, and has been passed by the Art Jury, so there will be no more tantalizing delays and objections. This tablet will be well lighted by day and night, and conforms to the high arched recess in which it will find place.

ISAAC SHARPLESS has resigned as President of Haverford College. The resignation is to become effective at the end of the current college year. His term of service covers a period of thirty years.

WILLIAM EVANS,

Dear Friend:—I am in receipt of thy letter as to The Friend [London]. I understand there has been a great deal of difficulty in getting this into neutral countries during the last few months. I myself paid for copies to go to Switzerland which were, however, not delivered. A representative of The Friend informed me last week that after much trouble the Censor has made a concession and assured them that there shall be no further trouble with copies of The Friend sent abroad. I will pass thy letter on to the publishers of The Friend, who may like to reply personally. Our Meeting for Sufferings has not had the subject before it at all.

With kind regards,

Thine sincerely,

ISAAC SHARP.

ELEVENTH MONTH 9, 1916.

[Since the above was written a package of 16 copies of The Friend [London] has been received at our office.—EDITORS.]

The total number of men arrested and handed over to the military authorities by the English Tribunals was 2,734 on Eleventh Month 3rd. Of these, 806 are working under the Home Office scheme; 156 have been released on various grounds. Of these about 500 are Friends. Stephen Hobhouse, whose acquaintance many American Friends made a few years ago when he was in this country, writes from prison:—

"We had a fine country tramp this morning. . . . I manage to pick a few flowers from the autumn hedergeros, as we skirt them, so our 'dining table' of trestle beds is gay with ragwort, hips, and milfoil. It is a grief to me that few of the soldiers here seem to be learning to love the hills and woods; they long for the excitement of the great city again.

. . . . It will be a sad winter. I feel with prices still rising, but visions of the redeemed City of God will float in, blotting out the sordidness of outward things. How gladly we may give our lives to be the building stones of that city! And the greatest task of all is patience, God's endless, tireless patience, year after year."

Rodley Dixon, who when first called up by the military, was returned as medically unfit, was called up again a few weeks ago and induced to join the colors. After some time, he felt he could not remain in what was to him an equivocal position. As he said to his relatives, his conscience would assert itself: his rifle "felt like fire" in his hands and he realized that he could not take life whatever the consequences to himself. He was court-martialed on the 30th ult., and was sentenced to 84 days' imprisonment. He was sent to Wornwood Scrubs on Eleventh Month 3rd.

The following cheering messages come from Japan:

"The Quakers in Japan, led by Gilbert Dowles, are true to the traditions of their people in the testimony they are giving in behalf of peace. Militarism in Japan has its roots sunk deep in Japanese history. For a thousand years the military clans have been predominant in the affairs of the nation. Notwithstanding the immense growth of industrialism and education in recent times, the military ideal still holds foremost place. . . . What a splendid location the Friends' Mission has for its schools, its houses of worship and its residences! Not far from the Keio University, in the vicinity of Shiba Park, and in one of the best residence neighborhoods of Tokyo, the mission headquarters they have established give to the missionaries responsible for this work a great point of advantage in the capital of the Empire."—S. H. WAINWRIGHT.

For some years a growing need has been felt for a new meeting-house, situated off the mission compound, where men and women of all classes and ages could come together for worship. During the past summer this need was put before one of the members of our Association, with the result that a promise has been made of $15,000 for this purpose. The money is given by Agnes Brown Leach, in memory of her grandmother, Elizabeth Farnum, and her mother, Mary Farnum Brown, both of whom were greatly interested in the Tokyo Mission in its early beginnings.

Another gift has come to us, which we gratefully acknowledge. In Horace Coleman's work for young men, he has felt that a dormitory should be built which would offer a Christian home for students who attend the universities in Tokyo—a place where they could be surrounded by the best influences and where institutional work could be carried on. We feel that this building can now be a reality through the generous gift of $7,500, given by one of our members as a memorial.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Elsa Ueland has been appointed President of Carson College, the school for orphan girls whose buildings are about to rise at Flourtown. This is the institution for which the will of Robert N. Carson provided, which is to be created at a cost of about $4,000,000 on his beautiful estate, Erdenheim, of eighty-seven acres, in the Whitemarsh Valley, a mile and a half north of Chestnut Hill.

It is stated that forty scholarships will be established at Pennsylvania State College by the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor for the education of skilled tradesmen and women members of labor organizations.

Representatives of the Russian Government signed a contract with the Baldwin Locomotive Works for forty locomotives to cost approximately $1,250,000. This information was confirmed by Alha B. Johnson, President of the company. The order swells the total contracts signed by the Baldwin Company in the last two weeks to 100 locomotives, with an aggregate value of $3,500,000. The remaining sixty-nine are for domestic roads.

GENERAL.—The Independent summarized the result of the election as follows:—"President Wilson will enter upon his second term a majority President, which he was not at his first election. He received over a million more votes this year than four years ago. He has a majority in the Electoral College of ten votes, and a popular plurality of something over 400,000 votes. This is the smallest electoral majority since the famous contested election of President Hayes in 1876; and the smallest popular plurality since the second election of Grover Cleveland in 1892. McKinley at his two elections received popular pluralities of 600,000 and 850,000, respectively, Roosevelt a plurality of two and a half million and Taft a plurality of a million and a quarter."

The largest orders ever placed by the New York Bible Society have just been given to two publishing houses. One is to a house in London for 150,000 copies of the Scriptures, the other is to a western house for 100,000 volumes, making a total of 250,000 copies of the Scriptures. If all of the quarter of a million volumes of the Scriptures just ordered were put together in line, they would reach for a distance of about twenty miles.

While Secretary Daniels was awarding contracts for armorplate, the appropriation subcommittee of the House Naval Committee began work on the 1918 estimates, the heaviest in American history, to be presented to Congress this winter. The estimates are said to total $379,000,000.

The election adds to the nineteen prohibition States four more, Michigan, Montana, Nebraska and South Dakota, with the prospect of two others, Utah and Florida, coming in later. Half of the States, and, if we include Alaska, more than half of the area of continental United States, are now dry territory. Besides this, liquor is now excluded by local option or high license from a large part of most of the other states.

The "Clean-Up Campaign" in twenty counties of Virginia brought these returns: Dwellings painted, 35; dwellings whitewashed, 311; homes cleaned, 1,006; fences repaired and built, 121; out-buildings whitewashed, 370; homes screened, 51; yards cleaned, 1,029; sanitary closets built, 67; closets repaired, 21; barns and out-buildings cleaned, 138; wells and springs improved, 130; schools and school yards cleaned, 47; churches better ventilated, 20.

It is said that to date the war has cost sixty billions. It takes a sum equal to our own greatest national debt at the close of the war to save the Union to pay even the annual interest on this new debt of Europe.

FOREIGN.—Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary, died on the 21st, aged eighty-six. He had ruled the Dual Monarchy sixty-seven years.

The following is a despatch from Rome, dated the 18th: "Rigid economy throughout the world in the consumption of food, in view of the deficient crops and the extraordinary requirements of the European armies, is urged by the International Institute of Agriculture, which has made the most extensive report it has issued since the war began. The Institute says all nations are confronted with a grave situation."

A royal proclamation issued in London on the 23rd, declares that henceforth gold, silver and paper money, securities, checks, drafts, letters of credit and any negotiable instruments or documents relating to the transfer of money, credit or securities will be treated as contraband.

NOTICES.

TEACHERS RETIREMENT FUND.—Up to Eleventh Month 27th, the amount actually paid was over $38,000, with some $20,000 more pledged for future payments, and perhaps $15,000 more confidently expected from Friends who have been approached, but who have not yet definitely pledged themselves. The Committee in charge has reason to expect that nearly the full amount of the fund, $125,000, will be raised during this campaign.

BY-PRODUCTS.

Industrial Germany is said to have been largely created out of by-products. The frugal German mind in dealing with industrial production has first of all seen fortunes in the waste of many ordinary processes of manufacture.

Secondly, it has been able to develop these ordinary processes, so that instead of a single product there would be two or often more than two products from one process. Indeed, a series of products has been found to be possible in not a few cases, as in dealing with petroleum and coal tar.

It may seem commonplace to point out that something very similar to the phenomenon of by-products in industry takes place in the development of human character. What is a conscious effort in the one case becomes, however, so largely unconscious in the other, that we may easily lose sight of its significance. In that event our relation to by-products of human character is very much that of a manufacturer who proceeds year by year in ignorance of unappropriated values, and so actually sacrifices a large margin of profit and usefulness. We need to hold ourselves in character-building somewhat rigidly to standards of complete production.

In a Friends' Conference no great time ago the development of Christian character was claimed by a young Friend to be dependent in large degree upon "Instant obedience to the Divine promptings." It may at least be said that this principle has been a fundamental in making the kind of Christian community that the Society of Friends has been during much of the past two hundred and fifty years. What interests us very particularly about this "instant obedience," is that as a process in character-building it gives rise to a series of products, rather than to a single one. In the average well concerned Friend numerous by-products of the greatest value and often of the greatest beauty as well can be connected with the development of this simple principle. First of all "instant obedience" shuts individuals off from that common type of character described as "drifting with the current." It makes individualists; stands men and women fairly on their feet—"four square to all the world," is the general description of such Divine-human products. Directly it is clear of such that they are becoming more and more perfectly schooled in self-restraint and in self-denial. The details of life, conduct and conversation have thus a pattern of their own and reflect the principle of which they are by-products. It is not possible for a Christian of this instant-obedience type to conceal himself for long behind ordinary convention. He makes such a mark upon his environment that those who look on from the outside as well as those who have the inside view perceive a difference. And herein lies a difficulty which the Society of Friends has had to face and a difficulty which it must be confessed individuals have too often failed to face successfully.

A principle like this of instant obedience to first-hand commands of the Master of life does create a type of its own in self-restraint and moderation; in "plainness," if we use the term of our Discipline. But no sooner is such a type created, than it becomes so easy to "put on" the marks of difference from the outside, that even the principle itself as a principle for the control of life becomes discredited. Without descending to details, any who are interested can easily perceive a large territory in which this of which we write has become sadly operative. Protestants against form have become mere formalists. The unescapable fact, however, is that the best Christian character is made on the "instant-obedience" principle, and that the process of making such character yields naturally and easily a whole series of by-products which we have sometimes called minor testimonies. We hail the revival, especially by the young, of this great character-forming principle. If we accept it we shall not be a characterless people. Very certainly we shall not be a people devoted to empty forms.

The principle itself gives large scope for variety, it is the open door to real liberty in personal characteristics, it is unfailing in its charity if it is the real thing, but it does not know how to believe that the great process of personal obedience can go on and produce no visible fruit. It puts the emphasis, true enough, on the invisible product, but expects this to shine through the roughest material and to irradiate the most obscure life.

Times like the present put fundamental principles such as this of instant-obedience to searching tests. So it is not surprising to find new expressions that indicate a return in some measure to the original ideas of simplicity and self-denial that marked two centuries of our history. This from a recent message to all Friends by a committee of London Yearly Meeting is at least in this direction: "That we shall seek for a way of living that will free us from the bondage of material things and mere convention, that will raise no barrier against brotherly comradeship with all, and will put no oppressive burden of labor upon any by reason of our superfluous demands." That may mean something quite different from the ordinary efforts for sincerity and simplicity.

If so, such efforts are not on the basis for which we plead. Any protest of form against "mere convention" and "superfluous demands," is a wholly different thing from an active determination to let the in-speaking Word work itself out in our lives in direct product and in by-product as well. THE QUAKERS AS MAKERS OF AMERICA.

FROM ADDRESS BY DAVID GREGG.

In George Fox we find the traits and principles and hopes and methods and life of Quakers at their best. He represents the heroic age of the Quakers. He gave Quakerism as a life and started it out on its thrilling career to march through England and Holland and America. This has been the order and growth of Quakerism: George Fox gave the world a Quaker life. Robert Barclay took the doctrines and principles and purposes out of which that Quaker life was constructed and built these into a terse, clear, logical Quaker system. It was necessary to build such a theological system for the purpose of defense under attack and misrepresentation, and as a fair treatment of the public. This formulated the Quaker system Edward Burroughs took and carried out to the world and expounded and preached, and by the conversions which he made built up into a Quaker society. Then came William Penn who took the life of Fox, and the system of Barclay, and the converts of Burrough, and built all into a Quaker commonwealth, which gave Quakers the civil embodiment of their cherished ideals and which gave America the powerful colony of Pennsylvania, a bulwark in the defense of freedom. After this came John Greenleaf Whittier, who took the commonwealth and the converts and the system and the life and beautified all. With chiseled words and sculptured cadences he built Quakerism into a cathedral-like poem of liberty, full of reverence for God and of appreciation of man and of praise for the truth. George Fox, who was the spiritual father of the Quakers, was born in 1624. This makes him a child of the seventeenth century. Did he rise to power in that century? Was he so endowed and did he assert himself so as to make for himself an immortal name among immortal men? If so, he was a man among men. That was a powerful century and brought forth wonderful products. It was a century when every weakling was relegated to obscurity; for George Fox to make his mark in that century is all the evidence required to prove him a great man. This was the century of great religious wars; this was the century of great books and measures and men. If you except the Bible, the most democratic books ever published were published in this century. Cervantes published "Don Quixote," which set all the world laughing at sham aristocracies and mock heroisms; that book helped to turn away the human mind from the worship of the false and artificial. Shakespeare's dramas were published then; his works tended toward human equality; they made kings and queens only men and women like their subjects. Bacon's works were published then; these taught men to feel it not only their right, but their duty, to look with eyes undimmed by a church creed at all things which the Lord had created. Bacon's works made it possible for Newton to open the heavens, Watt the air, Lyell the earth, and Darwin animal life. "The Pilgrim's Progress" was published in that century; so was "Paradise Lost," so was Baxter's "Saint's Rest," and so was the authorized version of the Bible, which gave the Book to the common people. The Book is the ever-enduring Magna Charta of civil and religious liberty. This was the century of the Westminster divines, with their catechisms and confession of faith. This was the century of Cromwell's guns. Can George Fox rise in this century? Can he in this century found a sect which shall live and prevail and modify society, and add freedom to freedom, and inaugurate reforms which, when carried out, will realize the ideal civilization? Can he lead in the strike for independence in an age when the whole trend of things is toward independence? He does.

George Fox had a profound sense of the length and breadth of the love which God had for mankind, and this made him the philanthropist he was. "All men are members of the family of the All Father and are brothers." In his journal he says: "I saw the infinite love of God." God's love to man inspired his doing good to all men; hence he inaugurated help for the helpless and led in prison reforms and charities, and in the organization of societies for the emancipation of all human brothers in slavery; hence he inaugurated movements looking to the abolition of the horrid and ungodly practice of brother man shooting down brother man, hence he protested against imprisonment for debt and against the infliction of capital punishment for minor crimes. From the brotherhood of man he evolved, under the teaching of the Spirit, the doctrine of human equality. He made woman the equal of man, and to establish her equality gave to her her full half of the meeting-house. He argued, if men are equal, why should some be greeted with idolatrous titles, and receive obeisance from others, and be addressed in flattering pronouns? With him every brother man stood for just one, and that one was no better than his neighbor; hence he refused to doff his hat to any man, or address any man as "your reverence," "your holiness," "your grace," "your honor," hence he called men by their Christian names, treating all alike. William Penn, following his example, addressed even King Charles II. as "Friend Charles." There was democracy in that. Hence he introduced the use of the pronouns "thee" and "thou" into conversation as a protest against caste. William Penn has built up a grammatical argument for the use of these pronouns; "thee" and "thou" are singular pronouns; "you" is the plural pronoun. Why should any single man be addressed as though he were plural—as though he were a regiment in one? A plural pronoun used in the place of a singular pronoun is a species of flattery for the purpose of magnifying a man or a woman. Recognizing that man is the brother of man, George Fox labored to promote honesty and truthfulness between man and man. This led him to secure a fixity of price for goods in all the trades, a custom which is now established. This led to simplicity of speech in conversation. He argued for the abolition of the oath, for the reason that he would have every word uttered by man as true as an oath. That honesty and truthfulness might be made easy, he argued for an all around simplicity of life, and protested against extravagance and waste and vanity and idle luxury and the senseless change of fashion. Such was George Fox, and such were the doctrines and practices which he contributed to civilization. George Fox was a magnificent freeman, and he introduced into the world of thought and life that genius of liberty which was calculated to make every other man a freeman like himself. How did these legacies which George Fox contributed to America reach America? He brought them himself. The man himself trod the very ground we to-day tread. He traveled through the American colonies for the express purpose of asserting himself and his gospel of liberty. After he had worked out his mission here he went back to England to find a grave, and there he died, saying: "I am clear, I am clear." And was he not clear? What man ever left the world having done his duty more fearlessly, or having declared more completely all the counsel of God as he understood it, or having given to the world grander ideals for the coming civilization? But the principles of George Fox came to America not only in the person of George Fox himself; they came also in the persons of his many followers, who settled in all the colonies, but notably in Massachusetts and Rhode Island and Pennsylvania. In most of the colonies they had patiently to work their way into recognition. This was especially so in Massachusetts. The first thing which met the Quakers there was persecution, and that from the holy Puritans. This is one of the stains which rest on the memory of the Puritans. It is vain to try to excuse it, for it cannot be excused; it can only be admitted and apologized for. In former years I offered my service to the Puritans and made a special plea in their defense, but I now beg leave to withdraw from the case.

(To be concluded.)

UNDER ONE ROOF.

Therefore at each moment can we joyfully exclaim: in spite of time, death and change, we are still all together.—SCHOPENHAUER.

Once, in days of long ago,
Days—of my whole life the best—
When the time for sleep had come,
And the house was hushed to rest,
It was such a happy thought,
Used to make my heart so light,
We were all beneath one roof
When I barred the door at night.

Let the wind moan as it would,
Let the rain-drops patter fast,
They were near me, nestled warm
From the midnight and the blast!
Not one lingering out of reach,
Not one banished far aloof—
It's a woman's heaven to have
All she loves beneath one roof.

How to-night the Autumn wind
Through the keyhole whistles shrill;
It must roar amongst the firs
In that graveyard on the hill.
Dying leaves are whirled aloft,
Swaying branches knock the pane,
In the pauses of the wind
Listen! Oh, the rain, the rain!

Now, when bed-time comes at length
To me, sitting here alone,
And the ticking of the clock
Tells how still the house has grown,
Oh, how heavy is the heart.
That was once so light of yore;
Now—I seem to bar them out
When at night I bar the door.

But our Father surely needs
All His dear ones near Him still;
Are we not at home with Him,
In the house, or on the hill?
So I fill my empty heart
With the thought that, far above,
Over them, as over me,
Spreads one roof of Heavenly Love.

So I can go up to bed,
Pass the doors where once I heard
Gentle breathing, as I crept
Softly by, without a word;
Though the house is silent now,
Though they wish me no good night—
We are still beneath one roof—
When I bar the door at night.

MILITARY TRAINING AND THE BOY SCOUTS.

JAMES E. WEST.

[The following is part of an address given before the N. E. A. at New York last summer and will be found in full in Scouting, Vol. IV, No. 9, pages 1, 2 and 3.

J. E. W. is Chief Scout Executive of the Boy Scouts of America and there is no one who writes or speaks for this organization who has a prior right to a hearing than he.

The object of the paper is to make clear to a doubting public that the Boy Scouts are not military in spirit and incidentally it is one of the strongest papers we have read against the popular notion that would place military training in the curricula of our public schools.—EWS.]

Just at the present all of us are stirred as never before by the realization of the necessity of some marked improvement and a forward step in the programs which have been followed in the training of boys and young men. Specialized athletics, i. e., baseball, football, track and field events, have been developed unduly to the detriment of the physical training of the individual, who must therefore be a "slacker," only entering into the spirit of individual physical preparedness from his position on the bleachers.

We must frankly admit that thus far, as a nation, whenever the test has been applied, we have been sadly deficient in physical preparedness.

The reports from the War Department show that of the State militia drafted for Federal service in the present emergency, from 15 per cent. to 65 per cent. of the men from various States sent to the border have been rejected because of lack of physical fitness.

Again, the records of the U. S. Government show that of the men who apply for enlistment in the marine corps, 90 per cent. are rejected because they are not physically fit, the percentage in New York City alone being as high as 97 per cent. plus, while in Los Angeles, Cal., it is 66 per cent. plus.

Primarily this is an indictment of our educational system, and incidentally of educational authorities of our country, including those who specifically have the responsibility for physical education. It is because of the weakness of the leadership in having our people and our legislative bodies properly understand the facts that adequate provision has not heretofore been made to deal with this condition.

As a result, because of the European War and recent Mexican developments, the country is alarmed and aroused, and an earnest effort is being made by many well-meaning people to impose the burden of military preparedness upon our schools and boys in their teen age. It is true that much of the agitation and resulting hysteria show a lack of knowledge of what is properly covered by the term "military training," but it does, nevertheless, show an earnestness and patriotism on the part of those who are advocating this or that method for correcting existing conditions which must be reckoned with.

As a matter of fact, many of those who have been opposed to each other in the discussion of military training in our public schools would find themselves in complete accord if there were available an accepted definition of the term "military training."

Again, if those who are leaders in physical education would come forward with a definite program of instruction which would greatly improve the physical condition of the product of our schools and colleges, I feel confident that the most radical advocates of the technical military training would be satisfied with it as a preliminary program and would be content to have their strictly military program commence at a more mature age.

As a matter of fact, in the programs of many of our most progressive schools as well as in the program of the Boy Scouts of America, a great deal of what is commonly understood as military training is given very effectively as citizenship training. Indeed, I am told by many of our people who have been at Plattsburg that a great proportion of the program of the Plattsburg and other military training camps is included in the citizenship training program of the Boy Scouts of America.

Because this is so, it does not make the training given in our progressive schools and by the Boy Scouts of America military training—it is more appropriate to call it citizenship training. The Nation and the State and the community support the schools because they want our boys and girls not only to be educated, but to be prepared physically and otherwise to meet the responsibilities of citizenship—therefore they must have citizenship training.

It is just as important that boys and girls be taught how to live and how to care for themselves and what to do in emergencies in order to prepare them to be good school teachers, stenographers, bookkeepers, accountants, clerks, to engage in any of the trades or to work as a day laborer on the streets, as it is to prepare them to withstand the test of army service in time of war.

Indeed, all of our boys and young men should be given opportunities for such all around training so that upon reaching a point between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, there will be relatively little to teach them in order that in the event of war they can do their duty to the nation as soldiers.

The question naturally arises, "What should be excluded from the training of the early teen age boy?"—in other words, "What should be left to be dealt with as distinctively military training?"

Although during the last six months I have read practically every article and newspaper clipping that has appeared in our public press on the subject of military training for boys, I have not found any commonly accepted definition of the term. Indeed, there is an alarming evidence of misunderstanding in this respect on the part of newspaper editors and even educators. I hesitate even to venture a definition, but from my knowledge of the subject, it would seem to me, technically speaking, the term "military training" should include merely military tactics and maneuvers of utility only in army life. This will, of course, include sham battles, manual of arms, sabre and bayonet drills, skirmish work, army engineering and the study of army organization, etc.

Those things which make for discipline, obedience, loyalty, courtesy, endurance, resourcefulness, initiative, alertness, moral courage, good health, knowledge of how to care for oneself, etc., should not be considered distinctive military training, but should be given, as part of citizenship training, to all boys and girls to properly prepare them primarily for their later responsibilities as home-makers, wage-earners and citizens.

It was upon this theory that Robert S. S. Baden-Powell formulated the program which is being followed the world over by regularly organized boy scouts.

The purely technical military training which experience shows is unwisely given to groups of young boys as cadets simply occupies valuable time and crowds out a program of other activities which would, in the judgment of those promoting Scouting, prove more effective and beneficial in securing the desired results.

General Baden-Powell, in speaking on this subject recently, said:

"My own experience as a soldier includes having served as a cadet, having commanded cadets and having seen them in most of the Overseas Dominions; but this experience does not lead me to think that, under their usual organization and training, they are of supreme value for military purposes. In my own Territorial Division, when I suggested the formation of Cadet Corps as feeders to the various battalions, not one of the commanding officers of those battalions desired to have them.

"The difficulty of obtaining really first-class officers and instructors to train boys is very great, and unless you have them you are likely to do more harm than good from the military point of view. More than one officer has told me that he would rather have raw recruits to train than ex-cadets, since, as a rule, these have so much to unlearn.

"It is impossible in the brief spells of cadet training to instill the habit of discipline as part of the lad's character. I have no use for the so-called discipline which is put on and off with the parade uniform."

Aside from the exceptional cases where school buildings are equipped with gymnasiums, athletic fields and other facilities for physical training, the opportunity for official action by the school authorities is limited to the brief period with the boys under the direct control of the schools. Manifestly this is not adequate. Therefore, plans must be considered to reach the boy during his leisure time through some form of recreational activity which will result in bringing about physical preparedness, as an essential part of preparedness for citizenship.

This is where the Boy Scouts of America, the Playground Movement and other similar organizations very definitely provide a supplement to the work of the directors of physical education and the school work proper.

Based upon the results secured through the program of Scouting here and in England and throughout the rest of the world, we earnestly urge consideration of this program as a basis of courses of citizenship training in and out of our public schools, to help in the forward step which must be taken to improve the physical condition of our boys and young men.

Already important steps have been taken because of the necessity of definite action. New York State has created a so-called military training commission, consisting of three men who have complete and absolute power to develop a program of training of not more than three hours in each week to be given to all boys over the age of fifteen who are not employed. Undoubtedly other States will enact legislation to meet the situation.

It is for us who believe that physical preparedness is the greatest educational need of America, to actively interest ourselves in seeing to it that whatever legislation of this character is enacted will be along lines calculated to secure an all around citizenship training and therefore the best results for our country. We should all co-operate with those to whom authority is given, and aid in the development of programs which will give the boys proper physical development as well as the proper point of view as to their patriotic duty.

The Boy Scouts of America must frankly confess that notwithstanding the fact that at present we have over 42,000 men who are giving volunteer service in various parts of the country in order to make our program available to 190,000 boys who are registered as Scouts, as an organization, we cannot reasonably expect to provide sufficient leadership to reach all the boys of the country of the teen age for whom something should be done outside of the school.

Every step in the scouting program aims at character development and citizenship training. The variety and interest, as well as the practical knowledge insured by the tenderfoot, second class, first class and various merit badge tests are, after all, but a means for holding the interest of the boy under such leadership as will bring about character development. The form of troop organization, the scoutmaster and his assistants, the local council and indeed the National Council and all its officers are but a means to this end. This character development manifests itself in health, efficiency, chivalry, loyalty, patriotism, good citizenship and joyous living. We want all to look upon the Boy Scout idea as a movement rather than an organization and to realize that we are merely seeking to supplement existing agencies for the education and physical development of the boy.

 "O Master, let me walk with Thee
 In lowly paths of service free;
 Tell me Thy secret; help me bear
 The strain of toil, the fret of care.

"Help me the slow of heart to move
 By some clear winning word of love;
 Teach me the wayward feet to stay,
 And guide them in the homeward way.

"Teach me Thy patience, still with Thee
 In closer, dearer company,
 In work that keeps faith sweet and strong,
 In trust that triumphs over wrong,

"In hope that sends a shining ray
 Far down the future's broadening way;
 In peace that only Thou canst give,
 With Thee, O Master, let me live."

VISIT TO NORTH CAROLINA.

North Carolina Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Cedar Grove, in the town of Woodland, N. C., from the third of the Eleventh Month to the ninth of the same, inclusive, 1916.

So runs the official caption under which a considerable body of Friends have recently been refreshed together and again strengthened for their day's work on earth through the efficacy of the truths of the Gospel and renewed assurance of the hope of immortality through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

As a visitor upon the above occasion and partaker of its spiritual blessings and exercises, let us account for the week spent thus in the "Sunny Southland," hitherto by him unvisited, yet filled with interest and restorative quality to one who entered it with mind jaded with the exacting round of required material duties.

Enroute.—Upon the afternoon of Eleventh Month 2nd, the train for the South leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, at 3.30, carried our group of six persons, that happened to divide equally as to sex, and but one of whom had already experienced what we had set before us.

The P. B. & W. branch of the great Pennsylvania Railroad system is one of the country's main arteries of trade through which ever flows a large share of its life-giving substance of human and material wealth. The line is strung with great and rapidly growing cities. Of these Chester and Wilmington are now expanding as never before under the strain and stress of the European war, with its insatiate demand for munitions, of which these cities are engaged in pouring forth their tale, bringing in turn the horrible destruction of life and property and misery untold. The thought of these things bowed our hearts, as, in such comparative comfort, citizens of a land of peace and unmeasured plenty, we sped our course.

The States of Pennsylvania and Delaware are soon left behind, and we breathe more freely as we glide into the more open country of Maryland; its fields, though browned by the nip of early frost, are restful to the eye, as though they emitted somewhat of the peace and tiredness of mind that emanates from the drab of wilom Quakerism.

The yellow gleam of corn in heap,
The dairy barns and greening wheat—all flash memories of boyhood days spent amid the toil but recompensing joy of mind, body and soul that may attend the farmer's life. Having caught the spirit of it all, let us ponder those words of our country's father, so called:

"Agriculture is the most healthful, most useful, and most noble employment of man."

John Woolman, too, had learned this secret when he wrote:

"If the leadings of the spirit were more attended to, more people would be engaged in the sweet employment of husbandry, where the labor is agreeable and healthful."

At North East we catch a glimpse of Chesapeake Bay; later, at Perryville, our train slowly rolls out onto the high bridge spanning the Susquehanna, affording a grand view of this charmingly picturesque river which here discharges its volume of water at the head of the above bay, one of the most beautiful on the globe, and having with its tributaries a navigable mileage exceeding twenty-five hundred miles.

The shades of evening have already gathered as our train enters the tunnel leading to Union Station, Baltimore, the sixth city of the United States, and appropriately named the "Crown of the Chesapeake." We here leave the train and are transferred by bus to the docks of the popular "Old Bay Line," where lies in waiting the S. S. Alabama. Our party is here increased by three additional members—one, a woman Friend, from Canada, and two men from Pennsylvania, the latter about to renew former visits to the Yearly Meeting. A visit to the purser's office resulted in all securing comfortable quarters on the gallery deck in close proximity to one another, as the travel at this season of the year is light. Having adjusted ourselves thus, we went on deck to find the vessel already steaming out the harbor. The air was highly refreshing, bringing to mind that our evening meal had not yet been partaken of. For this event some of our more thoughtful members had already provided through the medium of tempting lunch boxes. Two of the party, however, had decided to acquaint themselves with the ship's cuisine; this they found to be bountiful and of excellent quality, served with generous attention amid appetizing surroundings; so much so, indeed, that these two spent so great a while under the beguiling influence of keen appetite and the opportunity for renewing old friendship that another of our party came with a naive inquiry as to what had become of us. Thus refreshed, we again sought the deck, once more to gladden our hearts with the scene about us, ere seeking bodily repose for the night. Above were the clear, stary heavens amid which shone the moon, now at the first quarter, closely accompanied by Jupiter, now star of the evening. Below, were the lights of the great city growing fainter and fainter as our vessel steamed onward through scenes replete with historic interest out of the Patapsco River into the Bay. Though loath to quit such scenes, we turn in for the night, and, being fair sailors, are soon soothed to sleep by the monotonous chuck of the great propeller, ever moving its mighty burden of human and material freight southward.

The day is already breaking when we arise and peer forth from our cabin window. The sea is calm, the soft saline air bathes our face as the heart wells up in gratitude for such a morning. Far to the eastward lies Cape Charles, as indicated by its well-known lighthouse, flashing its intermittent signal of warning to the mariner. We realize we are nearing our destined port. We thrill with expectancy as we hastily dress and go on deck, to find our vessel already swinging her course to the westward, and know that we are at the entrance to Hampton Roads, that magnificent harbor which forms the mouth of the James River. As the lights grow dimmer on shore, we are conscious that the morning is one of majesty, and ideal for viewing the scenes of deep historic interest which here await the visitor. As thus we stand with enraptured gaze, a touch on the shoulder caused us to turn around, when, lo! suspended above the vapory horizon of the sea from which it has just arisen, hangs the sun, the only thing needed, it would seem, to idealize the situation to the full. Places were now seen for the first time whose names had been lisped in infancy, when an uncle lay at the point of death in the great military hospital located here during the War of the Rebellion. As we dock to unload a large portion of our great cargo of merchandise which was taken on at Baltimore, we observe close to our right the massive ramparts of Fortress Monroe constructed near a century ago at the cost of millions of dollars, and regarded as one of the strongest military defenses of the world. "Old Point" is a clean, attractive place with an equable climate, long popular as a winter resort, though over all broods the subtle influence of militarism—its precision, its etiquette, its pomp and parade, especially as it obtains in the ball-room of the famous hostelry that arises from the water's edge directly in front of us—The Hotel Chamberlin. About us in the haven lie at anchor many of the nation's war vessels, and speeding among them the ponderous, strange-looking craft which we were informed were engaged in coaling them. As if to remind us of present world conditions on the high seas, nearby lies a trading vessel riding at anchor. She flies the Norwegian colors, in times of peace this would well identify her; not so now. A new engine of war lurks amid the high seas seeking only to destroy, and so upon the sides of the little vessel, near stem and stern, her nationality as a neutral is again set forth in three broad vertical bands, while her name stands out amidship in huge letters, thus:

SOLVEIG SKOGLAND, NORCE.

Learning that the Alabama will dock here for near an hour we pass out through the hold redolent with the odor of coffee and other edible merchandise (especially pleasing to those who, like ourselves, have not as yet breakfasted), amid the din of dusky stevedores engaged with their rattling trucks in discharging so much of the cargo as is consigned to this point. As we stroll about, decided pacifists though we be, the old fortress holds a strange fascination over us, and thither we direct our steps. With awe-struck feelings we cross the moat and pass through the porte salle, whose walls are fifty feet thick and the same in height, suggesting something altogether medieval; but well we know that behind those ramparts, now so peaceful and still in the morning light, there lie the great disappearing guns with power undreamed of in the days of knight errantry. The space within the enclosure covers sixty-eight acres. Here are the barracks and officers' quarters. Everything is suggestive of military precision and cleanliness. The sentinel on guard answers our questions with civility, and we make our exit feeling that we have added one more novelty to our life's experience. Not the least interesting feature to us, however, was our first acquaintance with the live oak, a number of fine specimens of which with their thick, dark-green leaves, imparted to the above grounds a pleasing and noble aspect.

ENGLISH FRIENDS DURING THE WAR.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Some young men connected with the Society of Friends have felt dissatisfied with it and have resigned, returned home and faced the Tribunal as conscientious objectors. Members of the Society of Friends would certainly seem to have limitless scope connected with the relief of millions of innocent non-combatants without entering into compromising labors associated with army work. I personally found in private conversation amongst casual acquaintances, who are not Friends, the distinct impression prevailing that the near-army work of the F. A. U. revealed that the Quakers had largely relinquished their dislike and generally considered non-patriotic position, and were to be commended for doing so. The whole question has been weightily discussed in Meetings of Friends and the feeling certainly grew whilst we were in England that as a testimony-bearing proposition the F. A. U. does not in the minds of many Friends meet the demands of the hour. The situation is one that will soon have to be faced by English Friends.

A much-beloved and prominent Friend of London Yearly Meeting used language to the following effect one day in a Quarterly Meeting: "There is no question but that the conscientious objectors (Friends and non-Friends alike) who face the Tribunals and who will not give in, who protest against any sort of participation in war, who endure insult and imprisonment, are the men who are really making the fight for religious liberty in England to-day, and upholding the rights of conscience."

It must be remembered that many conscientious objectors are men of affairs holding excellent business, professional and social positions, and whose Christian integrity and character are unimpeachable. Many of them are the best that Christianity can produce in the churches to-day. Others are Socialists with lofty ideals of brotherhood and love, who are influenced by Christianity and who at the same time may be positively derisive or hopeless as to the condition of the churches about them. As far as I can understand most of the denominations are pretty well represented among these protestants against war. Many of these conscientious objectors co-operate with Friends.

There is, however, antagonism discovered from the most unexpected sources. Common observation and statistics alike show that war or preparation for war dims the spiritual vision and benumbs the moral perceptions.

One of the most unhappy and disappointing exhibitions made in connection with the whole situation is that offered by most of the clergy in England. Friends, as far as I have observed, whilst not even among themselves commenting on it, and whilst full of love for their persecutors, have had to face this trying position. It indicates the sort of prejudice they are compelled to meet. These ministers made their places of worship the recruiting grounds for the original volunteer system, and have since, at the first intimation from governmental sources, vigorously preached conscription. They have elected to follow the behest of politicians and munition makers rather than the commands of Him whom they call their Lord. There are unqualified and unanswerable statements to the effect that when the conscription acts were being framed and passed, leading clerics of England went to Westminster and secured exemption for the clergy from compulsory military service. It will be of no advantage to mention their names. Unfortunately their inconsistency did not stop here. Some of them—presumably the spiritual leaders of England—have been most abusive or contemptuous in references to the conscientious objectors. They have apparently forgotten the freedom of conscience inculcated in the teachings of the Gospel. Not only have they failed to obey the command to love their enemies, but they have publicly insulted and derided those who do love their enemies. Their high position and authority in the church has been employed in weakening the position of those who do obey the teachings of Jesus Christ and in scoffing at them. They seem to think that they have secured the approval of the masses. They are in error. They have been greedily listened to by those who make gain out of war, but if newspaper reports and labor periodical comments are correct they have secured much contempt from the working classes. Their action has been a terrific blow to the prestige of the church, if not to the cause of Jesus Christ.

A man refused exemption by a tribunal, immediately and automatically is considered a soldier and as such becomes subject to the terrible penalties inflicted in the British army for treason or insubordination. Some Friends along with others have been sentenced to be shot but their sentences were subsequently commuted to ten years' penal servitude. The history of these penalties and the brutal treatment accorded to conscientious objectors would be unbelievable except for the authentic sources from which they are received. It constitutes one shameful record of physical and mental tortures in military prisons, barracks and camps. I shall not enter into details. It may be enough to say that I possess numerous copies of speeches made in parliament on the subject, editorial comment and parliamentary reports in the London newspapers, and published remonstrances of some leading clergy of the non-conformist denominations, etc. Some English people view the situation with terror as they contemplate the loss of civil and religious liberty which they apprehend dishonors England.

Naturally, the hearts of English Friends, who devotedly love their country, burn because of all these things. The eight Quarterly Meetings we attended—some of them lasting more than one day, and with numerous sessions—were largely devoted to conditions growing out of the war, the immoralities, the losses, the sufferings, the tears of those not of our communion who are oppressed and who have no Comforter. The ministry in meetings for worship was largely imbued with the same agony and thought. In private houses the conversation could not help but be full of reference to the sorrows of the world and to trials connected with faithful discipleship at home. When you pour out your money and strength without stint on behalf of millions of homeless refugees abroad, when your best loved boys in your own Monthly Meeting are being taken before Tribunals or to prisons; when you endure calumny for your Saviour's sake, then you are drawn together in the holy bonds of the brotherhood of Christ. You learn what it really is to sacrifice for Him. Were these conditions depressing to us as we day by day saw and heard what we did? They were. But at the same time we were deeply impressed with the possibilities of the sustaining power of our Lord. We saw young Friends smiling and happy a few days before they were taken from Devonshire Meeting-house to go to jail; we saw a living faith in the older people which rose higher and higher in proportion to the depressing nature of the trials that assailed them; we saw cheerfulness in sorrow; we saw that there yet remain in this sin-tossed world men and women who really have a glimpse of the glory of the Lord and who are willing to endure the cross and despise the shame for His name's sake.

I ask Friends everywhere in America to get into closer comradeship with their English brethren and sisters in this hour of trial and remember them in their prayers.

As English Friends are thus faithfully and bravely contending in the spirit of love with spiritual blindness and military tyranny in high places, let us of America also set our spiritual houses in order that we too, with God's help, may courageously meet the same menacing conditions which are to-day knocking at our very gates.

THE WORK OF THE CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL.

The Cheyney Training School for Teachers is a gift to the nation by Friends. They ought, therefore, to have some report from time to time of the fruit the institution is bearing in its chosen fields of service to the nation in the training of teachers for the Negro race.

As the years go on the so-called Negro problem becomes no less difficult of solution, and no less worthy of patient attention and study. The colored man in America is not thinking of going some day to another land where he may be freed from the evils of prejudice. He has long ago, for better or for worse, cast in his lot permanently upon American soil. Jews, under Zionism, may dream of returning to the land of the patriarchs, but Negroes in America, in spite of suffering and set-backs, can conceive of no other home. We are here, therefore, definitely and permanently, to be a help or a hindrance, to pull down or to build up, to be citizens in the true sense of that term, or irritating dependents. No other third outcome is possible. And if we are to be assets instead of liabilities in the sum total of our national life, we must be educated. Mere negative criticism will not help. Our minds and our hearts must be set free and developed so that we may make some worthy contribution to American progress. Long ago Friends helped to strike from our limbs the physical fetters. This was a vast but truly a comparatively easy service. The greater task remained. The masses of my people are still bound by the shackles of ignorance, poverty and prejudice. Who will rend these asunder? Who will bring now the salvation that can come only by character and efficiency?

Work for this redemption cannot, in the long run, be done by white men and women. It must be accomplished more and more by Negroes themselves. It must be guided by trained and consecrated men and women of the race, who know their people and their needs. All the battles that have been fought for us must be won over again by ourselves on a higher plane. There is no such thing as giving a people freedom or civilization. These mighty boons come only to those who can command and deserve them. The only secure race is the one that mounts to self-realization by character and trained productive energy.

No endeavor for colored people, therefore, could be more significant than that of the Cheyney Training School in developing teachers who shall hold up for Negro youth high ideals of character and of service, and stimulate in them the spirit of self-reliance, of race pride and of goodwill to their neighbor. It requires time, money and patience to establish these ideals and to diffuse widely that spirit. It requires, better still, mutual understanding and co-operation between the races. Not only is all the energy, resourcefulness and talent of colored people themselves needed, but also for generations to come all the practical assistance and encouragement that white friends can give. That is the only way in which colored people can be helped to help themselves. That is why the Cheyney Training School makes its appeal systematically from year to year to all good citizens for increased interest and support, believing that any institution that can point the way to an intelligent, energized and productive Negro citizenship is a vital factor in promoting national peace and prosperity.

Last summer twenty-one young men and women were sent out from the various departments of the School with the Cheyney training, specialists all in the manual arts. They are now widely scattered, especially in the Southland, each to be a leavening influence upon his people in character-building and industrial efficiency. These graduates are not seeking the easy positions in the most favored localities. They are building up run-down institutions, inaugurating in good schools new modern departments and attempting the most exacting and difficult kind of rough pioneering in the rural districts. They are meeting every sort of professional problem, and enduring many personal privations and sacrifices. Yet their reports uniformly bring to us the spirit of good cheer, of faith and of success. Nothing could more convincingly prove the genuineness and effectiveness of the Cheyney discipline than the actual records made by the graduates.

Special mention ought to be made of the Cheyney extension work. This is work for a better Negro citizenship in the immediate Cheyney neighborhood where the influence of the school ought first to be felt. During last year students from our summer class organized at the Gay Street School in West Chester evening classes in handicrafts, physical training and the practical domestic arts. These classes were for the colored people of the town, old and young, who were not privileged to attend the day schools, but who still desired some opportunity for self-improvement. They were sustained throughout the winter and spring with considerable interest. Not only did they give to the students concerned experiences in social service of the modern sort, but they revealed many possible extensions of public school activity in community betterment. The call for similar help has now come from other nearby communities. How important this kind of activity is must be appreciated by all who realize how rapidly Negroes are multiplying in the North, and how fast race problems breed wherever colored people are found in considerable numbers. Ill will and mere complaint do not help. Colored people in the North need incentives for self-improvement. They need industrial opportunity, decent housing, safe and wholesome recreation, and a regular school attendance. The extension classes were all designed to make a beginning in the direction of these needs. As the years pass the field for this type of service will steadily widen, and the value of the school in its own state will be greatly magnified.

The new school year, 1916-1917, opened in Tenth Month with another largest enrollment, and with a faculty more convinced than ever of the certain need among Negro teachers of the training for which they are responsible. The one great task still is adequate means and facilities for our work. The school is now fairly crowded when we have received 100 students. There ought surely to be dormitory, shop, class-room, laboratory and gymnasium space for 200. There is also urgent need of funds with which to build up the agricultural department, so that our farm of 116 acres may be made not only more productive in food for the schools, but a model of the best agricultural methods and results. These needs, it is our faith, will in good time be supplied by friends who sympathize with our cause and realize how much is at stake in the training of safe and effective leaders for the masses of Negroes in America.

LESLIE PINCKNEY HILL.

ONLY to the extent that a Christian is "missionary" will he realize the companionship of his indwelling Lord. A missionary minister said recently, "Our Lord is often quoted as saying, 'Lo, I am with you always.' He did not say that. He said, 'Go, . . . make disciples of all the nations. . . and lo, I am with you.'" The promise is in direct connection with the commission. Without obedient stepping forward we fail of the companionship of our missionary Lord. Let us take the obedient step forward that says, "Yes, Lord," in answer to His command, and "I am with you" is then His personal word to us.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

Step by step the Temperance Cause

Advances toward the goal;

Bit by bit it takes the loaf

Until it gets the whole.

Although with slow, yet steady pace

It urges on its way,

Before it Bacchus shall recede

As night before the day.

"PROHIBITION A NATIONAL ISSUE" is the heading of a double-column editorial in The North American (Philadelphia), dated Eleventh Month 14th, and running in part as follows:—

In remarkable contrast to this lack of a decision respecting the issues that were supposed to divide the two great parties was the verdict rendered upon a question which had not been recognized at all in the national contest. The liquor traffic met the most overwhelming condemnation that has been visited upon it in half a century.

It is striking enough to say that four States, with an aggregate population of more than 5,000,000, voted themselves under prohibition on election day, another electing a prohibition legislature and governor, and that this action makes "dry" twenty-four States, embracing, with those States made partially dry under local option, more than 60 per cent. of the people of the country and 85 per cent. of its area. Yet these facts just begin to tell the story of the liquor disaster.

Seven years ago there were only nine prohibition States, and a year ago the number committed to the principle had crept up to only sixteen. Now half the commonwealths have outlawed rum, a twenty-fifth State has declared itself for similar action, and in many more the traffic is tolerated in only a few centers of population.

It is worth noting that Michigan, Nebraska and South Dakota tried prohibition many years ago, but repealed the laws. That they have adopted the policy again means that there will be no going backward.

Idaho was already "dry" territory, under an act of the legislature, but emphasized its decision last week by adopting a constitutional amendment.

Prohibition was not a political issue in Maryland, but Hagerstown and Havre de Grace voted themselves "dry" under the local option law. Twenty of the twenty-three counties have banned liquor.

Defensive victories which were decisive were also won. Liquor amendments designed to nullify or weaken the effect of prohibitory laws in the States of Washington, Colorado, Iowa, Oregon, Arkansas and Arizona were voted down.

Even where prohibition was not actually a recognized factor, it determined the result and overturned the most elaborate campaign arrangements of the big parties.

Florida, naturally, had no real party contest, but the fight for the governorship between two Democrats was decided on the prohibition issue. Beaten by the machine at the primaries, the "dry" candidate was named on an independent ticket and actually defeated the regular nominee.

Minnesota has been under local option for two years, and during that period fifty-five of its eighty-two counties have voted the saloon out of business. In the recent contest, the Republican governor campaigned for re-election as an advocate of state-wide prohibition, and was elected by upward of 50,000 plurality, while it has required an official canvass to discover a Hughes plurality.

In Illinois the Democratic party is in alliance with the liquor interests, and, when a demand for local option became insistent, Governor Dunne declared against it. Lowden, the Republican candidate, seized upon the issue, pledged himself to a county local option law, and was elected. Here the State administration was overturned by the uprising against liquor, and to that must be credited a considerable proportion of the 175,000 plurality which the voters gave to Hughes.

But undoubtedly the most striking evidence of the power of the prohibition issue is to be observed in Indiana, where it decided the possession of two seats in the United States Senate.

The Republican candidates were Harry S. New and James Watson, both practiced politicians of the most hard-headed type. Until this year they would have scouted the idea of cultivating the "dry" sentiment; but they realized that the movement could no longer be ignored, and they went before the voters pledged to the support of national prohibition, which is considered a far more radical proposal than a State law.

Both of them were elected, defeating Senators Kern and Taggart, two of the most powerful Democratic leaders, who have been noted for their pro-liquor activities. Incidentally, Hughes got the electoral votes of Indiana, which four years ago went to Wilson.

Missouri, the home of the greatest brewing industry in the world, showed 100,000 reduction in the normal majority favoring the saloon. But it took the vote of St. Louis to keep the State "wet," while Kansas City, which five years ago voted three to one for liquor, declared this time for prohibition. The explanation is simple. Just across the river is Kansas City, Kan., and the contrast in public order, industrial progress and general economic well-being revealed by the Kansas community inspired the revolutionary vote.

The irresistible argument of example was, indeed, a powerful influence in every test. The successful candidate for governor of South Dakota emphasized in all his campaign speeches the desirability of bringing the State up to the level of North Dakota, which has been "dry" since 1907 and which has distanced its neighbor in prosperity. In the same way each prohibition State created sentiment beyond its own borders—the experience of West Virginia and Kansas and Tennessee had its effect in Michigan and Nebraska.

There has been no more remarkable development in American politics since the nation was founded than the rapid growth of prohibition sentiment.

The liquor question is the greatest single issue of the day, for it breaks down party barriers and unites on common ground men of both the old organizations. Already the anti-liquor sentiment constitutes the balance of power in the central west and most of the northern States; and the day is not far distant when it will confront the bosses as a national issue.

THE MEANING OF THIS IS PLAIN, says The Independent of New York. It is simply that the American people are becoming slowly but soundly convinced that alcohol is too dangerous to be allowed at large in the community. This is no outburst of fanaticism. The people have not been carried off their feet by eloquence. They have not been misled by exaggerated statements as to the evils of the liquor traffic or of the advantages of abstinence. They know what the saloon does, they know what prohibition does, and they prefer the latter. They are shutting down on alcohol.

Our system of State autonomy affords a means of introducing and trying out such reforms. It has given to political science what has made the physical sciences so sure-footed, the experimental method. Each State is a laboratory, and, after enough of them have tried some new plan and found it a success, then it may properly be extended to the whole nation. The time is fast approaching when prohibition will be ripe for such extension by congressional action.

TREMENDOUS GAINS FOR PROHIBITION, says The American Friend, in every State where the issue was raised directly. Michigan, Nebraska, South Dakota and Montana went into the dry column by most pronounced majorities. Alaska joined the procession, every town in the territory, according to the reports, returning dry majorities. Arkansas was saved to prohibition by a majority that gave no uncertain sound, Wet propositions in Colorado, Arizona, Oregon and Washington were defeated by overwhelming majorities, the city of Seattle in the latter State returning a dry majority of nearly 15,000 as against an equal wet majority two years ago. Florida and Utah are said to have elected dry Legislatures, the report being that in the former State an independent candidate was elected governor on a prohibition issue. It is believed that both these States will enact statutory prohibition laws this coming winter. In Missouri and California the wet majorities were greatly reduced over the vote two years ago.

ON TO WASHINGTON is now the slogan of Anti-Saloon League and other temperance forces. The following statement was issued from The League Headquarters, Washington, D. C.: "Twenty-four States, one-half of the States of the Union, have now, by the vote of the people or by the act of the legislatures, outlawed the drink traffic.

"Most of the territory of the remaining States have abolished drink through the instrument of local option. Four-fifths of the liquor traffic is now cornered in a half-dozen of the great cities of the States. . . . The time has come to insert a plank in the platform of all political parties favoring nationwide prohibition. Local option has demonstrated its value by demonstrating that in many States it is no longer valuable. State-wide prohibition is only an enlarged form of local option.

"Henceforth, the political party that is not willing to put a plank in its platform, and the candidate, from president down, who is not willing to stand squarely on that plank, is not worthy the support of patriotic American citizens. We believe the last president has been elected who will enter the White House dumb and silent upon this, the greatest and most far-reaching question now before the American people. But one thing can prevent it from being an acute issue in the next presidential campaign, and that is for Congress to submit the question for ratification by the States before the next presidential campaign."

CALIFORNIA LIQUOR MEN are now "crying temperance from the housetops and the bars beneath," says Special Correspondence. That "dry" vote was about the scariest thing the liquor interests have ever encountered in this State. "No. 1," the amendment providing total prohibition, was defeated by a large majority, but "No. 2," aimed to eliminate drinking in saloons, clubs, cafés and hotels, was beaten by only a scant 40,000. The cities went to the rescue and saved the day for the saloon men. But the "drys" polled so much greater a vote than two years ago that immediately they began planning another campaign two years hence. That is the reason for the sudden temperance stand of the liquor men.

A VERY INTERESTING LETTER has been received from our friend Walter E. Vail of San Francisco. He says, "California increased her 'dry' vote more than 100,000 over that of 1914. Wilson was elected in the face of the fact that there were many thousands more Republicans registered here than Democrats. During my boyhood and for many years thereafter, the Democratic party was considered as favorable to the saloon interests, but a great change has occurred in this respect in nearly the whole of the solid South by the enactment of prohibitory laws by States, until now this situation exists: Whenever the Democratic party elects a majority in Congress, the balance of power is held by men from prohibition States. On the other hand, until great changes occur in the more populous centres, whenever the Republican party secures a majority in Congress, the balance of power of that majority must come from the wet centers of Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland, Cincinnati and other wet districts of the North and East. The dry map of the United States which now includes almost the whole of the country south of the Ohio River and west of the Mississippi, is worth studying.

"For thirty years I have cast my vote at each election with the main idea that I must do my utmost to destroy the legalized liquor traffic and consequently have pretty generally voted the Prohibition ticket, because there seemed no possible way to aid the cause in voting for either of the old parties. I am in hopes, now, that the Democratic party, having to receive its strength from prohibition States, will not only stay progressive, as it has lately, but in the near future use its powerful organization for temperance and prohibition.

"It is interesting to note that those States having the largest percentage of American-born citizens as a rule are the States that have adopted Prohibition and progressive politics."

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN says, "The Prohibition issue is here. The Democratic party cannot afford to take the immoral side of a moral issue. My work during the next four years will be to do all I can to make Democracy dry."

PROHIBITION IN MICHIGAN becomes effective Fourth Month 30, 1918, in Montana Twelfth Month 31, 1918. The city of Denver two years ago voted 9000 "wet," but the State of Colorado as a whole voted "dry." This year, Denver having tasted the benefits of prohibition, voted 16,000 against weakening the law.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Annual Convention of the Women's Peace Party is scheduled for the 9th and 10th in Washington. It is expected that Jane Addams will preside, and we note with satisfaction the name of Agnes Brown Leach amongst the delegates from New York City.

ABOUT twenty Friends were present on Third-day, the 21st, for the Annual Meeting of the Friends' Institute. Tea was served by members of the Board of Managers, which added a social element to the occasion. The election of officers was held. Following is the Board for the ensuing year:

President, George Vaux, Jr.; Vice-Presidents, E. Marshall Seull, Jonathan M. Steere, Lucy B. Roberts; Secretary, Mary Anna Jones; Treasurer, Oliver W. Paxon; Board of Managers, Sarah E. P. Mickle, Hannah P. Morris, John L. Seull, Rebecca Carter, Ethel M. Whitson, Henry D. Allen, Harold Evans, D. Robert Yarnall, Susan J. Dewees, John W. Cadbury, Jr., Edward C. Wood, Charles T. Moon.

In an interesting talk William O. Easton described very clearly the work of the Y. M. C. A. for the young men of the city. Harold M. Lane then spoke of the change in ideals of the Institute since the day of its establishment and of the desirability of a return to those ideals of an association for mutual benefit and co-operation in literary, philanthropic and religious work.

THE opposers of capital punishment again vindicated in the case of Charles Stielow. On a morning last summer Charles Stielow sat in his cell in the "death house" in Sing Sing prison. He was ready for his last journey on earth—to the electric chair which would take his life in expiation of the death of two persons he had been convicted of murdering. Three times already he had been reprieved and each time the law had reaffirmed his guilt and commanded again his death. His last hope was gone.

In twenty-six minutes he would take up his march to the execution-room. Suddenly the warden of the prison appeared at the grated door of the cell. For the fourth time he brought a reprieve, and this time something more. The real murderer had confessed. Stielow's innocence had been discovered. The terrible death that, day by day, for a year had crept closer and closer till it stood on the very threshold of his cell had suddenly vanished away. He would be a free man again.

Stolid, insensitive, dull creature that he is, he only answered, "That's fine," and turned to sit on his bed again. Then he was heard to murmur, "Thank God."

But Charles Stielow is not the only one who should be giving thanks to a Divine Providence for this eleventh hour revelation.

The law had once more been protected from its own bungling ineptitude. The people—that great sovereign conception whose name stands grim in every indictment in the courts of justice—had been snatched back from a disgraceful crime.

The case of Charles Stielow adds one more stern count to the indictment against capital punishment. In a short half hour the State would have taken the life of an innocent man. The State in its sovereignty has the power of life and death. But unless it can use that power with infallible justice, it ought to abstain from its use at all. Who can believe that human justice is infallible? Who can be blind to its grievous blunders? Who can find, in any benefits which flow to society from the general operation of the death penalty, a counterbalance for the possible murder in the name of justice of even so humble a unit of society as Charles Stielow?

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The Springfield Republican has the following: "Dr. Isaac Sharpless is to retire from the presidency of Haverford College in Pennsylvania after having served it for forty years, despite the fact that every member of the teaching staff has asked him to remain at the head of the institution. He is sixty-eight years old, is accounted a leading authority on Pennsylvania colonial history, and has written a number of text-books on mathematics. The man who gives up a college presidency when nearing seventy years of age is on the safe side."

The estimate of rabbits killed in Pennsylvania this season will be close to 4,000,000, double that of last year, according to Dr. Joseph Kalfhus, secretary of the State Game Commission, who predicts that there will be a record killing of wild turkeys and probably of deer and bear.

Reports showing that New Jersey is taking a strong position among the States with respect to enlisting boys for a militant, practical Christianity marked the preliminary sessions at Atlantic City of the fifteenth annual older boys' conference under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association.

Philadelphia women are making a concerted effort to keep the school-girls of the city from using paint and powder. The Teachers' Club, with a membership of about 300 teachers and principals of the schools, has started a campaign to exterminate the germ-reeking powder puff, the brazen rouge cake and all other emergency aids to nature.

All records for receipts and expenditures of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania were shattered when the fiscal year ended with the totals showing $36,663,039 in revenues collected and payments amounting to $35,489,553.

GENERAL.—The population of Continental United States at the beginning of 1917 will be 102,826,300 and, with its outlying possessions, 113,309,285, the census bureau estimates, upon the increase as shown by the Federal censuses of 1900 and 1910.

A report from Washington says: "There were 120 persons in the United States in 1915 who paid taxes on incomes of $1,000,000 or more. On incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000, 209 paid taxes, and there were 122 others with incomes over $400,000."

An evidence of extent into which saloons are falling into disfavor is to be noted in the provision made by Congress that hereafter Washington must be dry on inauguration day.

The great inflow of gold into the country during the past fiscal year increased the Treasury holdings of the precious metal to $1,803,493,933, an increase of $420,533,943 over the previous year, according to the United States Treasurer's annual report.

The so-called Moody Schools are doing a wonderful work in preparing young people for life and for training in higher institutions. The records at Northfield Seminary show that 450 girl graduates of the institution are attending different colleges in America, and the Mount Vernon School for Boys has 400 of its former students enrolled in 12 colleges.

FOREIGN.—It is announced from London that among the passengers on the submarine steamer City of Birmingham was the great New Testament scholar, Professor J. Rendel Harris, formerly of Johns Hopkins University and Haverford College. All the passengers have been reported saved.

The following is from a New England paper: "Ambassador Naon's idea for a system of correspondence between high school and academy pupils of Argentine and the United States is a happy thought. Better understanding between the two great republics should be materially helped by this sort of association. Dr. Naon already has the plan under way and the American Peace Society, at his suggestion, has taken it up."

The largest cast-iron pipe contract ever placed in Argentine has just been awarded to the United States Cast Iron Pipe and Foundry Company by the Department of "Obras Sanitarias de a Nacion" (National Public Health Works). Four British firms tendered bids as well as the American one.

NOTICES.

In many Friends' homes there would seem to be something decidedly lacking, were there no "Moral Almanac" for ready reference, and no Friends' Calendar with its clear type and helpful verses, hanging on the wall. Through more than three generations the Tract Association of Friends has published the former, and for more than thirty years the latter; but perhaps few of the purchasers who have invested in these well-known annuals, realize that the cost of the two is well on toward four hundred dollars.

In pricing the present issue which is now on sale at Friends' Book Store, the Board of Managers has been confronted with cost advances ranging from about 20 to 40 per cent. over last year. As these publications have been sold nearly at, or even below cost, it is hoped that Friends will help the Association by purchasing liberally at the prices which they are compelled to give, and distributing to those who are not likely to receive them.

The Friends' Card Calendar for 1917 is now on sale at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, at six cents each, by mail ten cents. The Friends' Religious and Moral Almanac for 1917 is also ready at the following prices: Six cents each, sixty cents per dozen, by mail add one cent for single copies. With paper covers, seven cents each, seventy-five cents per dozen, by mail add one cent for single copies.

FRIENDS expecting to ship clothing to Wm. T. Elkinton to be forwarded by him to the war sufferers in Europe should, in every case, write to him in advance for shipping instructions. His address is 121 S. Third Street, Philadelphia. Cloth and clothing are greatly needed and Friends are again urged to help so far as their means permit.

COLLEGE SETTLEMENT FAIR.—The Friends' Select School Sub-Chapter of the College Settlement Association will give its annual Fair for the benefit of the College Settlement at the School on Seventh-day afternoon, Twelfth Month 9th. The attendance and patronage of all interested will be appreciated in support of this valuable social activity.

LYCEUM LECTURES REVIVED AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.—It is proposed to offer occasionally through the winter opportunities for instruction, entertainment and social intercourse, such as used to be furnished by the fortnightly meetings of the Friends' Institute Lyceum, at the lecture-room of Friends' Select School, Sixteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia. All Friends and others interested are invited to be present and to invite their friends.

The first lecture will be on Sixth-day evening, Twelfth Month 15th, at 7.45 o'clock. Professor Herbert L. Willett, Ph.D. of the University of Chicago, will speak on "The Youth of the Twentieth Century." Dr. Willett is one of the most-gifted public speakers at Chicago University, and is in great demand as a lecturer. He will speak before the School on the same day at 12.45 on "The Man of Tarsus." A cordial invitation is extended to this lecture also.

A second Lyceum lecture of much interest has also been arranged for the evening of First Month 5th.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

The following extracts are from a memorial from Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings "To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled," signed by John Drinker, Clerk, tenth of Second Month, 1796, a copy of which has just been added to the Friends' Reference Library, Devonshire House. It was called forth by a sense of religious duty "to assert the Sacred Rights of Conscience, which will be manifestly infringed should the Bill now in Contemplation for the establishment of a Militia throughout the United States become an enacted Law, the proposed Exemption being only nominal with respect to those who sincerely adhere to Gospel Conviction in this important point of faith and practice. . . . By Conscience we mean that apprehension and persuasion a man has impressed on his mind of his duty to God. And the liberty of Conscience we plead for, is a free and open profession and unmolested exercise of that duty. . . . It is not through any intention of embarrassing your Councils that we thus address you, but conceiving the subject to be of serious importance we desire it may obtain your weighty attention, and that Divine Wisdom may so preside in, and direct your deliberations, as to incline you to guard against any Act which may be opposed to the Progress of the peaceable Kingdom of Christ, by inflicting fines and penalties on those who are religiously constrained to manifest their sincerity in promoting its advancement."

GROWTH IN GRACE.

Years ago a woman Friend, who rarely spoke even in "Meetings for Discipline," rose, after the Queries and their answers had been read, and said, in a very impressive manner, "Friends, we no longer answer that most important Query of all, 'Has there been any growth in Grace amongst you?'" The writer, then a young girl, has never forgotten the incident, and partly on this account, was interested to hear that a recommendation was likely to be made to our Representative Meeting, that the same, or a similar Query, should be added to those for Meetings of Ministers and Elders, to be read and answered once a year, with the thought that it might "make the reporting of the state of the Society more effectual."

A Friend well-versed in historical matters says that the form of the old Query was this, "Is there among you any growth in the Truth?" but there was added to it another,

"And hath any conviction appeared since last year?" The form now proposed reads, "Is there, in the judgment of ministers and elders, a growth in spiritual life in the meetings to which they belong, and do there appear to be any convictions?"

The Query, in its original form, appears to have been in use in England when Clarkson's "Portraiture of Quakerism" was published in 1806.

The Friend alluded to above writes: "The substance as well as the style of the Query indicates an early origin. The dropping of it from the regular list was due, I believe, partly perhaps to a real difficulty in answering it, and partly to the fact that 'a doleful answer' came to be sent up from time to time." "We hope some Friends experience a growth in the truth," etc. This was not edifying, nor very informing, and probably the meetings got on quite as well without it.

"Whether this Query was ever used in America I cannot say, but I think it not unlikely. Evidently Queries were in vogue before there was any well-formulated Discipline, for this of course grew largely out of the practice."

Some discussion of the advisability of reviving the thought presented in this ancient Query revealed an honest difference of opinion. It was noted that instead of being read and answered in the open meeting it was only now to be considered by those who hold the station of ministers and elders—supposed to be watchful of the spiritual life in our meetings.

One of our older Friends felt that it might have been useful in the earlier time, but saw no purpose in reviving it now. Was there a note of sadness in his voice? Did he really feel—we questioned in our hearts—that in this day, it is hopeless to look for "growth" or convictions, surely not.

With the memory of his apparent discouragement in mind through the duties of a busy morning at home, some days after, the sorting out and putting away for the winter of some gladiolus bulbs brought the subject of growth up freshly, in a homely way. The bulbs looked much as they had in the spring, but a closer glance, beneath the outer skin, revealed clusters of smaller bulbs, showing the season's growth, and making it well worth while to care for this promise of future bloom. Life is growth; and if the tree or plant that shows no growth, or but little, is not considered worth the gardener's care, what shall we say of a meeting where no spiritual growth is noted?

Some "doleful answers" might need to be given. But shall we shrink from a knowledge of our true condition?

The query might be difficult to answer. Do we not find others so at times? And if an exact knowledge seems beyond our poor human judgment, have we not guarded phrases such as, "We believe,"—"So far as appears,"—"We trust that there is"—etc., all framed to cover possible errors in judgment.

And as we recognize that the most helpful feature of our custom of answering the Queries is the state into which the meeting is brought by an honest endeavor to put the questions to our own hearts, and to answer them for ourselves—so this one, most searching of all, might, in its repeated reading, from year to year, be of untold value in keeping before us the duty of looking for and expecting “a growth in the spiritual life.”

“Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain.”

THE QUAKERS AS MAKERS OF AMERICA.

FROM ADDRESS BY DAVID GREGG.

The Puritans who desecrated temples and destroyed the finest works of art are not the people to condemn others for rudeness, are not the people to bore the tongues of Quakers with red hot irons, and cut off their ears, and brand their flesh, and strip them naked and publicly scourge them for the crime of rudeness. In some cases the cruelties inflicted had unbalanced them mentally. The Quakers used no force; theirs was the strength of the martyr nature. On behalf of the Quakers I instance the letters which they wrote in their prisons, and the words which they spoke on the gallows, and the prayers which they offered for forgiveness of their murderers. I put these in the deadly parallel column with the Puritans' cruel laws and branding irons and knotted whips and public gallows, and then leave the decision of the case to posterity. There is this to be said for the Puritans: A popular reaction set in against persecution, and by this means Puritanism rectified itself. The reaction came from such outspoken men as the Puritan sea captains whose story John G. Whittier forcibly relates in a poem pertaining to the dark colonial days. The Quaker power in America reached its height in the coming of William Penn and in the establishment and life of the colony of Pennsylvania. William Penn was second only to George Fox as a Quaker influence. The territory of Pennsylvania was given to William Penn by Charles II. in lieu of money owed his father by the crown. The land was his to do with as he wished and he devoted it to working into life a Quaker commonwealth. There was no man better fitted to establish such a commonwealth than William Penn. He had paid a large price for the privilege of being a Quaker, and this made him a man to be trusted. He sacrificed the friendship of his home; his father said of him, “William has become a Quaker or some such melancholy thing.” He had ability; he was educated at Oxford. He was democratic in spirit; and his definition of a free government shows this. “Any government,” he said, “is free where the people are a party to the laws enacted.” He was a kindred spirit to John Bright, the Quaker statesman of Great Britain, who for a whole generation was a leading spirit in the great movements of his country, and who was always on the right side. John Bright got his principles from William Penn. An analysis of his public life will show the Quaker principle of civil life to be this: Political power is rightly exercised only when it is possessed by the consent of the governed and is used for the welfare of the community according to the permissions of the moral law. This principle guided William Penn when he organized his colony. He gave it a constitution and laws full of the genius of humanity and full of equal justice. He allowed all reforms to be pushed within his territory. There was not one good Quaker thing which did not flourish in it. Here the Indians were treated as brothers and here they acted brotherly in return. The colony was a temperance colony; it was an anti-war colony; it was a colony noted for its religious toleration. For over one hundred years the Quakers controlled it. Its homes were full of sweetness and strength. The colony was one of the greatest powers in the American revolution and furnished such men as Logan and Mifflin and Dickinson, all of them Quakers. Benjamin West, the great painter, was born here in a Quaker home; he was one of the founders of the Royal Academy of Great Britain. The liberty of thought granted by this colony bore its products and brought the colony honor. It enabled it to grow into what it is to-day, the second State in the Union. The colony gave the country the city of Philadelphia, the one city of the Republic which rivals Boston in old colonial landmarks, just as in the olden time it rivaled Boston in that leadership which inaugurated the American Revolution. It gave the country Independence Hall; it was the home of the Continental Congress. Here was framed and debated and publicly signed the Declaration of Independence itself, which made the American Revolution a historic fact. All this took place not on Puritan soil, but on Quaker soil, and all this took place where it did because there was more freedom of thought in Philadelphia than there was in Boston.

The part which the Quakers have taken in building the American Republic makes clear this two-fold way in which patriots can effectively serve their country:

1. By uttering an emphatic protest against all destructive evils.

History can ask no grander illustration of the power of protest than Quaker life on American soil. Why is it that there is no African slavery to-day within our borders? It is because the Quakers as early as 1688 issued their protest against African slavery, and kept it issued until the nation was educated up to the emancipation proclamation. But mark this: They invested their all in their protest. They meant it, and they made the American people feel that they meant it. Their protest was strong with the moral strength of a splendid personality and a consistent life; its power was moral.

2. By keeping before one's country uplifting and inspiring ideas.

We call guns, swords, powder, forts, iron-clads and armies national powers; the Quakers have taught us that there are powers beyond these. The powers beyond these are right thoughts, high ideals, holy visions, righteous principle, burning aspirations. These make a strong manhood and womanhood, make a strong, pure state. The men and women who have these thoughts, ideals, visions, aspirations, go straight to God for them; they are exponents of God. The ideal civilization exists only in the plan of God.

This is the message of the Quaker fathers to the patriotic sons of America: If you would render your country the highest service and lead it forward to the millennial age, be an intellect to your country, think for it; be a conscience to your country, make moral decisions for it; and think and decide within the lines of God's holy law. If you would render your country the highest service, be the Lord's prophet to your country; dream dreams for it and see visions for it. It was Socrates and Plato and Aristotle, men of thought and of vision, who were the promoters and conservators of the national strength of Greece; and it was Samuel and Elijah and Isaiah, the prophets of the Lord, who were the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof. Be to the American republic what these men were to the kingdoms of which they were citizens. Hold up ideals before the people as they did, and then, like them, you will attain a civilization embodying your ideals.

“EACH FOR ALL.”—If a cross-section showing a single day in the life of a civilized man could be exposed, it would disclose the services of a multitude of helpers. When he rises, a sponge is placed in his hand by a Pacific Islander, a cake of soap by a Frenchman, a rough towel by a Turk. His merino underwear he takes from the hand of a Spaniard, his linen from a Belfast manufacturer, his outer garments from a Birmingham weaver, his scarf from a French silk-grower, his shoes from a Brazilian grazier. At breakfast, his cup of coffee is poured by natives of Java and Arabia; his rolls are passed by a Kansas farmer, his beefsteak by a Texan ranchman, his orange by a Florida Negro. . . . In return he has contributed his mite to add a unit to the common stock of necessities and luxuries from which the world draws. Each is working for all; all are working for each.

THE WIND-SWEPT WHEAT.

Faint, faint and clear,
Faint as the music that in dreams we hear
Shaking the curtain fold of sleep,
That shuts away
The world's hoarse voice, the sights and sounds of day,
Her sorry joys, her phantoms false and fleet—
So softly, softly stirs
The wind's low murmur in the rippled wheat.

From west to east
The warm breath blows, the slender heads droop low
As if in prayer;
Again, more lightly tossed in merry play,
They bend and bow and sway
With measured beat,
But never rest—through shadow and through sun
Goes on the tender rustle of the wheat.

Dreams more than sleep
Fall on the listening ear and lull its care;
Dear years send back
Some treasured, forgotten tune.
Ah, long ago,
When sun and sky were sweet,
In happy noon,
We stood breast-high, 'mid waves of ripened grain,
And heard the wind make music in the wheat.

Not for to-day—
Not for this hour alone—the melody
So soft and ceaseless thrills the dreamer's ear;
Love, sorrow, longing, pain,
The restlessness that yearns,
The thirst that burns,
The bliss that like a fountain overflows,
The deep repose,
Good that we might have known, but shall not know,
The hope God took, the joy. He made complete—
Life's chords all answer from the wind-swept wheat!

VISIT TO NORTH CAROLINA.

Returning to the vessel, the alarm is soon after sounded, the hawsers thrown off and again we are steaming onward towards Norfolk and Portsmouth. These "twin cities" are highly interesting in many particulars. The former has been called the "Golden Gate of the Atlantic Seaboard." It possesses in many respects all the requirements for becoming a great metropolis. Its excellent climate, its harbor, easy of access, tideless and without current, adjacent to an agricultural district vast in extent and capable of producing four or five crops annually in the line of vegetables, and near waters that yield the world's biggest supply of fish, oysters, clams and crabs, the potentialities of such a city are overpowering. Already Norfolk is the world's greatest port for the shipment of vegetables, and its greatest station for the export of coal, it is the great peanut centre of the country, and the world's fourth cotton port. Here many railroad systems converge, and here we find a bewildering assemblage of wharves and warehouses amid which we thread our way to the railroad station at Portsmouth, where we are to enter upon the fourth stage of our journey by taking the train of the Seaboard Air Line, which is already impatiently waiting to depart on schedule time; but that spirit of hurry seems at first only an official bluff, since we but slowly move onward for many a mile farther into a land which but recently has begun to awake from its "manana" of plantation days "befo' the wa'". But to us this way of moving is agreeable, if only for its novelty; for have we not escaped from the hurry and bustle of the North partially for rest; then, too, we recall that we are on the way "to meeting," an engagement for which the slowing down of our mental and physical powers we have been taught is a fit preparation. We are now traversing a section of "Old Virginia," a country which lies in striking contrast to that with which our lives have been so familiar. We miss the great houses and barns, the green pastures and broad-acred homesteads; here we find patches—the remnants of old plantations, or else more recently hewn from the ever-abounding woodlands of short-leaved pine, oak, gum and maple through which the line of the railroad passes, making, together with the country roads, those avenues of commerce which connect the more fertile and settled portions of the country and span the great wastes of swamp and indifferent meadow that lie between.

Suffolk is the first large town reached as we journey onward. It is an important railroad centre and environed by a vast acreage of land devoted to market gardening, the vision of which is highly pleasing, surpassing, even as it does, anything the "Garden State" of the Union can afford. The principal crops now are seen to be peanuts, some cotton, and corn; as to the latter we note with interest that the universal manner of harvesting, in striking contrast to that of the North, is that of removing the leaves and tassel at the proper stage of growth for forage, and allowing the ear to hang on the stock until it may be convenient to harvest it, even well on into the winter season. Cows are seen but rarely; the hog everywhere seems to hold dominion—great pigs, little pigs, in ones and twos and dozens; white pigs, red pigs, mottled pigs, pigs whose ancestry would puzzle any judge at a stock exhibit, though he might with certainty be able to trace a strain of Yorkshire, Berkshire, Chester White, Jersey Red and the whilom almost sole porcine frequenter of these domains, the historic razor back.

The dwellings, aside from those of the towns, are almost, without exception, constructed with one story, are small, and have the chimney upon the outside; this is built of brick or of small timbers deeply imbedded in mortar. Not infrequently the water supply is drawn from a well furnished with the primitive sweep. The general aspect of thrift and prosperity so common in the North is lacking, for, be it remembered, this land and its people have not entirely passed from under the blighting effect of slavery, and that we are not far removed from the capitol city of the Confederacy.

Our journey has thus far involved the following distances: Philadelphia to Baltimore, 97 miles; Baltimore to Portsmouth, 189 miles; Portsmouth to Boykins, where we change cars for the last stage of the journey, 54 miles, leaving 18 miles to complete the journey to Woodland, our destination. Boykins lies in Virginia, where we have a wait of nearly a half hour. Our company is now composed of eleven persons; the fact of one common purpose in our journey has in a way brought us near together in fellowship. While we thus wait it may be proper to review a little of the history of the people and the meeting we are about to visit.

If we turn to the Journals of those sturdy pioneers of Quakerism in America, William Edmundson, George Fox, Thomas Chalkley and others, we shall find a quaint yet thrilling narrative of its beginnings in North Carolina. As regards the work of the former of these it has been said that "this missionary effort along the Albemarle was the first organized effort of any kind to carry the religion of Christ into North Carolina."*

From these beginnings about the year 1670 the Society continued to grow rapidly by convictions and immigration for one hundred years. In 1668 the Yearly Meeting of North Carolina was established at Old Neck, in what is now Perquimans County. About the middle of the eighteenth century through immigration from the North and east a large number of Friends had settled in Wayne, Randolph and Guilford Counties, thus forming three Quarterly Meetings to the westward, and from this time on it was but natural that there should be a strong effort made to transfer the place of holding the Yearly Meeting to that section of the State, a distance of upwards of two hundred miles. After some alternation this change was finally secured in 1813. Towards the end of last century the movement known as the "Great Revival," which began in the Middle West, had extended to North Carolina, where, as elsewhere, there was a diversity of sentiment as to its efficacy and the acceptance of certain innovations which it engendered, resulting in a separation of those disaffected from the main body of Friends. This occurred in the year 1903. The Book of Discipline of the separatists thus briefly states their case: "Those members of the Yearly Meeting who felt it was right for them to maintain the doctrines of the immediate and perceptible guidance of the Holy Spirit, and the Headship of Christ over all things to His Church; also the waiting worship and inspirational ministry which are, and must ever be, the outgrowth of these doctrines, believe it would be right for them to hold a Yearly Meeting. Accordingly they met in the capacity of North Carolina Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, at Cedar Grove, in the town of Woodland, Northampton County, in the year 1904." And here from year to year this group of people, together with such as may feel drawn to meet with them, have assembled in an honest endeavor to uphold the cause of Christ in the spirit of harmony and with love for all who profess His name in righteousness.

*"The Quakers in the American Colonies." RUFUS M. JONES.

With this brief review of the situation we will rejoin our friends already seated in the train at Boykins. We are soon confronted by the genial conductor, who greets us pleasantly, knows at a glance what we are and whither we are going, and then informs that others have already preceded us to the Yearly Meeting, and that so and so of the train service is a Friend and has secured leave of absence for the week in order to attend it. All this of course entuses us, and we begin to feel at home with the people we are about to visit, even if not yet in sight of them. We soon cross the line into North Carolina and notice that the section of country now traversed presents a far better appearance in every way than much we have left behind.

CONFERENCE AT CHESTER, PA.

A very valuable conference was held on First-day, Eleventh Month 10th, at the meeting-house at Chester, Penna., to consider some aspects of individual Christian duty, and also the duty of the meeting towards its community. A striking unity was observed throughout the exercises of the morning meeting for worship, and the three prepared addresses which followed. In the meeting for worship Thomas A. Sykes, a minister from East Lynn, Massachusetts, spoke first of the need of individual consecration to the Master's service; and J. Harvey Borton, of Moorestown, N. J., spoke of the "rivers of living water" which God was waiting an opportunity to have overflow from our lives to enrich and bless all those with whom we come into contact.

Following the meeting the first session of the conference was held in the meeting-house. Richard C. Brown read a paper on "Individual Christian Duty," pointing out that a truly religious life is one that is filled with the spirit of love, manifesting itself continually in works of service for our Master on behalf of our fellow-men.

After dinner at the home of one of the members of the meeting, a large company gathered for the afternoon session. Thomas A. Sykes spoke first of the need that we should get the Master's spirit of service, and then went on to mention some of the possibilities that lay before meetings that devoted themselves to action and sympathetic service towards their surrounding communities. He referred to meeting-houses which were filled with worshippers as a result of such service, of First-day schools which were ministering to the needs of those without other religious interests, and of the blessings that were coming into the lives of persons and of meetings that let themselves be used freely in the Lord's work.

J. Harvey Borton followed, emphasizing the blessing that attends such service for the Master, and urging that none of us allow ourselves to get into habits of life which do not include some very positive interest in some kind of religious service. Particularly he urged that every young man, starting out in business, should ally himself also with some philanthropic activity, or similar interest, that would draw him away from continual absorption in the thoughts of his business.

THE LAKE MOHONK CONFERENCE.

In his opening remark as Chairman of the Thirty-fourth Lake Mohonk Conference on the Indians and Other Dependent Peoples, Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, of Boston, likened the assembly to a number of persons who might be climbing to the top of a mountain. At first they were separated on different sides, in the undergrowth and trees, and were able to see but little. Finally as they pushed up and up toward the higher levels they find their views more extensive in their scope until at last when the summit is reached they discover, no matter what their difference of outlook may have been in the first instance, that at last the same extensive panoramas spread out before them. So it is with such Conferences as this one. Those attending come together bringing many different points of view. It is only by a combination of these that the best efforts can be crystallized into the best thoughts, the best processes for the future outlined and developed, as we arrive at true unity.

To two of the members of the Conference the approach to Mohonk was a very attractive one. They had been favored to drive from Pocono up the beautiful Delaware Valley and then across to Mohonk from Port Jervis, a distance of about one hundred miles, with the whole country aglow with the brilliancy of the autumn foliage. Most of those attending had come from the other direction, though some had followed a similar route to ours. With that approach we too had been familiar, but we had never before reached Mohonk from the south and west. From whatever direction one may come, however, the charm and beauty of the spot are compellingly attractive.

As usual there were some two or three hundred invited guests who composed the Conference proper. In addition there were many others, the regular guests of the hotel, who attended the sessions held in the large drawing-room overlooking the lake. In all there were six sessions held. Of these three were in the main devoted to the North American Indians and one to Porto Rico. The balance of the time was given chiefly to discussions of problems relating to the Philippine Islands.

The National administration of Indian affairs was ably represented by H. P. Pears, of Washington, Supervisor of Indian Schools; R. C. Allen, of Oklahoma, Probate Judge for the Choctaw Nation; and Dr. L. W. White, Superintendent of the Lac Flambeau Indian School, Wisconsin. Each of these speakers had something to tell with regard to his own personal share in the working out of problems, the solution of which has been a matter of so much thought and study for generations on the part of consecrated men and women. After many delays and long years of effort that fruit is at last being gathered.

In the field of education the most signal advance in the past year has been the adoption of an entirely new course of study which it is expected will produce remarkable results. This course includes not only ordinary academic training in the English branches, but also an industrial program, teaching of hygiene, sanitation and correct methods of living, all so correlated as to make a complete and well-rounded out scheme. The difficulties of preparing such a course are many, for it must be remembered that there are the greatest diversities of conditions among the Indians, some of them being as far advanced as most of their English-speaking neighbors, whilst others are in a condition little removed from savagery. Necessarily in the schools, English is the center around which all the training is grouped. In the industrial program great emphasis has been laid in the lower grades upon the improvement of general home conditions, whilst in the fourth, fifth and sixth grades stress is placed on agriculture and more advanced home making. Four years of vocational training follow the sixth grade.

The weakest point in the Indian character is the lack of initiative. The endeavor is made to overcome this situation by devoting the latter part of the course, especially with the larger boys, to such training as will make foremen of them and compel them to take responsibility upon themselves.

This new course of study went into effect in all Indian schools Second Month 1, 1916. In order to supplement it, last summer a number of conferences were held for discussion. All of the superintendents in the country but ten and about 1600 teachers were present, in all about one-fourth of the entirety of the Indian office employees. The results of these efforts should very much improve the character of the teaching in all of the Indian schools.

The difficulties are, however, manifold. It is evident that such a course is better adapted to the highly organized large schools than to the very large number of smaller schools where but few teachers are employed. In this connection it should be noted that Indian schools are suffering very largely from limited facilities. The plants are sadly inadequate; the teachers are underpaid; many of them in remote localities have but indifferent quarters in which to live. Among the great needs of the Indian school service at the present time are normal training, decent pay, decent houses, and a pension system for the teachers.

In health and sanitation forward strides are being made in all directions. The policy of the past dozen years of increasing the number of doctors and also of hospital facilities is commencing to show results. It was felt by many at the Conference, however, that the large claims that were made by one of the speakers, who represented the medical side of the work now being done by the government, were hardly justified by the situation as it exists. At the present time there are eighty-three hospitals for Indians, including nine sanatoria for the tuberculous.

Both in the school and in the hospital service there is need for more devoted workers who will feel that they are making a real contribution to Christian missionary work by giving their services to this very important part of the duties which our government has undertaken.

Through all the service the menace of politics is not to be overlooked. In time past the Indian Bureau has been riddled with this vice and though during the past decade the influence of politics has very much depreciated yet there has been enough of it seriously to hamper the work that ought to be carried on. When it is borne in mind that nearly one-third of all of the employees of the Indian Bureau, over six thousand in number, are changed each year either as respects their direct personnel or in the positions they occupy, it can readily be seen how difficult is the problem of properly officering such a great undertaking.

So the difficulties and discouraging features of the work were also dwelt upon. One of the serious handicaps is that there is no proper jurisdiction over petty offenders on many Indian reservations. When minor crimes have been committed it seems to be nobody's particular duty to hunt out or punish the offenders. Naturally this leads to vice and crime multiplying in very large degree.

In some localities where the Indians' property has become the prey of avaricious men most serious wrongs are committed against the Indians in order to deprive them of their wealth. Many instances of this were recited by Judge Allen of Oklahoma as coming within his own personal knowledge in connection with his work there.

We were also told of the conditions among the Osage tribe in Northern Oklahoma, whose great wealth has been a frequent subject of comment in the daily press. The result of riches has been really to pauperize the whole of the Osage nation. Most of these people have never had the training to qualify them to take care of their own property. As the result of the large payments being made to them by the government from time to time, produced by the royalties and rentals paid on their oil and gas leases, they lead lives of idleness and debauchery. There seems no way to accomplish an improvement in this respect save only by increased educational facilities for the children. Among these people it is gratifying to note that there has recently been a great decrease in the use of intoxicants.

Conditions among the Seminoles in Florida, not unfamiliar to the readers of THE FRIEND, were also discussed. Then there was an interesting and racy description by one of the supervising field matrons of her work last summer among the Blackfeet of Montana, when an organized force of doctors and nurses carried on an educational campaign among not quite 1000 members, being about one-third of that tribe. As respects their condition, it is interesting if appalling to note that only a little over twelve per cent. had normal eyes, whilst nearly sixty-five per cent. of them were suffering from trachoma in more or less advanced stage. Strangely enough, trachoma is almost unknown among the Indians of Canada.

The subject of Porto Rico did not claim so much attention. The most serious condition existing in the Island at the present time appears to grow out of the fact that owing to legal difficulties there is no way by which the Porto Ricans can gain citizenship anywhere. They lost their citizenship to Spain at the time of our war with that country, and we have given them nothing as a substitute for it. Literally a Porto Rican is "a man without a country."

Naturally the Philippines attracted a great deal of attention. The recent legislation in Congress as well as the change in the underlying principle by which affairs are being managed in the Islands came in for serious consideration. In contrast with other years there was not present at the Conference any considerable number of prominent government officials who are engaged in Philippine work. The reason for this was evident. The Philippine question was too live a political one during the late presidential campaign to make it proper for government officials to discuss the problems involved one way or the other. Those present who gave attention to the Philippine situation were largely men of experience who had had to do with work in the Islands in the past and had returned more or less recently. The sentiment was practically unanimous that before the real wishes of Filipino people on the subject of independence can be secured we must wait until after the generation, now growing up and which has had the opportunity of receiving the advantages of education from the American standpoint, has had the opportunity to make itself felt. This cannot be for a few years yet. With the great diversity of language, customs and degrees of civilization that there is in different parts of the Islands, it seems impossible for there to be any homogeneous civilization for a number of years to come. The hope for this is centered in the American school system. With the Filipinos, as in fact with every one else, education, Christian education, seems to be the keynote by which the difficulties and the problems may be solved.

The platform of the Conference has already been printed in full in THE FRIEND and it is not necessary to refer to it here.

The day after the close we again wended our way down into the great Roundout Valley and as we traveled along it we looked back from time to time to the great group of hotel buildings perched high up on the hillside with reminiscences of happy days spent there and of many delightful acquaintances.

WORK AMONG THE MOTHER RACE.

We are more and more impressed every day with the great capabilities of the Indian or mother race of Guatemala. Whenever they have a chance to make good they show what there is in them.

Not long ago we received a daughter of one of them into the girls' school, who has shown special capability as a believer and active church member, and we have great hopes of her for the future. Her father has had a severe trial lately. He was taken to serve as a soldier, and while there his house burned down and he lost all he owned in the house, which was more in his case than in some others, as he was very industrious. Then as soon as he got free from military service, he lost one after another six near relatives, including a son and his father, the latter converted in his last days to the Gospel. During all this time the tempter has been hard at work with him trying to persuade him that all his misfortune was due to his having accepted the Gospel. But his reply is, the Gospel teaches me to leave vice and sin. How can it be wrong?

Good brother Pedro Poz has continued faithful in his old work in Cantel, and in the work started last year in the neighboring village of Estancia, and in addition has opened up a new work in Quezaltenango with one service each week in the Indian language. He has also visited some of the congregations of the south coast lately. His family circle has been enlarged by a fine little Indian daughter lately whom he has named Naomi. His oldest daughter is in our girls' school this year and seems unusually bright. We have great hopes of this new work in Quezaltenango, for there are so many Indians there and they have less suspicion of anything they hear.

The believers of the mother race in San Antonio are showing some remarkable fidelity. They live in a ranch about six miles away, and must cross six rivers to get to church, and in the rainy season these rivers are swollen with the rains, two of them being quite dangerous. This last year one of the men was washed down and nearly lost his life. It was one of these Indians who was speaking of the tobacco habit and Christianity, and remarked in a sententious way, "Better take out stumps and all while you are clearing the ground."

A group of fifteen Indians attend the church at Retalhuleu. One of them lately lost a son, and the ranch owner refused to allow them to bury in his land, because the Indian funerals are always drunken carousals usually resulting in wounds and sometimes in murders, and often in legal trouble. So the owner said to them "go and bury your dead somewhere else, I don't want any drunkenness around here." The father of the dead boy said, "Patron, we are not that kind of people. We are 'Evangelicals.' Search us and see if any one here has a bottle. Examine and see if any one of us smells of brandy. We are decent people. We don't do those things." The owner was dumbfounded at hearing such things from an Indian, but saw that he told the truth, and immediately gave him the desired permission.—From the Guatemala News.

SYRIAN NOTES.

DEAR FRIEND:—

I am enclosing several extracts from letters which have lately come from my husband, that I think will be of general interest to Friends.

We have just completed the shipment of boxes for Syria, in which so many Friends have been interested, and I would like to thank again all who have so generously contributed to the relief of the sufferers there, and have in this way lightened the burden, which must press so heavily on my husband, of seeing so much distress all around him and being able to do so little to relieve it.

We have sent three boxes containing warm underclothing for men, women and children, stockings and shoes, pieces of materials for dresses, bolts of outing flannel and unbleached muslin, children's dresses, sweaters and scarfs, with a good supply of needles, cottons and other sewing accessories.

We have also sent a box of medicines, chosen from a list made out by one of the Beyrout doctors, of drugs that were badly needed in Syria.

A supply of groceries which I sent for my husband completed the shipment. A cheque for five hundred dollars has been forwarded through the Department of State to my husband, and I hope to send another next month, as the Committee for the Relief of the Armenians and Syrians told us there was urgent need for money to be cabled at once, so as to save the lives of those who would otherwise die of starvation before the Christmas ship could reach Syria.

I understand a second ship may be sent later on, and if any Friends would like to prepare for a later shipment of goods or would like to contribute to funds which I shall be forwarding through the winter, I shall be most grateful to receive and acknowledge the same.

May I ask that we should follow the Relief Ship with our prayers, for there are dangers and difficulties to be met with and overcome before her cargo can be safely landed and distributed in that far-off land, but our Heavenly Father, who has already so wonderfully opened the way for her to be sent, will surely protect her to the end of her voyage, and make her a messenger of comfort and good will to those who have been so long cut off from all outside sympathy and help.

I am thine very sincerely,

EMILY OLIVER.

GERMANTOWN, Pa., Eleventh Month 27, 1916.

SIXTH MONTH 13, 1916.

I am in splendid health and enjoying perfect liberty. I am free to go and come anywhere as I wish, and I receive only kindness and courtesy from all. That has been my experience all along, and I cannot speak too highly of the consideration and courtesy which the authorities have shown me. One of my favorite relaxations is gardening, and I do not think our garden has ever looked more beautiful. We have not such a variety of flowers as we have sometimes had, but everything is so green and fresh. The lavender is at its best at the present moment. We have roses all the time.

SIXTH MONTH 20, 1916.

I am in perfect health, and feeling very fit in every way. I have plenty to do and enjoy my work. I read a great deal, and do some thinking. I walk and I ride, daily, or almost daily, and so I feel I have very much to be thankful for. There are things that I long for that are denied to me, but then I have learned long ago that one cannot have all things at the same time in this life. We can only have some things, that is, a choice of things, and when we make our choice then it would be foolish to be pining for what lies outside that choice. The true wisdom is to find the treasures and pleasures that lie in our daily path and make the most of these, and in doing so, we shall surely find the true balm for every heartache.

EIGHTH MONTH 16, 1916.

If I were speaking instead of writing I think I could tell a great many things that would be very interesting, but when I shall have an opportunity of speaking to you, if that time ever comes, will be so distant that I turn my thought away from dwelling on it. Life is very complex, and we are living in a time such as was never known in the world before, hence all ordinary standards of judging or estimating time do not any longer hold. The grim realities of life are staggering. The whole world seems to be in the throes of some infernal volcano and where it is all going to end, or when, is a problem so vast that when I attempt to tackle it my mind is simply stunned and overwhelmed with the magnitude of the issues involved, and I turn away from it with a feeling of utter helplessness, but at the same time I am glad that I am only responsible for being faithful in my own work, the rest I must leave to God who has not forgotten His world, although at times it almost looks as if He had done so. I know practically nothing of what is going on in the world. My isolation is complete. I wonder if ever I shall catch up again with current affairs, and if that is possible, I sometimes wonder if I shall have the same deep soul interest in them as in days gone by. My life now is full of interest and always occupied. The love of nature and books fill up all my spare moments. Oh, the beauties of nature. How blind we are at times to the loveliness of the Creator's works that are all around us, and yet how true it is that

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever;
Its loveliness increases, it will never Pass into nothingness, but will keep
A bower of quiet for us, and a sleep
Full of sweet dreams and health and quiet breathing."

I had a very pleasant visit this week from a German officer, who is an old friend of mine. It was lovely to see him again as I had not seen him for many years. The Germans have been so delightfully kind to me, without exception. I have always had a great regard for the Germans—they are such a fine people—and those that I know personally are excellent friends, but after my experiences during the past two years, my respect for the Germans has greatly increased. I could not occupy space now to tell of my exciting experiences, but some day I hope to be able to do so, and I have some lovely things to tell of my experience of the kindness and friendship of the Germans. There are some of them amongst the very best and kindest people on the face of the earth.

I am in splendid health, for which I am especially thankful at present. I am taking every precaution to keep my health up to the maximum because of my surroundings, and I hope I shall continue to be successful. I sold my horse some weeks ago, because it was too expensive for me to keep a horse at present, and I can manage to do without one, although I miss riding very much. I am doing more walking in consequence. I live night and day in the fresh air and the love of nature grows upon me every day. With such a beautiful world surrounding one it would be difficult not to be interested and absorbed in its loveliness, and I can truly say that I am both. Jack, my dog, is a delightful companion, and a splendid guard, although he is not needed in the latter capacity. He is never far away from me and the affection that shines in his dark brown eyes is touching and beautiful. Whoever may betray his master, Jack will never do so. Recently, when I was away from home, and under a very heavy cloud, Jack never left my bed-room door. He lost his spirits and was looking very wretched, but when I returned home he went almost crazy with joy. He could not allow me to get out of his sight, he was so afraid that I might disappear again. At night he slept outside on the sill of my bed-room window so that he could see me in the room, and hear me when I moved. How beautiful is love and faithful affection even in a dog. As a matter of fact, dogs never fail in this respect. I was in very serious difficulties three weeks ago through the false accusation of some unknown enemy. The details are most interesting, as far as I know them, and sometime I shall tell all, but not now. A sudden arrest at two o'clock A. M. has of necessity elements of surprise and romance. However, only truth will stand. A man need never fear the punishment for something which he has not committed. The best companion in the world, under all circumstances, is a good conscience. The Government treated me with all courtesy and consideration. No one failed in respect and kindness even when suspicion was at its worst. Ultimately the order came from His Excellence, Jemal Pasha, which restored me to my former position of perfect freedom to go and come in the country as before. I feel it is a great honor to have the full confidence of the Commander-in-Chief. The examination will have done me good, and my enemies will not attempt any more lying, I hope.

WHEN?

Exhaustion is not Peace—
Only success
Of War, from lack of men
To fight again!
Nor yet, when swords are sheathed
And victors wretched,
The while their foes he still Beneath their heel,
Is true Peace won at last.
But—rancour past—
When Nations learn to spell
Just one word well,
Not "I" nor "You" but "We!"
When will that be?

NEWS ITEMS.

A SYMPOSIUM "Does America Want Military Training for School Boys?" has been prepared by a Committee of the Peace Committee. It contains the opinions of eighty men and women, every one of whom has a right to a hearing on the subject.

Here is an opportunity for the Friend who does not actually work on any peace committee to secure these folders and mail them widely among his friends. Apply to room 25, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

WESTTOWN NOTES.—In a former issue of THE FRIEND allusion was made to the closing of "The Farm House" for the winter. The date stone on the east wall of the house is 1850, so that we have reasons for assuming that the house has been a place of entertainment without interruption for sixty-six years. One who appreciates what the place has stood for writes:

"The School and all its friends are lamenting the closing of the doors of the Farm House to the public. Nor is the convenience of the place the only consideration. In the nine years that Charles and Mary Stratton have been in charge the teachers, the students and their friends have found their hospitality a thing long to be remembered. By their unflinching efforts to make the place attractive and pleasing they endeared themselves to all who came in contact with them. The teachers miss the chance to slip away from the School for a quiet meal and a chat with Mary Stratton. The students can yet hardly believe they have no place where their parents or friends may take them for a change and visit. The public in general is finding it very inconvenient to have no place of entertainment except at the school. With the going of Charles and Mary Stratton it seems an almost necessary adjunct to the School is gone."

Included in the lecture course for the year, two lectures have been given since our last report.

On the first of the month, Marguerita Phillips, class of 1912, who graduated at Vassar College last Sixth Month and who, for superior work in geology was rewarded with a trip to Alaska, told us of her trip and experience, and illustrated her lecture with a set of Alaskan pictures, photographed and beautifully colored by herself.

Samuel Scoville, Jr., of Haverford gave a talk to the school on the "World of the Wild Folk," the afternoon of the 8th.

Soccer has been to the fore as afternoon sport for the boys and hockey for the girls.

The Faculty has played the School in two games of soccer. In the first the School won, two to one. In the second game the score was reversed.

Owing to the late date of opening School in the Autumn, there has been but one week-end visit home.

George L. Jones and wife were present at Wilmington Monthly Meeting, Delaware, on the 7th inst.; at the tea meeting following the former gave some account of Friends and their meetings in New England.

Ida L. Delong attended the sixth annual meeting of the National Council of English Teachers at New York, on the 1st.

Walter H. Wood attended a meeting of the Permanent Board of New York Yearly Meeting in New York, on the 5th.

S. Edgar Nicholson, editor of The American Friend, visited at the School his daughter, Caroline Nicholson, who is teaching here, and his son, Francis, a member of the Senior Class.

The Senior Class has elected as officers for the year: President, Milton P. Hunter; Vice President, Edwin Vail; Secretary, Eleanor Rhoads; and Treasurer, William J. Cheynev.

Recently the members of the Faculty entertained at the Lake House those who live in cottages on the campus. Two weeks later, those out of the building reciprocated by giving an eight-course dinner, each course at a different house.

USING THE METRIC SYSTEM.—One incidental result of the war is that large numbers of manufacturers and workmen in England and the United States have for the first time become familiar with the metric system through its use in making goods for the continental Allies. Now, after a man has been using the metric system it is as hard for him to go back to our awkward and irrational weights and measures as it is for one who is accustomed to the decimal coinage of other countries to use pounds, shillings and pence. The theoretical superiority of the metric system has always been well known and conceded in Anglo-Saxon countries, but so long as the people were unacquainted with its practical advantages through personal employment of it, the movement for its general adoption made little progress. Now the general public is becoming familiar with it and the American or Englishman talks about "42-centimeter guns" and "203-meter hill" as easily as if he were a Frenchman or German.

The scientific and engineering societies of Great Britain are urging that the metric system be made compulsory and the question has already been brought up in Parliament as a necessary means of trade expansion. A country that insists upon its customers using its own local weights and measures instead of those of the rest of the world will be at a permanent disadvantage. The Pan-American conferences always talk about the desirability of a common system in the Americas and always recommend the metric, but the United States holds out like an obstinate juror against the other twenty republics. Recently, however, it seems that American prejudice is dying down. The National Wholesale Grocers' Association is awake to the need and has recommended that the metric equivalents of the weight of contents be printed upon all packages. Our schools have long included the metric system in their curriculum, but it has often been taught in a perfunctory and uninviting way. Now is the time for teachers to take it up in earnest and give their pupils a practical acquaintance with its advantages.

SUPERINTENDENT SCHAEFFER ON MILITARY TRAINING IN SCHOOLS.—Nathan C. Schaeffer, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Pennsylvania, has sent this strong letter to superintendents, principals and teachers in the schools of the State:

"In view of the fact that legislation is pending in the United States Senate more drastic than the militarism of the countries now at war, I take the liberty of sending you some literature on the introduction of military drill into our schools and colleges. Senate Bill 1695, introduced by Senator Chamberlain, of California, provides that all persons between twelve and twenty-three years, inclusive, must submit to military drill under penalties ranging from twenty-five to five hundred dollars, and twenty days' imprisonment. It makes an exception in favor of members of well-recognized religious organizations whose creed forbids participation in war; but no protection is afforded to the thousands of others or their parents who are conscientiously opposed to military drill and training for killing.

"In Australia military drill becomes obligatory at the age of fourteen, and in New Zealand at the age of sixteen. In these countries thousands of boys have been thrown into military prisons, where they came in contact with undesirable characters and without any of the safeguards which the home throws around its children.

"After her defeat in the war of 1870-1871, France introduced military drill into her schools. More than two decades ago this was dropped from the curriculum, and the uniforms and other expensive accoutrements were sold at auction. That this was not a mistake is evident from the account which the French soldiers are giving of themselves in the trenches.

"Germany has relied upon gymnastics in the schools to develop the strength and endurance which the soldier needs. Dr. Angerstein, a high authority in army circles, pronounces it a physiological crime to introduce military drill into the schools.

"Since gymnastic drills and other exercises are employed to counteract the one-sided physical development which drill with guns produces, the inference is sometimes drawn that gymnastics and military drill are synonymous terms. Did any one ever claim that dancing is military drill because it is used as part of the setting-up exercises in some military schools? It is possible to introduce and maintain a rational system of physical education without the drill with guns.

"A company of one hundred soldiers requires thirteen commissioned and non-commissioned officers; a regiment requires 130 officers, and a million soldiers require 130,000 officers.

"Since there are more than twelve million male persons in the United States between the ages of twelve and twenty-three, the proposed legislation would give us more than one and a half million military officers in a country devoted to the arts of peace. Who can foretell the ultimate effects of such a policy or system after it has been fastened upon the youth of our land?"

FRIENDS AND THE NEW NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.—The American Union Against Militarism sends this extract from the address of Congressman George Huddleston, of Alabama, in the House of Representatives on Ninth Month 5th:

"The gentleman from Virginia made the point the other day that this bill exempts Quakers and others whose religious beliefs are opposed to war. But he did not call the attention of the House to the significant and essentially militarist change in the status of Quakers under this bill. Section 59, after reciting the usual exemptions from militia duty, such as the Vice-President of the United States, naval and military officers, and so forth, adds:

"And all persons who because of religious belief shall claim exemption from military service, if the conscientious holding of such belief by such person shall be established under such regulations as the President shall prescribe, shall be exempted from militia service in a combatant capacity; but no person so exempted shall be exempted from militia service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be non-combatant."

"This is something new, gentlemen. You do not find it in American legislation on the subject of militia and militia exemptions. It was borrowed from Europe, a product of the great war, invented—not by the civil authorities, but by the military authorities—to get a hold upon those elements in the community which object to war. Under that clause the military authorities can seize a Quaker and put him at whatever line of work an epauleted military chief has deemed 'non-combatant.' They do not consult his conscience in the matter. They consult only their own will. So they take him and put him to carrying shells, entrenching, or at ambulances work, thus releasing other able-bodied men for service in the trenches; or they put him at mine-sweeping, and send him to jail if—as I am told has happened—he insists, as a conscientious Quaker, upon sweeping up the deadly mines of his own country as well as those of the enemy country. In short, from the standpoint of the Quaker, this bill withdraws the main protection which he has earned by his hundred or so years of war against war. It abolishes his right of private conscience, and it drives him, by the power of the State, to contribute indirectly—if not directly—to the murder of other men.

"You cannot read this bill to a Quaker and fool him into thinking that you have left him the freedom he has fought for, the right to abstain from taking human life. He knows that you have made serious inroads upon his freedom, a serious invasion of that sacred right."

A News dispatch from London, dated Tenth Month 20th, says, the House of Commons has passed the second reading of the Rhodes Estate Bill, which would exclude Germans henceforth from enjoying scholarships at Oxford University under the Cecil Rhodes trust fund.

The Rhodes Estate bill would set aside, apparently, the provision of Cecil Rhodes' will by which he founded five scholarships for Germans to be nominated by the Kaiser. That paragraph follows:

"I note the German Emperor has made instruction in English compulsory in German schools. I leave five yearly scholarships at Oxford of 250 pounds ($1,250) per annum to students of German birth, the scholars to be nominated by the German Emperor for the time being. Each scholarship to continue for three years, so that each year after the first three there will be fifteen scholars. The object is that an understanding between the great Powers will render war impossible, and educational relations make the strongest tie."

ENGLISH Friends have had new problems thrust upon them not a few, as a result of the complex conditions surrounding them. That they are on the threshold of others is indicated by the following letter which appeared in print a few weeks ago, and which contains important food for reflection.

Of recent years no "concern" of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has gained a stronger hold upon the membership than that introduced a few years since and known among us as "our duty towards those just outside the Society." Without offering a comment on the subjoined letter, we wish to commend its spirit to the thoughtful perusal of all.—[Eds.]

MEMBERSHIP IN A CHRISTIAN SOCIETY.

Dear Friend.—Our Society has had to face many problems since the outbreak of war. Amongst these, one of the most important is the consideration of what is involved in membership of a Christian Society. This is matter which we are bound to deal with in the near future. It is being forced upon us from two opposite directions. On the one hand, there are the cases of those who have felt it their duty to enlist, and we know that the Yearly Meeting has deferred action in relation to them until hostilities come to an end. (With these should be included those Friends who have supported the war.) But there is another and a brighter side to this problem which is becoming one of great urgency and it is of this that I want to write. Our opposition to war and our stand for a new way of life is attracting people to us. The sympathy we have extended to conscientious objectors, regardless of the distinctions which some have tried to make between the religious and the political conscience, is drawing many persons of varying types and experiences to our meetings. Already some of these have applied for membership. Many more are likely to do so in the near future, and in this way a new challenge is coming to the Society. It is more than probable that we may have many applications for membership from some persons who think of the Society as a Peace organization and nothing more. Some have already been received. There will be others (probably the majority), who whilst realizing that underlying our Peace testimony there is a spiritual conception of life which we seek to apply to worship and conduct and the solution of our social disorder, are unaccustomed to our Quaker methods of saying and doing things.

My purpose in writing this letter is to urge Friends to do some hard thinking on the question of what constitutes membership in a Christian Society. It seems to me that we shall be greatly helped both in relation to those who have enlisted and to those keen pacifists who are drawing towards us if we will try to understand the fundamental basis of membership in our Society. In our meetings and in our homes let us earnestly consider this question, and exercise a large-hearted and tolerant spirit in such consideration. If the impact of a large number of persons, some of whom may give expression to their spiritual experience in terms to which we are unaccustomed, should cause us some bad "shocks" in our meetings, let us rejoice and be thankful for the awakening touch of minds that are cast in a different mold from our own. We have much to learn from the hundreds of men now in prison. They are reaching new levels of spiritual experience unknown to us. The same must be true of their women folk. We need their help. The time has come for us to realize that our Society must no longer be a "spiritual aristocracy" (as G. M. Trevelyan describes us in his "Life of John Bright") but a spiritual democracy—a fellowship of persons who desire to take part in a forward spiritual movement, and to make articulate by life and by word the truth we see, and which others are helping us to see more clearly than ever before.

Lastly, I would ask Friends to seek an answer to this query: Are we, both as individuals and as congregations in such a state of "spiritual preparedness" that we shall be able to give that help which will be looked for by those who are expecting to find a spiritual home amongst us? Your friend sincerely,

ROBERT DAVIS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

30 KOUN CHO, Mita, Shiba,
TOYO, Japan, Tenth Month 20, 1916.

It hardly seems possible that I have been back in Tokyo for almost two weeks. The time is flying as fast as ever and it is a great joy getting started in the regular round of work again in spite of the extreme weather, which makes us feel like retreating to the mountains for another spell. The locusts and other insects are numerous, as are the small boys trying to catch them with long bamboo poles with a little stickiness on the end; the natives wear as few clothes as possible and we foreigners swelter in the coolest things we possess; the sun beats down by day and the moon by night; in fact, one might think it was mid-summer instead of the beginning of fall! But just now there are some black clouds coming up and we are expecting a little rain and then nice, cool weather. But even at that we have not had such terrible heat as it is reported you have had in America this past season.

This is also the time for returning missionaries. The boats have been coming back with record lists of passengers for the last month. I told of the return of Edith Sharpless last week, and since then we have had many visitors either passing through or staying in Japan. Roderick Scott, Haverford, and wife (daughter of President Kelly, of Earlham) were here over night the other day, and we had a fine time talking over mutual friends, etc. I believe I mentioned Carroll Malone and wife, from Cleveland, last time. A friend of ours has just been here for a few days with his newly acquired wife. A friend named Walter Williams, wife and small son were here one night on their way to their work near Nanking, China. Then there are many new people in Tokyo who intend to go to Language School, which opened yesterday with about thirty-five students, which is a record. We are sorry one or more of these new people are not members of our Mission, but we have surely gotten our share of good things this year and hope for some one next year.

Then another excitement here has been that all our evangelists from the country have been here for five days attending meetings held in one of the churches by Charles Inwood, of Keswick Convention. I have already spoken of this man's work at Karuzawa, and he was good as usual here, although much simpler because speaking to Japanese audiences, many of whom were not Christians. But he had the straight Gospel. The interpreter was wonderful. I heard many experienced missionaries and Japanese say they had never heard such wonderful interpreting. The usual way of interpreting is to either give the whole thing after, as it was done for Dr. Wm. A. Brown when here last winter, or after a completed thought or paragraph. But this time it was done after every sentence and they were all very short—two, three or five words usually and sometimes but one word. It was done so rapidly that the thought was hardly interpreted and Charles Inwood went right on with his gestures. I was down at the central station to see them off yesterday, and it was impressive to see him say "Good-bye" to the interpreter. I thought he was going to embrace him, the way he held his shoulders and patted his head. He was overflowing with gratitude for what the little man had done for him, and told him he was "filled with the Spirit," or he could not have done it. And it was true, indeed. Anyway the meetings were always well attended and they have been the source of much blessing to the Japanese and ought to lead them to a deeper consecration than ever before. It is wonderful what a power there is in the plain Gospel given very simply without any flowery language or deep arguing—just a presentation of truths. I got a lesson from the fact that Charles Inwood gave himself wholly to the meetings. He did absolutely nothing else but that—no time for seeing people or sight-seeing. I fear I've been putting too much of my energy into running around the country as described in my last letter, and not enough into the real work of a missionary. I'll try harder to keep down to business in the future.

With the best of wishes to all of you and may we all endeavor to more and more put forth all our efforts in bringing in His Kingdom.

I am as ever your devoted though distant friend,

HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

P. S.—During supper we have had a glorious down-pour and now it is much cooler, so blessings continue to shower upon us.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Ten schools in Philadelphia have been selected by the Board of Superintendents of Public Schools in which the concentration of the seventh and eighth grade schools, under departmental instruction, will be tried with a view to reorganizing the elementary system. One school has been chosen in each of the city school districts, and each school will have ten classes of seventh and eighth grade scholars, who will be drawn from the surrounding eighth-grade schools.

Pennsylvania's system of State aid to local charities has always worked badly. The Medical Bureau has now issued a report attacking most of the 166 hospitals receiving State money, and resentment of their bad showing is especially keen because they have so largely neglected all public functions.

Co-operative motor trucking to make farm owners independent of railroads in getting their products to consumers was considered by representatives of 18,000 farmers in the annual session of the New Jersey Grange, in Atlantic City.

The gift by an anonymous donor of $600,000 to Columbia University for the construction and equipment of a building for the newly established School of Business was announced by the trustees of the University. The School of Business was opened this year and has about 1200 students. In a letter to President Butler the donor wrote that for more than a third of a century he had been impressed with the need for such a school of business as Columbia has established, and feels a strong sympathy for college graduates who seek employment and discover they possess little knowledge or skill that is marketable.

GENERAL.—With a calendar overcrowded with general legislation, with railroad reforms and high-cost-of-living investigations on its program and unprecedented estimates of nearly a billion and a-quarter for the nation's expenses for the next fiscal year to be considered, the Sixty-fourth Congress convened on the 4th for its last session.

Football claimed fifteen lives during the 1916 season which closed with Thanksgiving Day games, according to figures compiled by the Associated Press. Last year the total was sixteen, and in 1914 there were fifteen deaths.

"Religious Education and the Coming World Order" is to be the theme of the Fourteenth Annual Convention of the Religious Education Association which will be held at Boston, Second Month 27 to Third Month 1, 1917. The theme will be developed in addresses at popular evening sessions in Symphony Hall and other meeting-places, and will be studied in its relations to the colleges, to churches and First-day schools, to the family, to public schools and to other social agencies in special meetings held in the afternoons.

In Massachusetts, where accident records are kept carefully, one person was killed or injured in 1915 for every eighteen motor vehicles registered. If the 25,000 foreign cars visiting the State are included in the computation, it shows one person injured or killed for every twenty-two motor cars. The gravity of such an accident record cannot be denied, yet even such figures are relative, and should be compared with the accident record of street cars, which run on tracks and require less skill for safe operation.

A Boston girl has been winning school-home garden prizes from nine to seventeen years of age. This year she is the premium canner of her age and weight. She has a garden of 700 square feet, another of 600, and this summer, at seventeen, she was official supervisor of more than one hundred other gardens. The city girls are setting country girls a lively pace in gardening.

Word has been received from Norman Angell to the effect that he will be in America from Third Month 15 to Fourth Month 3, and during that period may lecture on international politics.

FOREIGN.—In the Government crisis in London Herbert H. Asquith resigned the Premiership, which he has held through eight stormy years of domestic and foreign history. The Unionist leader, Andrew Bonar Law, Secretary of State for the Colonies, was summoned to the palace immediately, and the King offered him the Prime Minister's commission.

The best sellers in the book-shops of Japan are said to be works of history and geography and foreign language dictionaries. The Japanese are still diligently seeking information about other peoples.

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND.—Thinking that those who have contributed and those who are contemplating contributing to this Fund will be interested in knowing what the contributions, totaling to date, $61,689, consist of, the following list is appended: 18 of $25 or less, totaling $289; 3 of $50; 15 of $100; 8 of $200; 7 of $250; 1 of $300; 11 of $500; 1 of $600; 12 of $1000; 2 of $2000; 3 of $3000; 1 of $5000; 2 of $10,000.

The cordial interest of almost all of those who have been visited has been a great encouragement to members of the Collecting Committee, and they entertain the belief that their hopes of the real service which this Fund will perform in improving Friends' Schools will be realized.

"GIVE US WORK AND HOPE!"—The Friends' "Emergency Committee" (169 St. Stephen's House, Westminster Bridge, London) has through its special visitors kept in touch with the thousands of innocent "alien enemies" who have for so long been confined in the various detention camps in Great Britain.

The Committee's work of providing employment for the interned civilians is carried on with the sanction of the War Office and the Home Office, and with the encouragement and co-operation of the Commandants of the various camps.

With the strain of the prolonged internment becoming more marked, as the third winter of the war approaches, it is imperative that the occupants of the camps should be given the encouragement and the change of thought which follow regular and congenial employment, and this can be of the greatest value in saving them from hopelessness and despair.

The immediate need in one large internment camp is for work-shops to accommodate several hundred men for making toys and fancy goods, shoe-making, basket and mat-making, general woodwork and cabinet-making, clothing and metal-work, with the addition of store-rooms and a room to serve as a centre for religious, social and educational meetings. A careful scheme has been prepared which will probably involve an expenditure of $5,000 in that one camp. There is need of more than double that sum if the scheme is to be extended to other camps, where the cry "Give us work and hope" is making itself heard just as persistently.

The sum is a large one and on this side the demand for relief funds of all kinds is making it very hard to raise money quickly. Are there not sympathizers in America who will help to relieve the distress of mind of these unfortunate victims of war by setting them speedily to interesting work?

The cost of transit would probably preclude sending over wooden workshops in sections ready to put up, but if the Committee could receive a cabled assurance that part of the necessary sum was forthcoming they would be relieved of a weight of anxiety.

Will Friends and others in America use this channel of help, and by doing so aid many to keep their self-respect and their belief in the love of their fellow-men?

Is not this one way of setting forth the love of God?

ANOTHER JOHN THE BAPTIST ?

One can scarcely read a serious article written by an English Friend since the war began, without feeling that it carries the lament from beginning to end that Friends have been sadly negligent to a great trust committed to them, and that after the war has ceased it will be made more or less manifest, that if they had used greater diligence to press upon others the lessons they were in a position to teach, at least England's share in the strife might have been greatly different.

A credulous public looks upon such a statement askance and reasonably asks for evidence, and as yet, it must be admitted, no sufficient evidence is forthcoming.

On the other hand, there seems to be a settled conviction growing with each day's returns from the Tribunals, that there is a company of men and women in England, with a large nucleus of Friends as part of the group, who are making a record, which nothing but a time of war could call into existence.

None among us claim that war is essential that such traits of noble courage may be exhibited, but all who love the cause for which these suffer, return thanks many-fold that there are such witnesses to the Truth.

How easy it is sometimes for the devout historian to read God's finger in the ordering of human events after they have transpired and cause has had time to produce effect, and how impossible it is for the present to judge of its own actions in the same honest and critical spirit.

Those who hold faith in the overruling mercies of a Heavenly Father, when they can see nothing but discouragement and worse ahead, must cling to the belief that out of sight, and, alas, often out of mind, as well, He is still ruling in the affairs of men and will reveal His power to those who come after in some of the very events that are transpiring now, but which our eyes are unable to see.

It is surely not irreverent to believe that God is again exposing the wickedness of man to praise Him and out of the holocaust of all that is wicked in human thought and action, which was never shown forth on a greater scale than it is to-day, He "will perfect praise" and bring to pass that which the eyes of the present can see only by faith. But He must choose instruments to gain His ends and these must be imbued with the spirit of self-surrender and sacrifice, and until these are ripe for the service He has in store, the great lesson waits.

It has always been the case that circumstances shape themselves to fit the reception of some great reformation. The man who trusts God in history as his leader finds an easy explanation for this. It was emphatically so in the days of the rise of the Society of Friends. George Fox was not the discoverer of the "inward way" to God. We have ample evidence that there had been before his day a widespread unrest in various countries of Europe, notably in England and Germany, and this found expression in the life and preaching of Fox. His experience was without question first-hand experience as witnesses this often-quoted passage from the Journal: "When all my hopes in them [the priests] and in all men was gone, so that I had nothing outwardly to help me, nor could tell what to do, then, O then, I heard a voice which said, There is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition, and when I heard it, my heart did leap for joy. . . . My desires after the Lord grew stronger, and zeal in the pure knowledge of God and of Christ alone, without the help of any man, book or writing. For though I read the Scriptures that spoke of Christ and of God, yet I knew Him not, but by revelation, as He who hath the key did open, and as the Father of Life drew me to His Son by His Spirit," but there was fallow ground in many places, ready to receive and to nourish into life the doctrines Fox taught.

It is true that George Fox had begun his ministry in 1648. It does not detract one iota from his fame that the great awakening in England came through the little band of sixty converts who had in large measure been ripe for the change they experienced when he first came among them and preached the great sermon on a First-day afternoon at Firkbank Fell.

It is easy for us of to-day to see in the revolt of opinion against the dogmatism of the seventeenth century, the preparing of the way for the reception of George Fox's new teaching. There has been a John the Baptist as the forerunner of every reform, and it was this spirit of earnest inquiry that was preparing the way for George Fox. "In the keen doctrinal atmosphere of the time, a day's dispute in public between opposing combatants was the most delightful and improving of pastimes. A Puritan divine, for example, at Henley-in-Arden, would take up the cudgels against preaching without a call, and argue his case with five private preachers—a nailer, a baker, a ploughwright, a weaver and a baker's boy. When Thomas Taylor, who afterwards became a Friend, disputed at Kendal in 1650 on the subject of infant baptism in the parish church against three other ministers, and had got the better of them, his hearers ran up Kendal Street crying: 'Mr. Taylor hath got the day! Mr. Taylor hath got the day!' with an enthusiasm now reserved for the result of a game in football."*

There has always been pioneer work before any great moral issue has been brought to a crisis, and long before the crisis has been reached there have been years of willing service on the part of multitudes whose individual identity has never been recognized. It is God's plan in the evolution of His work to use men and women and to conceal their names, one here and another there simply standing out as witnesses for the age in which they live, that those who come after may have landmarks to measure their progress.

The query is often raised, "Is the present scourge of war the final pass in the great game of nations? Has the seed-sowing of the past in the interests of Peace grown into sufficient strength and spread abroad its teaching to such an extent that the warring nations, and indeed mankind everywhere, as they turn with loathing from the recent past to a more hopeful future, shall gather strength from what these John the Baptists have been preaching?"

Into the hands of those sixty seekers, who listened to Fox's teaching in the north counties of England in 1652 was committed a trust that ripened, after most of them were dead, into the rich boon of religious and civil liberty. Everywhere to-day that language is spoken, and wherever men look each other face to face, the question of Peace and War is under discussion; in the trenches among the men at the front, in the councils of state, in the churches and in the homes. If there are a few little bands of Christians who have seemed to gain a clearer vision of the great Eternal Truth, may they stand as steadfast to the cause as did the sixty whom Fox says: "The Lord had raised up, and did now send abroad out of the north country in the service of the Gospel to the eastern, southern and western parts of the nation," what more can they do? Is not the issue with Him who can be trusted?

Never did men work harder than did those sixty missionary Friends, and rarely have men suffered more for righteousness' sake; they possessed themselves in patience, but they were never idle. They speak loudly to their successors of to-day and the bravest, truest and most helpful of these may be the men, now out of sight, held in English jails and barracks. George Fox tells us that during the twelve years that the commonwealth continued under Cromwell, about three thousand Friends were in prison and more than thirty died in prison. The Friend (London), Eleventh Month 10, 1916, states: "The total number of men arrested and handed over to the military authorities is 2,734." May the concluding paragraph never be written as was that two hundred and fifty years ago.

THE TRUE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

Everything of real value lies wrapped up in the knowledge of God. Truly it is the sum of all blessedness for man. But how may God be known? The heart is hungry until this momentous question is answered. GOD CAN ONLY BE KNOWN BY REVELATION. No one knoweth the eternal Father save the eternal Son in His bosom, and he to whom the Son is pleased to reveal Him. Christ is "the Word" in whom God is "declared," "the true Light" who illuminates the heart of man with "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God."

If that "Word" speak not to me, if that "Light" shine not within me, I shall continue both ignorant and dark touching real, living acquaintance with God.

The Holy Scriptures are given by inspiration of God, they are the words of the Living Word through human lips or by human pens, guided and controlled by the Divine Spirit. They tell me about God, they are a revelation from God. But they are not God, nor the revelation of God; that I find in the Son; I must "hear Him"; and the Scriptures point me away from their letter to Him who is the life-giving Spirit.

The prophets of Israel spoke of the dawn of a new dispensation, the glorious day of the new covenant. The crowning blessing of that covenant was that those in it would not need to be taught by man to know God. They would know Him by direct Divine teaching, through Divine writing on their hearts. Though Israel rejected that covenant and clung to the mere outward knowledge imparted by the Law, the blessings of this covenant may be enjoyed by every one. The apostles spoke of themselves as "able ministers of the New Testament; not of the letter but of the Spirit, for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth Life." Those converted through their ministry were "manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ, ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the Living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart." Such converts could be written to as not needing that any man should teach them, that is in respect of their acquaintance with God, for the Anointing they had received was their inward Teacher, who taught them to abide in the Father and the Son. Such only are true New Testament believers. Art thou such an one?

The true knowledge of God consists in the life of God. "This is life eternal, that they might know Thee the Only True God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent." Everyone breathing this life can testify: I know that the Son of God has come to me, and has given me that understanding which can understand God. This is the true God found, and eternal life enjoyed.

The business of the seeker after God is to be silent, so that the "Word," who has become flesh, and has put Himself in His grace in connection with man, might speak to Him, as He assuredly will, until God is known in His nature and life.

FOREGLEAMS OF THE DAWNING DAY.

"The night is far spent, the day is at hand." (Rom. xiii: 12.)

"Until the day dawn and the Day Star arise." (2 Pet. ii: 19.)

"Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night nor of darkness." (1 Thess. v: 5.)

There's a light upon the mountains, and the day is at the spring,
When our eyes shall see the beauty and the glory of the King;
Weary was our heart with waiting, and the night watch seemed so long,
But His triumph day is breaking, and we hail it with a song.

In the fading of the starlight we can see the coming morn;
And the lights of men are paling in the splendors of the dawn;
For the eastern skies are glowing as with light of hidden fire,
And the hearts of men are stirring with a throb of deep desire.

There's a hush of expectation, and a quiet in the air,
And the breath of God is moving in the fervent breath of prayer;
For the suffering, dying Jesus is the Christ upon the throne,
And the travail of our spirit is the travail of His own.

He is breaking down the barriers, He is casting up the way;
He is calling for His angels to build up the gates of day;
But His angels here are human, not the shining hosts above,
For the drumbeats of His army are the heartbeats of our love.

Hark! we hear a distant music, and it comes with fuller swell;
'Tis the triumph song of Jesus, of our King, Immanuel!
Zion, go ye forth to meet Him! And, my soul, be swift to bring All thy sweetest and thy dearest for the triumph of our King!

—HENRY BURTON, in Bombay Guardian.

DR. SARGENT ON MILITARY DRILL.

Dr. Dudley Allen Sargent, Director of the Hemenway Gymnasium at Harvard University, who is generally acknowledged as the highest authority on Physical Training in America, presented the following epitome of his views on the introduction of military training into the schools before the Massachusetts Special Commission on Military Education, on Eleventh Month 3rd, 1915.

This is a question which has come before the State and country before, and is the usual result of a wave of popular concern for our military condition and state of preparedness for war such as has swept over the country every ten or twenty years.

1. Let us consider first what are the fundamental requirements of modern war as regards the men and women of a belligerent country:

(a) Health and vigor of its people, and the knowledge of how to maintain it under both favorable and adverse circumstances.

(b) Mental acumen and bodily and mental control under trying circumstances.

(c) A courageous and generous spirit that will fight for what it believes is right for all it is worth.

11. How near do we come in this country to fulfilling these conditions?

(a) The most of our children are not trained and developed physically as they should be, while a few are overtrained and enjoy the special attention of instructors and the use of facilities barred to the many.

(b) Mental acumen as regards physical activities is not developed as it should be for lack of the opportunity for its expression.

(c) The moral qualities of courage, co-operation and self-sacrifice and the fighting spirit, in its broadest and best sense, are not developed as they should be for lack of wholesome and properly directed means for their expression, except again in the case of the favored few.

111. Does military drill in the schools develop these qualities in youth which prepare a nation for the struggles of war, to say nothing of those of peace? No, because:

1. It is not an adequate means for physical training, being not only very limited in its activities, but actually harmful in its effect on boys less than eighteen or twenty years of age. The musket is a one-sided implement, too heavy for young boys and inefficient and harmful for older boys. Sir William Aitkin, Professor of Pathology in the Army Medical School of England, in his book "The Growth of the Recruit and the Young Soldier" says that boys given military training at eighteen make soldiers who are less robust and efficient than men with whom this training was deferred a few years, remaining in civil life until after their bones, heart, lungs, liver, etc., were more matured and developed. Recruits of eighteen show physical immaturity which results only too frequently in their ending in the hospital or being discharged as invalids. Recruits of eighteen require two years' special training before they are fit for military training.

2. It does not offer sufficient opportunity for the development of the individual's powers of muscular and mental co-ordination and the exercise of judgment under unusual and trying circumstances.

3. It does not offer sufficient opportunity for struggle, which requires and develops a spirit of co-operation and self-sacrifice, loyalty and a strong will.

4. The most military nations in the world do not have military drill in their schools, but give military instructions and training only after the boys have reached eighteen or twenty years, and have received years of physical training as a part of their schooling.

5. The same qualities that are of most value for war are of most value in peace. Military drill also is inadequate as a preparation for the struggles of peace, such as are necessary to sustain the place of the individual or nation in the pursuit of science, politics, commerce, etc.

6. Military drill in the schools cannot teach boys the real art of war, since they are too young to handle the real weapons, and undergo the rigors of adequate instruction. Hence it is apt to foster a bombastic military spirit of "tin-soldierism" and a false sense of patriotism which does not appreciate the seriousness of war nor the glories of the struggles of peace.

IV. A rational system of physical training in the schools and colleges would be of the greatest value in preparing the youth of the country—both boys and girls—for the struggles of both war and peace; because:

1. The development and functioning of both the mental and moral attributes is dependent upon and limited by the health and vigor of the individual.

2. Physical training in the schools would be training at the formative and most critical period of life, just when it is most needed and able to produce the best and most lasting results.

3. By this means not only would the stature be improved in size and carriage, but all the vital organs—heart, lungs, liver, etc.—would be developed and brought into condition to undergo the rigors of real military training in camp or barracks if necessary.

4. Furthermore, the boys and girls would learn how to take care of themselves under adverse circumstances and apply the laws of hygiene, instruction in which is, of course, an important part of any adequate system of physical training.

5. An adequate system of physical training includes athletic sports and games, and general gymnastics under competent direction. In these activities—and in this way only—is an opportunity offered for the exercise of the same physical, mental, and moral qualities which are of fundamental importance in war. I refer to presence of mind, courage, self-sacrifice, and the desire to struggle for a cause which is believed to be right. Physiologists have recently shown that the whole bodily tone and functions are different according as the individual's emotions are those of quiet rest or active struggle. To exercise these various functions in preparation for the struggles of war or peace, contests must be provided. Hence we have a new reason for promoting the plays and games of the playground, school yard, and athletic field.

6. The countries whose armies in this war are found best prepared do not give military drill in their schools. On the contrary, they give abundant instruction in physical training. As illustrating the interest in physical training, independent of the schools, in Germany alone, in 1909, in 7174 cities and towns there were 8607 gymnastic societies with a total membership of 902,910, and an active membership of 416,861, an active junior membership of 150,332 and an active female membership of 49,627. On First Month 1, 1914, the total membership was 1,486,320. It is easy to see at what advantage the German military authorities worked with such a nucleus in addition to their regular army. On the other hand, once England's small army of regular troops—than whom there are none finer in the world—had gone to the front, she found herself faced with the herculean task of training a citizen army. She has been at this for over a year and is still at it, trying to do in a few months what Germany and France and Switzerland have taken years of gradual and consistent training to accomplish.

CONCLUSION.

V. Upon the foundation of a healthy and vigorous youth can be laid the technical training for peace or war which is necessary for the successful nation of to-day.

In the summer of 1908 I visited Frankfort, Germany, and saw 25,000 men, women and children doing mass exercises in the field, before perhaps an equal number on the benches.

I went back to London a week later and saw the close of the Olympic games, at which there were 25 men performing on the track and field and perhaps 100,000 spectators on the benches.

The former represents the survival of the Greek type, the latter the decadent Roman period. One was educational, the other was gladiatorial and spectacular.

The scene at Frankfort shows us very plainly why Germany has so many men prepared for service, and the scene at London shows us why England has some million or more men at the training camps which she is trying to get into condition.

What America most needs is some way of giving those physical advantages to the masses which she now lavishes on the favored few—some way of providing more athletic students and fewer student athletes, some way of providing more soldierly schoolboys instead of schoolboy soldiers.

[The following paper was read before the Friends' Peace Committee some months ago and references have been made to it in our columns and parts have been printed in THE FRIEND. At the suggestion of a reader we will give the entire paper.—Eds.]

PRINCIPLES ADOPTED BY THE PEACE COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.

This Committee enters upon its duties with a profound consciousness that the tragic events of the present times make this one of the most solemn and critical hours in the history of Christianity. Christians throughout the world now face the gravest responsibilities. In America we are all in danger of taking the war too lightly. The broken body and the wounded soul of Europe cry aloud for healing and for a new way of life. We desire that this Committee, the Yearly Meeting which it represents, and all followers of Christ may earnestly and prayerfully seek to meet the needs of these fearful days with quickened hearts, clear vision and vital power.

We believe that Love as it has been known and is yet more to be discovered in Jesus Christ is the one possession which can satisfy the needs of all mankind. Only as men become united through a redeeming and reconciling Love can they fulfil their true natures, satisfy one another's deepest needs, and attain to an abiding Peace.

We, therefore, conceive that Love is the supreme law of all personal relationships, and that no evil which men may commit against one another can necessitate the violation of this, Christ's new commandment to His disciples. We believe that loyalty to Him means the endeavor to practice Love at whatever cost, though it be at the sacrifice of life itself.

Those who strive to follow this way of life to the uttermost will not be neutral toward wrong or powerless against unrighteousness. Peace for them will be no sluggard's paradise or coward's refuge, but a life throbbing with the energy of a love that tirelessly and fearlessly seeks to overcome evil and to accomplish its redemptive purposes.

Such an ideal demands unwavering confidence in the invincibility of Love, and we realize with humility how inadequate has been our faith. But we can rejoice that Love's transforming power has not been without its witnesses. We are strengthened as we recall the conquering influence of Christian saints and martyrs throughout the ages, and above all the victory of Him, who, facing the Cross, could say, "Be of good cheer. I have overcome the world."

There is need for us all to examine the foundations of our present social order in the light of these principles. What does Love mean for the world to-day? None can fully say, but it is for us to seek greater knowledge. Somewhat we know already. Love strives to serve, not to be served, to co-operate for mutual advantage, not to compete for private profit. Love demands that in personal, industrial, national and international life, we have reverence and not contempt, for personality; trust and not suspicion; forgiveness and not revenge.

We are convinced that these principles should be sovereign for every relationship, and should govern the collective as well as the private life of man. We deem them applicable to nations as well as to individuals. The Christian ideal of brotherhood recognizes no insurmountable barriers of nationality or race. To strive to realize this ideal through persistent good-will and self-sacrificing service is the highest privilege of any nation. We affirm our devotion to our country, but we conceive that the truest patriotism is that which seeks to have the nation serve the interests of mankind throughout the world.

We conceive that the full acceptance of these principles by the United States would mean disarmament, and the substitution of trust for suspicion toward every nation, however militaristic. The domination of our foreign policies by good-will would work revolutionary changes. We should make haste to settle the immigration question with honor to Japan and China, and in accordance with the highest good of each race; we should seek every opportunity to spend our wealth and efforts for the help of the Mexican people in their struggle for material and spiritual progress. Instead of arousing the distrust of the European belligerents by increasing our armament we should be solemnly preparing ourselves to make our contribution toward the establishment of peace upon the basis of mutual service and co-operative friendship.

We are further convinced that our international problems cannot be solved apart from the problems of our social and national life. If we are to establish international relations on a Christian basis we must seek to apply fully the principles of Christianity within the nation. We must transform an industrial system in which the greatest mass of the workers have totally inadequate opportunities to rise to the full capacity of manhood and womanhood. We must challenge competitive self-interest as the driving power of commerce. We must reject patent methods which are not redemptive. We advocate no social theory as a remedy, but we are convinced that those who seek peace on a Christian basis must endeavor to establish principles in commercial, industrial and all personal and social life.

We reaffirm the belief, long held by our Society, that all war is a violation of these principles, and we unalterably oppose all tendencies in our nation which may hinder it from expressing them in all its relationships. But we cannot stop with protest or negation. A more positive work demands the efforts of all Christians. The task which confronts this generation is no less than the reconstruction of the world upon a true moral basis. We believe that this will be accomplished only as men and women enter into a Christian discipleship which shall be willing to make unflinching application of Christ's principle of love with confident faith in its transforming power. We may all take our part in this endeavor, but only as we heartily accept these principles for ourselves and seek to apply them uncompromisingly shall we be able to weave them into the fabric of our national life.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF WILLIAM PENN.

Albert Cook Myers, who will be known to future generations as the biographer of William Penn and editor-in-chief of Penn's collected works, is about to return to America, carrying with him vast stores of information which he has accumulated during the past six years. These are contained in some 150 quarto volumes of typed and illustrative matter, arranged in the most orderly and systematic manner that well-trained ingenuity could devise.

From every available source in public and private archives some 1,200 Penn letters have been collected, of which less than one-third have been printed hitherto. The personal and historical allusions in these letters, as also in unpublished diaries and other manuscripts, have been traced with a minuteness and unwearied effort that is beyond all praise. Penn's wanderings over England, Ireland and the Continent of Europe have been tracked from day to day, with the skill of a detective following the living object of his quest from one point to another. For some years the Meeting for Sufferings has allotted a room at Devonshire House to Albert C. Myers and his staff for the purposes of his work, and the strong rooms have conveniently and safely housed his collections; but owing to the pressure of the requirements of the Society, he has recently had to remove his office to the Devonshire House Hotel. His position at the headquarters of the Society, the introductions brought from America and the support of the United States Ambassador, have procured for him the entrée of private libraries which might otherwise have been difficult of access. Almost, perhaps quite, without exception, noblemen and other possessors of books and manuscripts bearing on Penn's life and associations have welcomed him to their houses and placed their treasures at his disposal for copying and photographic purposes.

This magnum opus, which will probably run to some fifteen volumes and contain in all some 6,000 pages, is estimated when complete to cost at least some £4,000 to £5,000. Hitherto it has been financed by American Friends and others and no systematic appeal has been made to English Friends, who have contributed not more than £60, of which £50 was received from one donor. At the present time American Friends are contributing thousands of pounds to our various funds for alleviating distress, and we warmly appreciate their work. It will be a matter of regret, when the undertaking of Albert C. Myers reaches completion, if English Friends have not had a substantial share in contributing to its success. The cost may appear large, but the work will be a standard work of reference for all time and should be well done and will be well done in the hands of the scholarly enthusiast who has undertaken it. William Penn was essentially an Englishman and a Quaker. Of his seventy-four years he only spent four in his beloved colony. For his defense of the rights of Englishmen we may well help to keep his memory green, for as English subjects we owe as much to him perhaps as Americans, who in all parts of the States regard his Pennsylvanian constitution as the model of their own. William C. Allen, who was recently with us so acceptably from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, has written a very appreciative article commending the work of A. C. Myers to the notice of Friends. It was the boast of the late Joseph Smith that his Catalogue of Friends' books was in all the great libraries from the Vatican to Washington. It is safe to predict that all the great libraries of the world will some day possess "The Complete Works of William Penn." By this means all that William Penn stood for as a high-minded statesman and a Quaker will be brought before the world in a new light, and will prove him to be an even greater man than his earlier biographers have represented him.

If any Friends incline to send me contributions, I will gladly take charge of them and transmit to Albert C. Myers as Trustee of "The William Penn Fund," which is deposited with the Girard Trust Company of Philadelphia.

38, FOREST DRIVE EAST, Leytonstone, London, E.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF WILLIAM PENN.—When in London last summer I much enjoyed meeting with Albert Cook Myers, of Moylan, Pennsylvania. He has been residing in London for several years in connection with his proposed edition of the complete works of William Penn. Since the outbreak of the war he has more than once narrowly escaped with his life in Zeppelin raids. He, however, seems well and happy, and is awaiting conditions favorable to his return to America.

Up to the 31st of last Eighth Month he had been working on the life of William Penn for six years. This labor has covered all the ground connected with the life work and experiences of that eminent Friend. It is likely that there will be at least fifteen large octavo volumes, each volume to contain from 400 to 500 pages. These books are to be illustrated, including letters, papers and books of William Penn in chronological order. There will also be biographical notices illustrating these documents and papers.

Albert Cook Myers has obtained over 1200 letters of William Penn from widely scattered sources; less than 35 per cent. of these have been printed before. There are also to be introduced three new diaries that have never been published. Included is "A Persuasive to Toleration," a new book from Penn's own signed manuscript, which has never yet been published.

This great work is being consummated with the endorsement and co-operation of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

A prospectus of the proposed publication says: "Penn was not only a great courtier and a statesman. He was a philanthropist and a constructive social reformer as well. He upheld the rights of Englishmen. He interceded for and relieved the distressed and persecuted for conscience' sake. He helped worthy and useful men in their undertakings. He was a great leader of a religion that has profoundly affected the thought of the world. He was an enlightened and far-sighted lawgiver and maker of constitutions. He was the builder of three great commonwealths, keystone provinces in the arch of the American colonies. These States were founded and developed in their formative years under his ideas, governmentally and in their more subtle underlying social and economic aspects. These States were the means of transmitting Penn's ideals as exemplified in practice, to other States and to the Nation as a whole, not only as makers of constitutions, but peculiarly as disseminating hives of population which carried these transforming Penn influences of democracy and progress to the up-country of the South and to the West, and so into the heart of the Nation. These ideas have reacted upon England and Europe. It may be said with truth that Penn stands forth as the greatest of the early American founders. His life and his thought have entered into the bone and sinew of England and America, and, indeed, into that of all the world."

It is much to be hoped that this great work will be published in due course. It will prove a strong and valuable contribution to political and religious thought.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

ONLY THROUGH ME.

Only through Me! . . . The clear, high call comes pealing
Above the thunders of the battle-plain;—
Only through Me can Life's red wounds find healing;
Only through Me shall earth have peace again.

Only through Me! Love's might, all might transcending,
Alone can draw the poison fangs of hate.
Yours the beginning! Mine a nobler ending—
Peace upon earth, and man regenerate!

Only through Me can come the great awakening!
Wrong cannot right the wrongs that Wrong hath done;
Only through Me, all other gods forsaking,
Can ye attain the heights that must be won.

Can we not rise to such great height of glory?
Shall this vast sorrow spend itself in vain?
Shall future ages tell the woful story—
Christ by His own was crucified again?

—JOHN OXENHAM.

THE INNER LIFE.—"Take care of what you are, and what you do will care for itself." Our secret life is our most sacred life. Take care of the springs of the sacred life and you need have no fear of your public life. In the rush of things this day it is absolutely necessary to keep a lonely hour, without which you cannot be efficient for God. Enter into your closet and shut the door. Love itself must knock in vain at the shut door. If you do not keep this lonely hour, life will waste itself, your power will be exhausted; through this hour, power is renewed.

The secret life needs meditation, loneliness and introspection. With an open door you cannot pray. I entered a cathedral one day; the aisle, the architecture, the windows were conducive to meditation, but I could not meditate. The door of the cathedral was open, and through the door I heard the clatter of horses' hoofs, the wheels of commerce—that was no hour of meditation, for the door was not shut.

There is nothing more sacred than your inner self. Prayer is contact with God, the inner self or personality reaching out for the personality of God. There is a subjective influence from prayer, an influence which calms the mind, quiets the nerves, but this subjective prayer does not explain its mystery. Prayer is also objective. There are two personalities; the personality of God and the personality of man; these personalities in contact is prayer.

God soon fades out of the life of a man who never prays. Arrange, therefore, your time to give your soul a chance to grow.—WILLIAM J. DAWSON.

VISIT TO NORTH CAROLINA.

The straggling "worm" fences of Virginia are rarely visible. The County of Northampton through which we are passing, has recently passed an ordinance requiring "fencing in" along the roadsides, and this has been accomplished to a large extent by the use of wire so common in the North. The ubiquitous hog is therefore restricted in his range, resulting in a great encouragement to the would-be thrifty husbandman. The richer and more intelligently-tilled soil is seen to produce a much larger yield. The country is more thickly settled. On all sides are the neighborly crops of cotton and peanuts growing side by side, and, to our delight, in the midst of harvest. In the fields are the cotton-pickers quietly stealing their way along the rows engaged in transferring the pure-white feathery substance from the widely-expanded bolls to sacks suspended about their waists. This work appears mostly to be done by women and children. The peanuts are harvested in the following manner: When ripe they are taken up adhering to the vines, which are stacked around a pole, making a shock of about four feet in diameter and from five to six feet in height; in this situation the "peas" dry out in the course of about three weeks and are then ready for the "picker"; this is a machine constructed somewhat after the order of a grain thresher, which rapidly removes the peas from the vines, cleans them and passes them into sacks holding about four bushels each; they are then ready for shipment to the wholesale market where they are graded and sometimes brightened for the retail trade. The price received by the producer is about four cents per pound.

The town of Woodland has a cotton gin, consequently the roads leading thither were quite alive with teams conveying the seed cotton to the gin, or bringing away the baled product to be shipped from the railway station. In some instances the yield per acre may be but two or three hundred pounds of seed cotton. Much of the land that we saw, however, it was said would yield from one to two thousand pounds, the market price of which is now about eighteen cents. Until a few years ago the seed was considered worthless, except as fertilizer, but the many uses which have since been discovered for it render it highly valuable, so that the market value of a bale of lint cotton with its by-product of seed amounts to considerably over one hundred dollars. These facts have brought prosperity and encouragement to the community of Friends about Woodland and Rich Square, so little would that while those who visited them some ten years ago found some of them riding to the Yearly Meeting in the primitive two-wheeled carts still used for the transportation of their farm products, we now found many enjoying the comforts of "Overland" cars. To these latter we were escorted upon the arrival of our train at Woodland station where a number of Friends were in waiting to receive and convey us to the homes where for one week round we were to enjoy unstinted hospitality and that Christian regard which unites soul with soul and leaves both the visitor and the visited enriched by the intercourse.

THE YEARLY MEETING—This began the afternoon of our arrival with a meeting of Ministers, Elders and Overseers, to which were welcomed the visitors and all concerned persons who might feel an interest in the occasion. About sixty individuals assembled and were soon sensible of the overshadowing of Divine goodness, this was recognized in prayer and testimony, well summarized in the utterance of a beloved woman minister, far advanced in years, who had come upwards of one hundred and fifty miles to attend her Yearly Meeting, thus expressed: "There is a river the streams whereof make glad the city of God."

The leading business of this session was the reading of the minutes of visiting Friends, and the appointment of a committee to prepare for these returning minutes.

Seventh-day morning the general Yearly Meeting assembled in joint session. Out of the depths of the precious solemnity that overspread us came forth a tendering plea for the responsibilities of motherhood and rarely has such an exercise shaped itself so definitely both in weight of feeling and expression as upon this occasion. The shutters being closed, the men and the women proceeded with the business in separate session, though there continued a community of interest in all the proceedings most beautiful to see, as was repeatedly shown by the passing of notes from Clerk to Clerk through the medium of messengers seated on either side of the communicating door between the two rooms. Though the writer by sex was committed to reporting the transactions of the men's meeting only, his seat being very near the shutters which did not adjust closely, there was not a little opportunity to sense the life and the interest with which the affairs of the Church were being conducted on the other side. The call of the roll of representatives from the two Quarterly Meetings, named respectively Eastern and Southern, was interesting to the visitor as showing the difficulties of age, distance of travel and exacting engagements by which some of these Friends are surrounded; touching also it was to see the brotherly condescension with which the absence of some was excused.

The reading of the credentials of those visiting Friends who had minutes from their respective meetings, showed the following present: from Ohio, Elwood Conrad; from Iowa, Abner Newlin and wife, Ella Newlin, and Eva Irene Smith; from Philadelphia, William S. Yarnall, and from New Jersey, Samuel B. Hussey and Walter L. Moore. In addition to the above Friends there were present, four from Iowa; eleven from Ohio, two from Indiana, three from Pennsylvania, three from New Jersey, two from Virginia, two from California, and one, a woman Friend, from Canada, to whom as she set forth without company had been furnished a brief unofficial letter commending her to whomsoever she might come as an Elder in good esteem among her Friends at home. Epistles from all the Yearly Meetings with which this meeting corresponds, six in number, and one from Fritchley General Meeting, England, were read, bringing freshly to remembrance that those who truly love the Lord Jesus may have close Christian fellowship though widely separated by time and space.

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

Jane C. Balderston recently forwarded the following letter, addressed to Joseph Elkinton, from the Monthly Meeting of the Society of Friends at Chengtu, Sze Chwan, West China, under date of Ninth Month 18, 1916, with the remark, "The enclosed letter is supposed to be only a first draft; the other two members of the committee, Fang Shu Shuen and Chang Too Pin, asked me if I would correct and type it. But I know thee will be much more interested to have it just as it is. I think it is a pretty good production for two of our University students. I think they had no help from any one in writing it."

As I met with these worthy young men, both in their Monthly Meeting and educational work a year ago, it has been a constant and increasing concern that Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting should become well informed and truly interested in this group of Friends, who are looking to us for guidance. Dr. Joseph Beech, President of the West China University, with which several of these Friends are connected, has been in our midst for some weeks past and fully confirmed all that appeared in THE FRIEND recently as relating to this Union University. Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin lived in Chengtu for five years and worked with Dr. Beech and others to found this noble institution, which now has about three hundred students directly connected with it and about 10,000 in schools so graded as to prepare students for it. Years ago, when Dr. Beech dedicated himself to this field of labor, he distinctly felt that there was no more strategic point than West China, among unchristian people, for the propagation of the Christian faith, and the events of the last fifteen years have abundantly confirmed this judgment. He told of an appeal from the chief of one of the wild tribes of the Tibetan border, representing 100,000 families, asking very earnestly that heralds of the Gospel might be sent to his people.

With the awakening of 400,000,000 people, China will become one of the great nations of the earth, and, if she becomes Christian, perhaps one of the most formidable. I found everywhere the most open attitude toward the United States from one end to the other of that Republic and everywhere some individuals who were friendly to those who approached them in a truly Christian spirit. The next decade or two will probably decide whether the counsels of Confucius or of Christ will prevail.—J. E.

CHENGTU, West China, Ninth Month 18, 1916.

DEAR FRIEND:—
